The debate on the second reading of the Tobacco Duties Bill was resumed by Colonel Dunne. He pointed out that the Irish snuffmaker paid for his stalks 1s. per lb., and the foreign snuffmaker nothing; and therefore it was not fair to allow foreign snuff to come in at a duty soarsely higher than that on unmanufactured tobacco.—Sir Stafford Northcote (the ablest financier, except Mr. Baring, on the Conservative side) recommended that, as the subject was a very complicated one, involving the discussion of a mass of disputed facts, it ought to be referred to a Select Committee. He thought that unless the manufacture of cigars in bond were allowed, an undue advantage would be given to the foreign manufacturer.—Mr. Crawford supported the Government.—Sir E. Grogan urged that a Select Committee alone could properly sift the evidence as to the effects of the measure.—Mr. Childers said that the very limited use of cigars, as compared with tobacco, in this country, was a strong proof of the wisdom of the proposed change.—Mr. Horsfall (Liverpool) said that all the communications he had received urged the necessity of inquiry by a Select Committee.—Mr. Cardwell said there did not seem to be much doubt of the expediency of a change in the law. The present question was simply one between free-trade and protection, and he saw no reason why tobacco should be an exception to our general financial policy.—Sir Hugh Cairns insisted on the importance to manufacturers, if foreign tobacco were to be admitted at a reduced rate of permission, to manufacture in bond.—Mr. Newdegate remarked that, as the growth of tobacco in this country was prohibited, it was absurd to bring "free trade" into the discussion.—Mr. Gladstone said that it was his object to make whatever arrangements were necessary to hold the balance fairly between foreign and home manufacturers. The Bill was then read a second time.

The Corrupt Practices at Elections Bill underwent a long discussion in Committee. The House rose at 1 a.m.

TUESDAY, MARCH 3.—HOUSE OF LORDS

The Lords sat for a short time, but nothing worth recording was said or done.

TUESDAY, MARCH 3.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

A Bill for the extension of the Great Northern Railway as far as Regent Circus came before the House for the second reading. The usual practice is to read all such Bills a second time without debate, and to refer them to a Select Committee. On the present occasion, however, a strong opposition was offered to the second reading, principally by members connected with the metropolis, and by two who belong to the Metropolitan Board of Works. It was shown that the proposed extension would interfere with more than one main thoroughfare and intercept several important sewers, and that no more extensions ought to be allowed in London until some proper authority had inquired into and reported upon such schemes in general. On the other side it was contended that there was no occasion to depart from the usual practice of the House. The Speaker put the question, "Those who are of this opinion say 'Aye': those who are of the contrary say 'No'—The Noes have it." His decision was questioned by a single voice; he put the question again, and again said, "I think the Noes have it." A second time his opinion was disputed, but when he finally said, "I think the Noes have it" it was not resisted, and the Bill was thrown out without a division.—At this stage the Deputy Sergeant-at-Arms announced a message from the Lords; and Mr. Justice Williams and Mr. Justice Blackburn, advancing to the table, announced that the Lords had agreed to the Prince and Princess of Wales' Annuities Bill, without amendment. This intimation was received with cheers. In approaching the table the learned Justices seemed somewhat disinclined to perform the usual obeisances to the House, and when in deference to the cries of "Bow, bow," they condescended to make the customary reverences, they did so in the most discordant manner—one up and the other down. There were some titters during this part of this proceeding, but the House could no longer preserve its gravity when, as their lordships were retiring backwards, first one and afterwards the other, looked askance, and then both almost faced about in their anxiety not to compromise the dignity of their office by a collision or a tumble.

Mr. Torrens called attention to the reports of the Commissioners of Woods of the sale of rights of the Crown, in Waltham, Epping, and other forests in Essex, and to the fact that in consequence of those sales numerous enclosures have been made in the forests by the purchasers of Crown rights: and moved for a Select Committee to inquire into the legality of those and other recent enclosures; also to ascertain what steps ought to be taken to preserve the rights of the public, of the poorer foresters, and the inhabitants of the metropolis, within the forests.—The motion was seconded by Mr. Cox, who argued that the public had been ousted of their rights by these enclosures.—Mr. Watlington contended that this was a question to be determined by a court of law, not to be examined by a committee of that House. The right of the soil was not in the Crown, but in the lord of the manor.—The Attorney-General said the motion, according to the terms of it, would erect a committee of that House into a Court of Judicature to try the rights of individuals as opposed to rights of the Crown, which would be a dangerous precedent. The proper forum was a court of law, which could enforce its judgment. He, however, thought the subject deserved inquiry, and proposed the appointment of a committee with more limited instructions.—Mr. Torrens accepted the proposal, and withdrew his motion. The motion of the Attorney-General was then agreed to.

Mr. G. Hardy moved for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the Acts relating to the turnpike roads in the neighbourhood of the metropolis north of the river Thames. After a few words by Sir G. Grey and Lord Enfield, the motion was agreed to.

On the second reading of the Bill to take votes at municipal elections by ballot, Lord Palmerston said that as it was avowed by the supporters of the Bill that this was a step to the introduction of the ballot into Parliamentary elections, and as every objection to the employment of the ballot in those elections applied to those for municipal bodies, considering that responsibility ought to go hand in hand with political action, he should vote for the amendment.—Moved by Mr. Hardy that the Bill be read a second time this day six months. The amendment was carried by 93 to 58.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 4.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Mr. Hadfield moved the third reading of a Bill to abolish the oath required of Dissenters elected to certain municipal offices, that they will not use their power to injure the Church of England. The Bill was supported by Mr. Gladstone, and Mr. W. E. Forster, and opposed by Mr. Newdegate and Mr. Walpole. The third reading was carried—Ayes, 175; Noes, 172. Some other business was transacted, and the House adjourned at 10 minutes before 6.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, March 4.

Our last report closed on a depressed market, with Fair Dhollerah at 16½d. The past week has presented no new feature of interest, but like many of its predecessors has witnessed a succession of dull and heavy markets, with a small enquiry from the trade and exporters, who from the largeness of the supply offering, have almost daily got in at lower prices.

On Thursday and Friday the sales were 4000 and 3000 bales, with little quotable change.

On Saturday, owing to the desire on the part of some holders to effect sales, considerably lower prices were taken, and Fair Egyptian was sold at 19d., whilst Fair Dhollerah touched 16d., the business reaching 5000 bales.

On Monday the market was again very slow with sales of 3000 bales.

On Tuesday Calcutta telegrams were to hand, reporting an advance in goods of 1s. per piece, and in some classes of yarns 3d. per lb., this news, however, produced no effect in Manchester, which closed very dull and depressed, and though imparting here for a moment a little more tone, the improvement has passed away.

To day there has been a general enquiry from the trade, which has, however, been very freely met by holders, and though the sales reach 5000 bales, the market closes flat and irregular at 16d. for Fair Dhollerah, and 21d. for Middling Orleans.

The main cause of depression here exists in our present large stock resulting from an inadequate demand from our own spinners and exporters. Since the 1st of January these have only taken out of this port about 20,000 bales per week, and our stock in consequence has actually increased during this—the stock season of import. A very serious decline has accordingly been established, ranging from 3d. to 6d. per lb.: in long-staples, and 3d. per lb. in the medium qualities of Surats, and prices are now in the former fully as low, and in the latter within 1d. of the extreme point of depression in November last. A considerable export demand for India and other countries seems the only hope for an increased consumption and a healthier state of things here, and till this comes we are likely to droop here; but when this is brought about, and a further decline would facilitate the movement, a healthy tone will once more pervade our market, and a solid basis be laid for a higher range of prices in the future.

The present aspect of American affairs has, moreover, an influence in restricting operations and curtailing shipments to distant countries. By the "Europa" no important fighting has occurred; at all points the Federals appeared to be checked and unable to press forward. The time of service of a large portion of their army is almost up, and the Conscription Bill, which has passed the Senate, is thought by some to be impracticable and likely to be resisted on its attempted enforcement. The dissatisfaction in the Western States is also thought by many to be reaching such a pitch that a break up in the North is probable. By many, however, it is thought that the great majority of the Northern people are determined to carry on the unhappy war at all hazards, and that if they still possess the will, the means will be obtained for its prosecution.

MANCHESTER, Tuesday, March 3.

Our yarn and cloth market continues in a most unsatisfactory state, very few sales taking place, and where they have been effected, rather lower prices have been submitted to by sellers.

The Liverpool cotton market being in such a depressed state, with prices giving way from day to day, is causing many spinners and manufacturers, who reopened their establishments a short time back, to close them again, as the material in process becomes worked up.

The German buyers still continue loth to place their orders for yarns, as they are of a discretionary kind, until they see something like steadiness in the market.

Home trade yarns are in limited demand, and in Nos. 32's and 40's twist and pincops, there has been a reduction in price to the extent of ½d. to 1d. per lb. on the quotations of the week before. In Bolton spinnings the reduction has been much greater, in consequence of the heavy stocks in spinners' hands, and the heavy fall in the value of Egyptian cotton, from which this kind of yarn is spun.

Cloths of all kinds are much neglected, but there is not much weakness shown by holders.

On Saturday and Monday there were some considerable purchases made of Nos. 40s., 50s., and 60s., mule yarns in breadth, for shipment to India, caused by later telegrams from Calcutta, dated the 12th of February, reporting sales having been made there, in these qualities, at prices showing a profit of about 4d. per pound, on their value here.

To-day, our market is in a very dull state, partly in sympathy with Liverpool, and partly through the arrival of the "Europa," now two days overdue.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE CONFEDERATE CONGRESS.

Richmond, January 14.—Message of President Davis read.

January 15.—In the Senate the death of Hon. William Ballard Preston was announced. Senators Hunter, Henry, Clay, Semmes, and Wigfall delivered fitting eulogies, and resolutions of lament and condolence were adopted. The Senate then adjourned.

Similar proceedings took place in the House.

January 16.—No proceedings of importance.

January 17.—The House of Representatives refused to adopt a resolution either to buy or rent the Exchange Hotel for the use of Congress. Mr. Foote introduced a bill to provide for the enrolment of foreigners in the army. Referred Also, resolutions to set on foot an investigation into the Government ice contracts and the abuses in the Commissary and Quartermaster's Departments. Adopted. Mr. Perkins introduced a resolution calling upon the States to provide for the speedy trial of such Federal officers as may be turned over to them. Referred. Mr. Jones, a delegate from the Choctaw country, qualified and took his seat.

Mr. Hill gave notice that he would on Monday call up the bill to organize the Supreme Court.

January 19.—In the Senate Mr. Hill presented the credentials of Hon. Herschel V. Johnson, of Georgia. Mr. Johnson appeared and took the usual oath.

Mr. Hill introduced a bill to organize a Supreme Court.

Mr. Semmes, of Kentucky, submitted resolutions denouncing the impressment of private property by the military authorities. It was laid upon the table for the present. The Senate then went into secret session.

In the House of Representatives, the Speaker laid before the House a message from the President, transmitting a communication from the Secretary of War, enclosing Colonel Imboden's report of outrages perpetrated upon the people of Western Virginia by the Federal General, B. H. Milroy. The report states that persons had placed in the hands of General Imboden papers which had been served on them, assessing them to certain amounts for damages done by the guerrillas to the Union men. As a penalty for not paying the amounts assessed immediately, their houses were to be burnt and the men shot. The report was ordered to lie on the table. The Speaker also communicated to the House a telegraphic despatch from Governor Bonham, of South Carolina, resigning his seat in Congress.

Mr. Dargan, of Alabama, introduced a bill prohibiting quartermasters and others from speculating with public money, in necessities, upon the Government and people. Referred. Also a bill to relieve collectors and all receiving Government agents from default in consequence of receiving Yankee counterfeits of Confederate notes.

A letter was read from J. P. Johnson, contesting the seat as a member from the 3rd district of Arkansas, waiving further contest.

Mr. Clopton, of Alabama, introduced a joint resolution approving that portion of the President's Message which relates to retaliation on Yankee officers. Mr. Foote opposed retaliation until all of her measures were exhausted, and advocated the sending of a commission to the Government of the United States, setting forth the terms on which the South would be willing to negotiate for peace. He intended to offer resolutions to that effect, and throw on the Lincoln Government the responsibility of further carnage.

The House went into secret session on business connected with finance.

January 20.—In the Senate, Mr. Yancey introduced a bill providing that the Secretary of the Navy, when approving and announcing a decision of Naval Court Martial, shall do so without injurious reflections upon the Court, and in terms of respect for that body. After a long debate the bill was referred to the Committee on Naval affairs.

In the House, Mr. Miles, from the Military Committee, reported a bill requiring the enrolment of all persons between 18 and 45, and repealing the present exemption laws, and leaving exemptions and details to the Secretary of War, with the approval of the President, and suspending the enrolment of such persons until the President shall call them into military service. It was made the order of the day for the 21st.

The House then went into secret session on that portion of the President's Message relating to the delivery of captured officers to the State authorities for punishment.

January 21.—In the Senate nothing of importance took place in open session. The House debated the Exemption Bill most of the day, and many amendments were offered. Pending the motion to recommit the bill, the House went into secret session to receive a message from the President.

January 23.—In the Senate Mr. Hunter introduced a bill to regulate the currency, the provisions of which correspond with the recommendations of the Secretary of the Treasury. Several other propositions and bills, of no special importance, were introduced.

In the House, Mr. Foote offered a resolution of thanks to Wheeler's cavalry. Laid over. The House unanimously passed Mr. Hilton's bill repealing certain clauses in the Exemption Act, exempting the agent, owner, or overseer on plantations, and one person in addition to the police for every twenty negroes on two or more plantations, within five miles of each other. Mr. Crockett offered joint resolutions, declaring that no peace proposition is to be entertained, except upon the basis of the entire independence of the Confederacy of thirteen States and the preservation of the territorial integrity of each. Pending the consideration of these resolutions, the House took up the Exemption Bill reported by the Military Committee, but no final action was taken.—Mr. Perkins offered resolutions looking to the liberation of persons taken prisoners in civil life.

Both Houses adjourned until Monday.

ITEMS FROM SOUTHERN PAPERS.

Charleston papers of the 23rd of January announce the arrival on the day previous of the British screw steamer Calypso, Captain Hudson, from Bristol, whence she sailed on the 10th of December with a most valuable cargo; also of the schooner Swift.

After many fruitless ballots the Legislature of Virginia has at last, effected an election of Senator. On the 17th of January the Hon. Allan T. Caperton was elected by the following joint vote: Caperton, 78; Russell, 23; Tucker, 38; Marshall, 8; Mr. Reeves, who on the day before had received 41 votes, and General Floyd, who had reached 38, appear to have been withdrawn. Judge Allan Caperton is of Mercer county, Virginia. In the party divisions previous to the war he was an "Old Line Whig."

The United States' steamer which went ashore at Masonboro' Inlet, Wilmington Harbour, on the 16th of January, was the Columbia, Commander Southney, 12 officers, and 128 men. She surrendered to the Confederate forces under Colonel Lamb, who succeeded in keeping off four blockading vessels that attempted to come to the aid of the Columbia. The Columbia is an iron steamer, built in England to run the blockade, was captured by the Tuscarora on her first trip to Charleston, and immediately converted by the Federal Government into a war vessel.

A proposition has been introduced in the Virginia House of Delegates that no planter shall raise over 5000 hills of tobacco to the hand. It excites considerable discussion, and some regard it as playing into the hands of speculators.

The Legislature of Mississippi has passed a bill providing that not over three acres of cotton shall be planted to a hand, under a penalty of $500 per acre, half to go to the informer.

The Louisiana Legislature adjourned on the 3rd of January. Among other business, a resolution was passed changing the seat of Government from Opelousas to Shreveport, on Red River. The militia bill, which was passed, takes in all men (foreign included) between 17 and 50, and makes very few exceptions. The Governor is to call out the whole militia immediately.

Sir Bulwer Lytton's last novel, "A Strange Story," has just been republished, in what the Southern papers call a very creditable style, by Messrs. Goetzel and Co., of Mobile.

At Richmond, on the 23rd of January, the selling rates of gold were $2 10c. to $2 30c. Sales of sterling Exchange had taken place at $2 20c.

Coast salt was sold at auction in Columbus on the 8th of January at 28 cents to 30 cents per lb., by the sack—a decline of nearly 100 per cent. in three weeks.

At the annual orphans' fair in Mobile, on the 1st of January last, the astonishing sum of $17,223 was raised for the benefit of the orphan asylum of that city.

Messrs. Rodenberg, Orr, and Co., tanners, at Gadsden, Alabama, are selling, and have sold, up to this time, to all soldiers' families of their district, shoe leather complete at $1 per pair.

The Charleston Mercury, a bitter enemy of President Davis, speaks of his last annual Message to Congress as decidedly the ablest and most satisfactory that has yet been issued by him. The Message, it says, is written in admirable style, and "the exposition of the course of foreign nations, in their professed neutrality and one-sided observance of the law of nations, is eminently correct and well put. The expression of determination to hand over to the State authorities all officers henceforth taken, to be tried under the laws against insurrection, will, we feel sure, meet with hearty approval."

Ice is selling in Richmond at 8 cents a lb., or $4 a bushel.

A refugee lately from New Orleans states that the Federal land force now in Louisiana is estimated at 26,000—18,000 at Baton Rouge, and 8000 at New Orleans. It was also reported that Farragut said he would not attack our batteries at Port Hudson, until he was furnished with ironclad vessels—that it was folly to fight them with the vessels he now has.

The forces of Port Hudson are commanded by Major-General Francis Gardner—a meritorious officer of the old United States' army. He married a daughter of Governor Morton, of Louisiana, and since his marriage has been a resident of that State.

Ex-Governor William D. Mosely, of Florida, died at Palatka, on the 2nd of January.

Colonel Preston D. Cunningham of the 28th Tennessee Regiment, was killed in the Battle of Murfreesboro.

Major-General D. R. Jones, of the Confederate army, died at Richmond on 17th of January.

Alexander Galt, the gifted young sculptor, died in Richmond, on Tuesday, the 20th of January, of small pox.

The widow and children of the late ex-President John Tyler, who went North, were returned on the last flag of truce boat, and landed in Charles City county. They are now at their home.

Bradley T. Johnson, of Maryland, has been elected colonel of the 1st Maryland Regiment, just re-organized at Richmond. Colonel J. was colonel of the 1st Maryland, which was mustered out of service some time ago.

The Hon. John Bell, who has been driven from his home and his estates in Tennessee, is now living with his family in a modest little village near Rome, Ga. Mr. Bell is quite advanced in years, and yet looks ruddy and hale. He has two sons in the army.

The Macon Telegraph says that the "Empire State Iron Works" have started with an unexampled rush. Five thousand shares of stock were offered in Macon last Monday morning, and all taken in a few minutes by twenty-six substantial men. The company has already secured a sixty-horse power steam-engine to drive their works, and is in the hands of thorough business men. Several companies are now preparing to prosecute the same business in Willis' Valley, and that region will soon be black with the smoke of furnaces.

Foreign Correspondence.

PARIS, March 3.

The excitement occasioned in Paris by the Prussian Convention has subsided, the fear (or hope) of a war being removed. The unanimous reprobation excited by that measure, has however, had one beneficial result. Prussia has been shamed into backing out of the Convention, and the conduct of the Cabinet at Berlin has been censured by the Prussian Chambers quite as strongly as by public opinion, throughout Europe.

M. de Montalembert has issued a pamphlet on the subject which has produced considerable impression. He calls on the French Government in the most glowing and impassioned language, to go to war on behalf of Poland. He appears to attach but little importance to the efforts of diplomacy, and does not seem to think that the joint action of England, France, and Austria, would produce any beneficial result for the future of Poland. It is remarkable that so far M. de Montalembert entirely coincides with the revolutionary ultras, who claim the restoration of Poland as an independent kingdom, and treat any concession short of that on the part of Russia, as nugatory. Those who do not belong to extreme parties, confine themselves to regretting that the insurrection should not have taken place at the time of the Crimean war, or should not have been deferred until a more convenient season, but they found great hopes on the liberal disposition which Czar Alexander is in some quarters given credit for, and still more on the "moral effect" of a joint representation on the part of the Western Powers and Austria.

The Czar has no small difficulties to contend with, supposing him to be disposed to a merciful and humane policy towards the Poles—difficulties very much akin to those which brought about the failure of the conciliatory mission of Archduke Max in Lombardy in 1858. If I am rightly informed, the Czar will lose no time in proclaiming a general amnesty, and in promising reforms, but without knowing anything precise as to their nature and extent. I believe I am not far wrong in stating that they will not be of that broad and thoroughly liberal character which Western Europe recommends, though the cruelty and tyranny which have ruled of Russia, in Poland, during the last two years, will not probably be resorted to for some time to come. We are promised a debate on the subject in the Senate for Sunday next, and M. Billault will probably be instructed to state what the public are to consider as the official views on the subject. Prince Napoleon is also expected to deliver a speech which many people will consider as more important, as the disclosures of the minister sans portefeuille.

All the attention that the public could spare from the contemplation of the unequal struggle in Poland, has been engrossed by the state of affairs in America. It is stated that M. Drouyn de Lhuys, has addressed to the representative of the United States here a very stiff note on the inconceivable report of Mr. Seward to the Federal Congress, relative to M. Mercier's trip to Richmond, and it is believed that the last mail from Liverpool has taken out instructions to M. Mercier to return to Europe en congé unless an immediate and suitable apology is not offered by the "United States" Government.

The despatch of Mr. Seward in answer to the proposal of M. Drouyn de Lhuys has taken no one by surprise. The Federal Secretary of State has accustomed the public on this side of the Atlantic at least, not to expect in any despatches from his pen anything like a fair, honest, or candid exposition of any subject on which he volunteers to enlighten the world. So much perverseness, ignorance, and so much offensive misrepresentation is characteristic of a falling cause.

As an illustration of the drooping hopes of the Northerners, I may mention that the Northern colony here, who but a very few months ago were confidently relying on "whipping" all their opponents before the year was over, now consider it a great feather in their cap that "Lincoln is not turned out yet." It is satisfactory to find that they can be thankful for small mercies, and it is to be hoped they will bear with becoming resignation the announcement which is daily expected to appear in the Moniteur.

The Revue Contemporaine contains in its new number, a paper on the raising of Charleston and Galveston blockades, from the pen of M. Hautefeuille. He lays down as utterly illegal the seizure so frequently practised, of ships twelve miles off shore, four miles being the utmost limit to which the right of blockade can be extended. He states, in short, that the Federal Government might as well maintain the legality of seizing ships at the mouth of the Seine or the Mersey, as hold up as lawful the blockade of the Southern ports, such as it has existed since the commencement of the war.

THE SECOND SIEGE OF VICKSBURG.

The Jackson Mississippian gives, from an officer of high position, an interesting account of the second siege of Vicksburg. The following is extracted from it:—

Our commander acted vigorously on the information he brought, and expecting the landing of the combined forces of the enemy on the Yazoo, every effort possible to be made with our resources was resorted to. As was foretold, in a few days the Yankee fleet of some thirty-four gunboats and rams, and about eighty transports, appeared near the mouth of the Yazoo, in sight of the "City of the Hills." The following day at 1 o'clock, the gunboats of the enemy had cautiously felt their way to the raft at Snyder's Bluff, about ten miles from the mouth of the Yazoo. There they found a battery, which opened fire, admonishing them that their future progress would be contested with vigour. The enemy threw a few shells and retired. In the meantime the transports had landed about 8000 troops on the Louisiana shore, who proceeded down to the railroad, opposite the city and destroyed the bridges and otherwise rendered the road unavailable, cutting off our communication in that channel with the salt mines of Lake Bienville, which were at that time supplying about 5000 bushels of salt daily to the Confederacy.

Failing to reach any considerable force in their operations, they landed a large body of troops, estimated at 50,000, on the Yazoo, at the plantations of Mrs. Lake, Captain Johnson, and Colonel Blake. These forces proceeded through the forest to the hills which extend along the southern border of the swamp from the point at Snyder's to a distance of two or three miles below Vicksburg, varying in distance from the Yazoo River from two to five miles, as the meandering of the stream may direct its course. The bluffs are generally quite regular, running from north-east to south-west, affording a beautiful view of the bottom, which is interspersed with lakes, and the smoke ascending through the tree tops from the Yankee camp fires.

Four days in succession the enemy, having advanced to the outskirts of the woods, kept up a continued fire on our lines under the bluffs, embracing most of the distance from Snyder's to the Indian Mound, only four and a half miles above Vicksburg, and at last it was evident they had thrown a large force near the centre, with a view of breaking it and coming in the rear of Vicksburg.

When General Lee discovered their supposed intention, he ordered the light artillery to be in readiness, and withdrew the infantry from the advance line of rifle pits to others at the foot of the bluffs. This had the desired effect of drawing out the enemy from the cover of the woods. Most admirably did the Illinois, Missouri, Indiana, and Kentucky troops (300 strong) advance upon our small force. Our brave troops were admonished to hold their fire until the enemy was in short musket range, but their ardour was such, remembering the insults and sufferings endured in their prisons, that patience seemed no longer a virtue, and when within 175 yards the 3rd and 30th Tennessee directed a deadly fire on the foe. The artillery then shared in the engagement on both sides. The enemy advanced gallantly to within fifty yards of our rifle pits, when the well-directed fire of our artillery became so rapid, in connection with our infantry, that the lines were broken and the enemy began a precipitate retreat for the woods. The pits could contain our infantry no longer, and they rushed upon the enemy, killing and capturing as they advanced, until they were lost in the woods, where the fight ended, our men bringing out prisoners even there. Thus closed the fight at Chickasaw Bayou, at Smith's Bluff, on Monday last, the enemy being completely routed, many prisoners captured, and some 1200 killed, wounded, and missing.

An informal flag of truce was sent by the enemy, and our sharpshooters fired upon the troops, who were ostensibly upon the field to take off the dead and wounded, but who undertook first to obey an order to secure their artillery and small arms previous to caring for their own sufferers. It was while they were thus engaged in pillaging the field of our rightful inheritance, the spoils of war, that we fired on the vanquished foe. Our humane force then advanced to take care of their wounded, and they were in turn fired upon by their sharpshooters, when they withdrew with the few wounded they had collected. The wounded Yankees brought off by us express the belief that we were justified in firing on them, as they had no right to interfere with anything on the field.

The prisoners captured are good specimens of Western troops, and will compare favourably with our own in soldierly qualities. The greater portion are youthful in appearance, and it is to be regretted that those misguided Western men should be sacrificed on the altar of Abolitionism, at the base of the hills on the Agazoo, in a vain endeavour to take Vicksburg.

Should the present rains continue, the attack on our lines will be indefinitely postponed.

THE BATTLE OF FREDERICKSBURG,

13th December, 1862.

LISTS OF KILLED AND WOUNDED.

1ST SOUTH CAROLINA VOLUNTEERS.

DISTILLATION OF SPIRITS IN SOUTH CAROLINA.

The following order shows the determination of the Southern people to submit to any resolution for the better carrying on of the war:—

Headquarters, Commissary-General's Department, South Carolina, Columbia, January 8, 1863.

THE ACT OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY, ENTITLED

"An Act to suppress the undue distillation of Spirituous Liquors from the serial grains of this State," contains the following proviso, namely:

"That the Governor, if satisfactorily informed that a supply of spirits, which cannot be otherwise obtained, is absolutely necessary for medicinal purposes in this State, may contract with a proper number of responsible and skilled agents, in any one or more of the districts, to manufacture a limited quantity of pure spirits, at a limited and reasonable price, strictly for medicinal purposes, taking care that such proper disposition of the product is made as to secure its application alone to the purpose intended."

To enable the Governor to ascertain the quantity required for the above purpose, the physicians of the different districts in this State are requested to furnish to this department as early as practicable, a statement as to what supply of "pure spirits, which cannot be otherwise obtained, is absolutely necessary for medicinal purposes" in their respective districts for the present year.

It is requested that such steps be taken as that the statement shall represent the views of a majority of the practising physicians in each district.

By order of the Governor.

JOSEPH WALKER,

Commissary-General of South Carolina.

January 10.

GENERAL STUART IN THE TELEGRAPH BUSINESS.

The Richmond Whig.

We saw yesterday, at the office of the Southern Telegraph Company, in this city, the superior telegraphic operating instrument which General Stuart used in his late expedition to communicate with Quartermaster-General Meigs, at Washington. Since the Yankee papers have had a good deal to say about this achievement of our Virginia Cavalry, we append his letter to Dr. Morris, giving a correct statement of the capture.

Headquarters, January 6, 1863.

Dr. W. S. Morris, President Southern Telegraph Company, Richmond.

Sir—I have the honour to send, through the courtesy of Major John Pelham, my chief of artillery, an instrument captured at Burke's Station, Ohio and Alexandria Railroad, during my late expedition. I beg that you will accept it as a token of regard appropriate to your position. We surprised the operator, and my operator, Sheppard, took his place. I sat in the office some time while Sheppard read the wild alarms flashing over the wires about our operations, and ascertained the steps taken and the means at hand of resisting me, and then shaped my course accordingly.

Very respectfully,

Your obedient servant,

J. E. B. STUART,

Major General of Cavalry.

NÉGRÓ SPIES.—I have spoken of the knowledge among the rebels of our movements. It seems impossible to prevent their constant acquisition of contraband information. They are always forewarned and forearmed. A more speedy and correct channel of information is found in the persons of the dusky natives whom we have so affectionately taken to our bosoms. Their dug-outs and canoes ply between the hostile shores with the utmost regularity; and though we do sometimes by this means obtain a late secession paper or an important rebel item, the account in the long run has generally footed up more to their profit than to ours. General Hunter, I believe, is convinced of this, for he has ordered the seizure of all the dug-outs and flat-boats to be found, and is further arranging the details of a plan whereby the negroes may be isolated and rendered as harmless as possible to our cause.—Port Royal Correspondent of the New York Herald.

THE CONFEDERATE STATES' STEAMER FLORIDA.—The following is a correct list of the officers of the Confederate war steamer Florida:—

J. N. Maffitt, commanding, Georgia.

S. W. Averett, Lieutenant and Executive Officer, Virginia.

J. L. Hoole, Lieutenant, Alabama.

C. W. Read, Lieutenant, Mississippi.

S. G. Stone, Lieutenant, Alabama.

Garrington and Gratton, Surgeons.

— Lynch, Paymaster.

Midshipmen—R. S. Floyd, Georgia; George D. Bryan, Charleston, S. C.; G. T. Sinclair, Virginia; J. Dyke.

Engineers—J. Spidell, — Jackson, C. Quinn, E. H. Browne.

L. Vogel, Captain's Clerk.

William Wilson, Purser's Clerk.

C. Wyman, Master's Mate.—Charleston Mercury, Jan 24.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

Our friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed; that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any date, will be useful and acceptable presents.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives, or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognized at this office.

Our subscribers in the South will have their paper supplied through HENRY HOTZK, Esq., the Confederate States' Commercial Agent at London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

Subscription, 26s. per annum—post paid, 30s., payable in advance. All communications on business to be addressed, and Post-Office Orders made payable to, J. B. HOPKINS, 13, Bouverie-street, Fleet-street, London, E.C.

Agency at Liverpool: WM. KNOX, Secretary Southern Club, 55, Brown's-buildings.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, MARCH 5, 1863.

A Lull in the War.

The military news from America contains very little that is interesting or important. So far from there being any progress to record in the various expeditions which the North has now on hand, things seem to be rather going backward. The great crisis is again postponed, probably for some weeks. Charleston and Savannah are still safe; Vicksburg and Port Hudson as they were; and the only show of activity amongst the Federals is exhibited at New Orleans, where a new raid has been planned up the Bayou Tesche. This river, running out into the Gulf to the west of the Mississippi, winds its way through a series of lakes, impenetrable marshes, and sluggish bayous, and affords a refuge to a few small river steamers. The destruction of these, and of the towns on the banks, and the wholesale devastation of the adjacent country, are probably the only objects of the expedition; and it is marvellously illustrative of the mismanagement of the Federal armaments, that at a moment when General Banks needs all his strength for the passage of the Mississippi at Port Hudson, and when Farragut's flotilla is notoriously insufficient to blockade the mouths of the Mississippi, a considerable force has been detached upon an enterprise which can by no possibility effect the issue of the struggle, and is very likely to end in disaster. The last raid up the Bayou Tesche, under the command of General Weitzel, was signally unfortunate. The Federals were met everywhere with a deadly fire of rifles from the banks, to which they could make no response; they lost the two officers who led the attack; they found the passage barred by river obstructions, and were ultimately driven back with heavy losses. Of course the usual reports were put in circulation about the enemy being "flanked," and on the point of surrender; but the end was the return of the expedition to New Orleans. The new attack may succeed. Possibly General Banks may have determined to reap an easy victory on the Bayou Tesche, and as the Confederate force in the neighbourhood does not exceed some two or three thousand men, he may be able to announce a great triumph. But if the Federals ascend the Bayou Tesche to its source, they will have accomplished nothing; whilst the strength they will waste, the lives they will sacrifice in this isolated movement, might have decided a doubtful battle on the Mississippi, where the fate of the Union has to be fought out. It is rumoured, indeed, that a portion of Banks's army has already been defeated near Port Hudson, and we shall not be surprised to find the rumour confirmed. Banks is no soldier. He is, perhaps, as incompetent a commander as any in the Federal service; but he has a certain amount of dash, and it is by no means unlikely that, tired of waiting for Farragut's flotilla, he has ventured upon a forward movement by land. If he has done so, defeat is next to certain. An experienced commander, with the best troops in the world, might hesitate before committing his army to the interminable swamps that fringe Port Hudson, in the presence of an active and vigilant enemy fully aware of the advantages of his position. But when it is considered that Banks's qualifications for Major-General are such as might have obtained for him a Deputy Lieutenantcy in this country, but would certainly not have procured for him a Lieutenant-Colonelcy of militia, the danger of the army which he commands becomes obvious enough. If the Federals were as superior in every other respect as they are in numbers to the Confederates, what hope would there be for them, with Banks pitted against Johnstone?

In the meantime the Father of Rivers remains obstinate. He will not yield to M'Clermand's 5000 spades. His current rising and swelling every day, flows on to the ocean in its old course, and there is nothing left to the Federals but to risk another assault. The assault, however, is postponed, for weeks it is supposed. A great army of 65,000 men is to lie huddled up in close camps on the saturated soil of the Mississippi banks, preparing for an assault which will come too late for hundreds of them. There is no possibility of victualling them but from Memphis, and within a few miles of Memphis there is a large Confederate force. If Generals Van Dorn and Price are in strength sufficient to make a dash on Memphis and hold it for a few days M'Clermand's army will be in great straits. The North has throughout this war been so prodigal of treasure and of life, that the prospect of keeping this immense force idle for four or five weeks, a prey to the diseases incidental to the massing of great bodies of men in swampy camps, does not seem to cause any great alarm. But every day's delay adds to the strength of the South, and increases the difficulties of its opponents; and if the present inactivity amongst the Federals prevails much longer, the question will be, not how soon will Vicksburg fall, but what portion of M'Clermand's army will escape the Southern rifle and the swamp fever.

On the Atlantic coast the operations of the Federals are equally at a standstill. General Foster has gone back to Beaufort, leaving General Hunter in command of the army that is to act against Charleston, and the army of 65,000 men whose transports darkened the waters of Port Royal, is quietly reposing at Hilton Head after its fatiguing marches and countermarches in North Carolina. For the time the interest of the campaign in this quarter is centred on Roanoke Island. There the Confederates, in their turn, threaten to become the assailants, and the commander of the Federal troops stationed there has telegraphed for reinforcements. It will be remembered that Roanoke Island was the scene of one of the earliest Federal successes, and that some 3000 Confederates were captured there by a combined naval and military force. The folly of leaving troops in that isolated position was so apparent, that it might have been expected the Federals would have avoided it. But they seem to have learnt nothing from the experience of the war, and the next mail may bring us the information that the Federal garrison has been caught in a trap. Beyond the capture of the Federal troops, however, no advantage will accrue to the South. Roanoke Island can only be held by the power that has the command of the sea. But the danger of the Federal garrison is significant of the weakness of the Federal plan of campaign. Operating on very extended lines, and at many distant points, they are constantly exposing their communications to the enemy's attack. No sooner is an advantage gained at one spot than it is lost at another; and, at a critical moment, the most promising movements are paralyzed by the fact that, some hundred miles away its very basis of operations may be in peril, and its communications cut off. Thus whilst Northern armaments are preparing for a blow at Charleston or Savannah, the Federal hold upon North Carolina is jeopardized. Thus whilst Generals M'Clermand and Grant have united their forces before Vicksburg, Memphis is in danger, and whilst Rosecrans is massing his forces for an advance upon Eastern Tennessee, the Confederates are moving on his river communications, capturing his transports, and well-nigh recovering Fort Donelson. When General Grant left Memphis, striking southward to effect a junction with M'Clermand previously to the latest assault of Vicksburg, all was quiet in his rear. But the Confederates have an excellent cavalry and know how to use it. Scarcely had General Grant left Holly Springs than Forrest was at his heels, at the head of 2700 horse. Holly Springs was Grant's head-quarters and central depôt, guarded by 2000 troops, but a dashing charge of Confederate cavalry decided the affair. After a few shots the action was over, and Holly Springs, with its immense supplies of materiel, surrendered. Here is a list of the spoil: 1,800,000 cartridges, with other ordnance stores, including 5000 rifles, and 2000 revolvers, valued at $1,500,000; 100,000 suits of clothing and other quarter-masters' stores; 5000 barrels of flour returned at another million; $1,000,000 worth of medical stores and other indispensable articles to a marching army. With the exception of what could be made immediately available, all this materiel was delivered to the flame. This dashing exploit of Forrest has been rivalled by half-a-dozen equally brilliant raids by Morgan in Kentucky, and Stuart in Virginia and Maryland; and it is not impossible that to the frightful destruction of stores by Forrest's guerillas, the Confederates owe the inactivity of the Federal army in the South-West.

The present is evidently a breathing-time for both combatants; to use a pure sporting phraseology "they are sparring for wind." The North is not yet in a position to deliver its blow. The South will not take the initiative. But the crash of battle must come soon. The North cannot, without the risk of breaking up what remains of the Union, defer its final attempt to force the Mississippi. The South will hold it to the death; and when M'Clermand returns again from Vicksburg, the North-Western Confederacy, now a dim shadow, will be rapidly becoming a vigorous reality. There is no safety for the Lincoln Administration but in a great success in the South-West. We may be sure the South knows the crisis is at hand and will meet it with stern and bitter resolve. In the meantime the months most favourable to Northern enterprise are gliding by, and nothing is done. Within six weeks the nine months' men in the Federal ranks will be entitled to, and will assuredly claim, their discharge. How they are to be replaced we cannot see. Probably the Conscription Bill that has just passed is intended as a means to this end. It may be, like the letters of marque, a hint to Foreign Governments. We have no faith, however, in a conscription in the North. The men who resist drafting, and lay down their arms on the field of battle, may be made conscripts, but they will never be reliable soldiers.

The Motion of Lord Campbell.

It is believed that the correspondence between the Foreign Office and the Commissioner of the Confederate Government will shortly be laid before Parliament. It is probably for this reason that Mr. S. Fitzgerald has apparently withdrawn his notice of a motion for this correspondence, and that the projected motion of Lord Campbell has been so extended as to bring the whole subject of recognition under debate.

This motion, adjourned, owing to the indisposition of the noble lord, from Monday last to Thursday the 12th inst., has been very differently received and commented upon by the two principal Ministerial journals. The Times, which during the last session consistently sneered at every attempt, by whomsoever made, to bring the subject under Parliamentary attention, is consistent in this policy, and repeats the worn-out argument, or rather assertion, that any action on the part of this country would only embitter the American contest, and that all Parliamentary discussion of American affairs is therefore embarrassing and vexatious. The Post, on the other hand, not only declares such discussion proper and well-timed, but in an article, decidedly the best considered and best reasoned we have seen on this subject, lays down the true conditions of national independence, and the common sense principles of international recognition. Exposing, with much conciseness and lucidity, the fallacy of the "singular positions" occupied by the Minister of War, it says of the Confederate States: "They are ruled by a Government of their own choice, which makes laws, levies taxes, contracts loans, and wages war utterly unhampered by any foreign jurisdiction. The exercise of these several functions constitutes by international law what is considered sovereignty or independence."

The Post further says: "By national independence is meant the power of vindicating a nation's authority within its own confines, and not the power of enforcing respect beyond the limits of its territory;" and therefore justly argues that the blockade of their coasts, or the invasion of their frontiers, does not invalidate the title of the Confederate States to recognition. The Post is equally correct in stating the principles of international recognition, which it declares to be based upon usage and mutual convenience. Yet while we admit that international, like social recognition, may not in the abstract be demanded as a right, we would remind the Post that in the case of international, as of social recognition, refusal without good reason is usually and justly resented.

In treating of the obligation to recognize, our contemporary is not equally accurate when it remarks that the Confederacy had never before appeared in the eyes of the world as a sovereign State. Of the Confederacy, as such, this is doubtless true, but the Confederacy is nothing more than a compact of States, five of which had been before officially and by name recognized as sovereignties, viz., Virginia, the two Carolinas, Georgia, and Texas, and of the remaining States not so recognized by name, four,—viz., Kentucky, Tennessee, Alabama, and Mississippi—were at the time constituent parts of the others.

Passing this inaccuracy of language, the article of the Post is the most complete answer to the stereotyped objections of the advocates of delay. The Times and the Post concur that the minds of all intelligent classes in Europe are made up on the hopelessness of the Northern attempt to subjugate the unrecognized, but nevertheless independent nationality. The Times, from this, draws the lame and impotent conclusion that discussion is useless, and yet deprecates action. The Post, on the contrary, does not shrink from the irresistible logic of its own reasoning. It advises both full discussion and speedy action: "If," it asks, "European statesmen candidly believe that the Southern Confederacy has established its independence, then why should they not give practical effect to their convictions?" The Post shares our own often expressed belief, that the solemn protest of the principal maritime Powers against the further prosecution of the war, which recognition would imply, would carry with it a moral weight which could not be resisted by the North; and it concludes: "We have now witnessed a war of two years' duration, and it is really worth while to consider whether, by boldly giving effect to our opinions, we may not prevent the American nation continuing, during another twelvemonth, to sacrifice thousands of lives, and expend countless treasures, in the pursuit of an object which we know can never be attained."

We congratulate Lord Campbell upon having, in support of his motion, so emphatic an expression of Ministerial opinion, for as a reflex of such opinion the Post must be regarded as at least as reliable as the Times. We hope, though we will not permit ourselves to be sanguine, that this expression is but the forerunner of more direct and authoritative declarations in Parliament, and the announcement, at last, of a decided and decisive policy on the part of the Government. Lord Campbell, in his unsparing efforts to elicit such declaration, and impress upon the Government and the country the necessity of an early decision, has the cordial support and earnest good wishes of all who see in the recognition of the Confederate States the only practicable road to the much-desired peace.

The Marriage of the Prince.

Almost everything that can be said about the Royal wedding has been said, and in every form of words the hearty wishes of England for the welfare of the Prince of Wales and his affianced bride have already been expressed. Perhaps the most remarkable evidence of the interest taken in the event to be celebrated next Tuesday is the present aspect of the streets of London. We are not usually a demonstrative people, and we know not how to get up a pageant; but for all that, we are preparing a welcome for the Princess Alexandra that is worthy of the occasion and our greatness. The procession itself will not be much grander than a Lord Mayor's Show, and far less effective than an election procession in New York. The decorations are neither artistic nor imposing, and we expect that the illuminations will do more credit to the resources of the gas companies than to our taste. Yet the Princess will have a right royal welcome. The innumerable multitude that will throng the streets, the windows, and the balconies that are being erected in every available spot, not excluding our graveyards, will be a spectacle that needs not the adjuncts of art or organization to make it telling and impressive. And what makes the display intrinsically valuable, is that it is spontaneous. The crowds will not assemble or cheer to order. Men of all degrees and opinions will gather together to manifest the common sentiment of loyalty to the Throne and Constitution. Newly-crowned kings and young princes are always popular, because it is the generous habit of the masses to believe in the virtues of their rulers; but the popularity of the Prince of Wales and his bride is not without foundation and a steadfast hope of endurance. The heir to the throne owes much of the hearty goodwill of his countrymen to the constitutional and private virtues of the Queen; and from his excellent education, it is expected that he will follow the example of his parents, and merit the free love of a free people. His early marriage gives promise of the first gentleman in England emulating the domestic goodness of the Sovereign, and it will be of some immediate and practical benefit if it make early marriages fashionable.

The Prince of Wales occupies a unique position. Without being King, he will, owing to the widowhood of the Queen, be called upon to discharge not only many of the social functions of royalty, but also will assume many of the offices so ably discharged by the late Prince Consort. The time has long passed when it was necessary for the heir apparent to be in opposition to the Sovereign, so that both the great parties might be attached to the throne; for Queen Victoria is not the Sovereign of a party or a faction. By this means the Prince will learn the art of constitutional kingship, and be saved from that enforced idleness which with princes, as well as with other people, is sure to degenerate into vice. It is not unnatural that at this moment a comparison should be instituted between the last and present Princes of Wales, and that there should be great rejoicing that the eldest son of Queen Victoria is so much better than the eldest son of George III.; but whilst we cordially sympathize with this feeling, it is but fair and reasonable to remember that George IV. had none of the advantages enjoyed by his great-nephew. George III. was neither a wise king nor a judicious father. The tutors of his son were selected for political considerations, and provided that son learnt a little Latin and less Greek, his Majesty did not trouble himself about moral culture and discipline. When George IV. came to man's estate, and, indeed, before that, he was his own master, with nothing to guide him but the corrupt counsels of corrupt flatterers. He may be said to have started in life with a heavy load of debt, for he became involved before he could learn the folly of such a course; and when he married it was not from affection, or even a desire to be married, but in order to relieve himself of pecuniary embarrassments. The father was a partisan, and the son could not but follow the paternal example, and so, when he became Prince Regent he was, to all intents and purposes, the titular leader of a party. Above all, the manners of the people were different. Whether we are so much better than our fathers we will not discuss, but certain it is that they were tolerant of open drunkenness, gambling, and profligacy; whereas such conduct would now be utterly repudiated. George IV., Fox, and Sheridan, would be impossible in this day. At present, if men are rakes at heart, they must, at least, assume the guise of virtue. Princes, though exercising a considerable influence, reflect rather than foster the virtue and vice of their generation. We are glad that the Prince of Wales has had such excellent opportunities and that he has profited by them. It is a matter of congratulation that he starts in life free from the taint of debt, and with means ample to maintain his royal state, but not so ample as to encourage extravagant display—sufficient to prevent parsimony, but not sufficient to render judicious economy unnecessary. Beyond all, the Prince of Wales is fortunate in forming an alliance with a lady who brings to her high position the habits engendered by a careful, domestic, and even secluded education, and whom he weds for affection's sake, and not merely as a state necessity. He, at least, has suffered no inconvenience from the provisions of the Royal Marriage Act.

The national prayer, "God bless the Prince of Wales and his bride," is unfeigned, and notwithstanding the uncertainty of the future, which teaches us to call no man happy until he is dead, it is reasonable and right to anticipate that the fair prospect is not delusive, and that the Royal couple will be blessed and a blessing.

Mr. Seward's Despatch.

The reply of Mr. Lincoln's Secretary of State to the French proposal is a phenomenon in diplomacy, which has surprised even those who had long ceased to wonder at anything emanating from Northern American politicians. In the wildest arrogance of hierarchical presumption, no incumbent of the See of Rome ever more recklessly issued his commands over, and disposed of, realms and their populations, than this modern high-priest of a moribund Democracy. It would be ridiculous to enter on a serious refutation of the preposterous assertions of this extraordinary document. As well might one apply the rules of logic to the chatter of the harmless lunatic who fancies his cell a palace and himself the arbiter of nations. But the contrast between Mr. Seward's official fictions and the actual facts is so suggestive and instructive that we are tempted to institute the comparison in at least one or two points.

We will first notice Mr. Seward's remarks on the progress of the Federal arms, and the present area of Confederate States. We do not dispute the assertion that the Lincoln Government is still confident of an early and complete triumph, because some men are so constituted that they always believe what they wish. And we do not dispute the announcement that Mr. Lincoln and his advisers are contented with their military achievements, for it may be that there are persons who have the idiosyncrasy that appertains to a certain species of dogs, who rather like to be beaten and kicked. We propose to deal only with the extravagant fictions which Mr. Seward sets forth as facts. He says that the Confederacy now retains "only the States of Georgia, Alabama, and Texas, with half of Virginia, half of North Carolina, two-thirds of South Carolina, half of Mississippi, and one-third respectively of Arkansas and Louisiana;" and further, that the United States' forces "hold even this in close blockade and siege." One fact will be sufficient to dispose of the last allegation. Mr. Seward talks of a small territory, held in close blockade and siege, yet the Southerner can travel on a continuous line of railroad from Richmond to Mobile, a distance of 1000 miles, without molestation, and without seeing the face of the enemy. With regard to his assertions about the States, it will be sufficient to remark that the only part of Virginia in possession of the Federal is the Western district; that they now hold no more of North Carolina than is covered by their forces on the coast; that their only footing in South Carolina is the military possession of certain points occupied for the purpose of making their long-threatened and still postponed attack on Charleston; that in Mississippi the only foothold of the Federals is the ground occupied by part of the army of Rosecrans, and that they have not even military possession of one-third of Louisiana, or of Arkansas. The Northern invader has not in any degree penetrated into the interior of the Confederacy; all his gains are on the borders of the States, where gunboats could co-operate with land forces; and beyond the range of safe and expeditious retreat to the shelter of their gunboats, in case of need, the Federal forces have not advanced. The most costly and persistent effort of the North has been to effect the capture of Richmond, which is only 180 miles distant from Washington. What has been the result? The invader has been beaten over and over again, and hurled back, crushed and bleeding, on the Federal frontier. It is wonderful, considering the resources of the North, and their lavish expenditure of men and money, that they should not have been able to have penetrated at one or more points into the Confederate States; but that they have not done so is as certain and palpable as that Queen Victoria is not the ruler of France. Let Chinese statesmen confess that, in the conception and enunciation of a concrete lie, the Minister of Mr. Lincoln is infinitely their superior. The imagination of the Minister of the Son of the Moon is dull and prosy compared to the imagination of Mr. Seward.

Let us now glance at Mr. Seward's description of the Confederates, and of what he is pleased to call the rebellion. He says: "We have an insurrectionary party, which is located and is chiefly adjacent to the shores of the Gulf of Mexico; and we have, on the other hand, a loyal people who constitute not only Northern States, but Eastern, Middle, Western, and Southern States." And he adds that Maryland, Virginia, Kentucky, Tennessee, and Missouri "are already represented in Congress," and that "representatives have been sent from Louisiana, and others are understood to be coming from Arkansas." He likewise refers to the "loyal people in the insurrectionary States." We had supposed that we had heard the last of the well-worn pretence of Union sentiment in the South. Where is the evidence of it? Did the brutal pro-consul of Mr. Lincoln find it in New Orleans? Is it discoverable in the sacrifices that the Southerners have made, the hardships they have endured, and the heroism they have manifested to save their country from the yoke of the North? Is it discernible in the loathing which the women and children of the South have evinced whenever the fortune of war has brought them into contact with the Federal soldiery? Is it a proof of Union sentiment that when Mr. Lincoln threatened them with a servile insurrection if they did not return to the Union before the first day of the present year, that not one man in the whole South was terrified by the threat, or, if believing Mr. Lincoln could execute his fell purpose, was so base as to purchase the security of his slave property at the cost of his nation's independence? Mr. Seward boasts of the Border States being represented in the Federal Congress. What are the facts? The Legislature of Maryland—elected under military control, for it will be remembered that Mr. Lincoln arrested the members that were elected freely—has sent Senators to Washington. By Virginia, Mr. Seward means the counties comprised in the Western district, now in military occupation. And with regard to Kentucky, Tennessee, and Missouri—especially with the two last-named States—Senators have been elected by bogus Legislatures—the creatures of military power. So far as Louisiana and Arkansas are concerned, in the districts occupied by Federal troops, candidates for the Federal House of Representatives may have been found, but who no more represent those districts than do the generals of the invading armies; but in neither of those States have the Federals been able to organize sham Legislatures for the purpose of electing sham Senators. On the other hand, all the States composing the Southern Confederacy are fully represented in the Confederate Senate. During the war the functions of the State Governments and the electoral rights of the people have been duly exercised, and the Confederate Congress is the representative of the will of the people of the Confederate States.

In short, what Mr. Seward calls an insurrectionary party is the whole people of the South, differing widely on many political questions, freely expressing their differences, unrestrainedly canvassing the acts of the Confederate Government, but with unparalleled unanimity upholding the independence of the Confederate States. It would be as reasonable and quite as true to say that the millions of Englishmen who are loyal to their Queen and Constitution are an insurrectionary party, and that the leader of the Cabbage Garden Revolt truly represented the national sentiment.

Mr. Seward pretends that secession was instigated by the personal ambition of the leading men of the South. He says: "Any commissioner who should be appointed by those actors, or through their dictation or influence, must enter the conferences imbued with the spirit, and pledged to the personal fortunes of the insurgent chiefs." The chiefs were not in the foremost rank of the Secessionists. They clung to the Union as long as it was honourable or possible for them to do so. At the outset of secession they obeyed the voice of the people. If they had loved power more than honour, and had forgotten the call of patriotism for the sake of ambition, the leaders of the South would have opposed secession to the end. Would not these men, if the Union had been preserved, have exercised governmental influence in thirty-three States; and is it a proof of personal ambition that they have elected to serve thirteen States? When the officers of the army and navy threw up their commissions in the United States' forces was it an evidence of personal ambition they elected to serve thirteen instead of thirty-three States? If it were true that secession was a mere conspiracy of the Southern leaders, and that they were personally ambitious, the Lincolnites would have been ousted long ere this, for if President Davis and his Government would accept the Presidency and control of the whole of the late Union, there is no doubt about their being received gladly by the Northern people.

Mr. Seward says that the United States is contending for "the free and common navigation of the Rio Grande, Missouri, Arkansas, Mississippi, Ohio, St. Lawrence, Hudson, Delaware, Potomac, and other national highways." Does Mr. Seward forget that the St. Lawrence is at least as much British as it is American, and that the Rio Grande is as much Mexican as American? And if a diversity of nationalities is not incompatible with the free and common navigation of those rivers, why should it be incompatible with the free and common navigation of the Mississippi? So far from threatening the free navigation of the Mississippi, the establishment of the Confederate States is a guarantee of its inviolability.

We have now done with Mr. Seward's ultra-Chinese despatch. The Governments of Europe have too long believed the report of this unscrupulous romancer. After this last specimen of what we must call his impertinent mendacity, it will surely be culpable folly if they pay any regard to his representations.

The Law of Libel.

We confess we are not able to define the law of libel, and that, like our brethren of the press, we trust for our protection more to the general good sense of juries than to the law itself. True, in actions for libel, the verdict is generally given against a newspaper; but, considering the avocation of the journal, that it is a kind of personal impersonality, ready to detect and expose every little rent in men's coats, it is no wonder that jurymen should be a little prejudiced, and sometimes give a verdict that appears to the members of the press somewhat opposed to the evidence. Besides, an action for libel never harms a journal, and though costs and damages come rather heavy, it is but fair that the press should now and then pay a fine for the liberty it enjoys. It does no commercial good to a paper which, like the Saturday Review, has an enormous circulation, and is a leading representative of the Fourth Estate, but a journal languishing in obscurity may be at least temporarily galvanized to the paying point by a good action for libel.

Our contemporary, the Saturday Review, like most independent censors, has plenty of enemies. A reputation is often enhanced by newspaper attacks, but no one was ever benefitted by an attack in the Saturday Review. Its weapons are highly polished, and it has an unkind habit of making its thrusts at vulnerable places. It would not so much matter if it would now and then hit at random, but it is obstinately determined never to draw a bow at a venture. Its fools' caps are so skilfully adjusted that all the world can see how admirably they fit the persons for whom they are intended. No doubt the antipathy of the Saturday Review to humbug is almost a morbid passion, and that sometimes it applies the lash unmercifully; but, on the whole, its censoriousness is so independent of persons and of parties that no one can complain of its partiality. We cannot recall the name of a single eminent public man who has not at one time or other been punished by our contemporary.

We do not propose to trouble our readers with an account of the cause of Campbell v. Spottiswoode. As far as we can glean, it seems that assuming "Thomas Thompson" and "an Old Soldier" to be myths, was an error; but we submit not a very unnatural one. If Dr. Campbell published letters flattering to himself or his scheme, it did look a little suspicious. We teach the children in our national schools to lip "self-praise is no recommendation;" but the Saturday Review was wrong, for "Thomas Thompson" and "an Old Soldier" are actualities, and put in an appearance at Guildhall. This, as the Lord Chief Justice said, is the least part of the libel complained of. The important matter was that Dr. Campbell wrote a series of what he was pleased to call "Chinese Letters," one of which was addressed to her Majesty, and which appeared in a newspaper with which he was connected, and, as we understand, the Rev. Doctor wished, for the purpose of aiding in the conversion of 400 millions of Chinese, the papers containing the letters to be widely circulated. Commenting on the facts, the Saturday Review observed: "To spread the knowledge of the Gospel in China would be a good and an excellent thing, and worthy of all praise and encouragement; but to make such a work a mere pretext for puffing an obscure newspaper into circulation, is a most scandalous and flagitious act, and it is this act, we fear, we must charge against Dr. Campbell. Buy the letters, and save the heathen." The jury returned a verdict of £50 for the plaintiff, at the same time finding specially "that the writer in the Saturday Review believed his imputations to be well founded."

This special finding gives a wide interest to the case. Why did the jury think the Saturday Reviewer believed his imputation? They did not know the writer, and therefore it could not be from any faith in his character. We presume they arrived at this conclusion because, whilst crediting the uprightness of Dr. Campbell's motives, they thought his conduct was calculated to induce a public writer to put an unfavourable construction on them. If this view is correct, we contend the verdict ought to be set aside, for if a writer may not draw such inferences from admitted facts that even a jury thinks he may conscientiously, though erroneously, deduce, then the liberty of the press is fearfully contracted. It is very unimportant whether the Saturday Review pays the £50 and costs, but it is all-important that freedom of discussion should not be stifled by such a construction of the law of libel. If we must not impute what we believe, there is an end of criticism. The Rev. Dr. Campbell would not, if this had been the rule, have been permitted to publish his "Letters to the Prince Consort."

We have succeeded in turning up these letters, which were published in a volume in 1861. The title of this volume—which Dr. Campbell says "embodies an idea of astounding magnitude and incalculable importance"—is "The Conquest of England: Letters to the Prince Consort on Popery, Puseyism, Neology, Infidelity, and the Aggressive Policy of the Church of Rome;" and even this does not embrace the entire contents of the book, for in Letter 46, Doctor Campbell falls foul of the proprietors of the Crystal Palace.

These gentlemen, it seems, did not deem it enough that the Palace had been filled with figures of naked human beings, eminently calculated to endanger moral purity—an act by which many of "the excellent of the earth" were filled with disgust and indignation.

And further on, the Rev. Doctor adds:—

The wonder is that the heads of Christian households can reconcile it to their consciences to conduct their families within the precincts of a place so eminently fitted to debase, degrade and destroy! Such is the place which the proprietors of the Crystal Palace, in 1858, were resolutely bent on throwing open on the Sabbaths of God to three millions of human beings.

From these extracts our readers will understand that the perusal of the work of one "of the excellent of the earth" has afforded us much amusement. It is not witty, nor humorous, nor even funny, but it is intensely grotesque. We have never before met with such a hash of fanatical twaddle, brazen-faced impudence, and wordy balderdash. In the preface we are told that the editor of the British Ensign proposed to raise a fund for the gratuitous circulation of 100,000 copies of the numbers of the paper containing these letters. The proposal met with a prompt and a noble response. It is to both editor and publisher a source of supreme gratification to find that these epistles, including the copies sold, have been put into the hands of some 350,000 persons, of every grade in society, situated mainly in benighted localities, and perused by probably upwards of one million people.

Is it allowable for us to assume that the publisher was commercially glad? Our own experience of publishers would lead us to suppose so; but, perhaps, we have not met with any of "the excellent of the earth," and we admit that so benighted is our locality that until the trial of "Campbell v. Spottiswoode" we had not read "The Conquest of England."

The Rev. Doctor does not inform the benighted world whether he sent the letters to the Prince before he published them. We presume not, yet there is an air of reality about the details. In the first letter Dr. Campbell writes: "Certain political views of the subject must be reserved for another communication, which I hope to have the honour of addressing to your Royal Highness this day fortnight." Was this intended to allay the possible anxiety of the Prince for another communication, or as a dramatic aside to the readers of the Ensign that on such and such a day another letter would appear? We also notice in several of the letters an intimation of the subject of the next epistle. Were these hints intended as a whet to the appetites of the readers of the Ensign, or for the information of the Prince?

At page 165 Dr. Campbell, who is down on the University of Oxford, writes: "In the meantime I would apprise the British people, through your Royal Highness, &c." If the benighted British public were to be enlightened through the Prince Consort why did Dr. Campbell publish his letters in the Ensign? Besides, the Rev. Doctor evidently thought the Prince himself wanted a little enlightenment. In Letter 2 he suggests, with unwonted humility: "Your Royal Highness may have fallen upon the works of Lord Bolingbroke." At page 78 he is good enough to inform the Prince that, "The University of Oxford is not one, but a number of colleges. * * * The University is a corporate body, &c., &c." Yet the Doctor seems to have had a hazy idea that the Prince he was gratuitously instructing was responsible for everybody and everything. At page 233 he writes:—

Will your Royal Highness permit me to ask what Mr. Wilson's Diocesan is about? How that Prelate can reconcile it to his conscience to permit such things, is to me incomprehensible.

We will conclude with one or two extracts from this heavy, nondescript, yet racy volume, which, in our humble opinion, would be libels, if they were not impotent impudence, and supremely ridiculous.

Page 23. The conversion of the heir apparent is the point on which the Vatican has set its heart. Page 52: The alarming fact stated some time ago by Cardinal Wiseman without contradiction, and now again circulated, that, when in Switzerland, the Prince of Wales expressed himself in favour of the Church of Rome. Page 59: The conduct of the Prince since his return (from Rome) I regret to say, has been such as to aggravate the fears of judicious Protestants. It was not without concern that they read in the public prints that the Prince of Wales had presented to the "Holy Father" a present, value £50,000. They were quite at a loss to comprehend the reasons of it; many of them ventured to think and say that so large a portion of the hard-earned money of England might have been expended on a far worthier object.

We will not reproduce any of the impertinent comments on the Prince's residence at Oxford, or his visit to Canada, but we contend that there is an unwarrantable imputation of motives in the above clerical demagogism, and whatever may have been the motive of Dr. Campbell, and however much he and his publisher may rejoice, most persons will think, and some public writers might say, that ignorantly, vulgarly, and impudently to malign the Protestantism of the heir to the throne, was a scandalous and flagitious act.

THE MILITARY STRENGTH OF THE SOUTH.—The number of white males in the Confederate States between 18 and 45 years of age, liable to conscription, exclusive of Maryland, Missouri, Kentucky, and Delaware, is 1,118,000. Between the ages of 18 and 40, now called for, there are over 900,000 men, exclusive of the Border States. Deducting 200,000 sick and disabled from this number, we still have 700,000 men in and preparing for the field. The slaves of the South will supply us with food if every man capable of bearing arms should be called to the field.—Southern Paper.

THE ASCENDENCY OF THE FEDERALISTS.

The accession of the Republican—or as they were more generally called the Democratic—party to power altered, and, indeed, seemed in many cases almost to reverse, the attitude of the contending parties in regard to a considerable number of important political questions. The Federalists had always, as aforesaid, been the upholders of the rights of the central Government, which they were disposed to carry beyond the strict limits imposed by the Constitution. But now that they saw a Democrat, and a Democrat for whom they entertained a profound and perhaps well-grounded distrust, in the Presidential chair, they began to take a somewhat different view; they were inevitably in opposition, and, accordingly, were not likely to assert strongly the rights of an authority with which they were in conflict. Again, they were not only in opposition, but they were also in a decided minority in both Houses; and therefore were fain to cling to every doctrine that gave them a chance of making a successful resistance to their opponents. On the other hand, the extreme jealousy with which the Democrats had always regarded the encroachments, real or supposed, of the Federal authority naturally abated when that authority came into their own hands. They did not think it necessary to watch cautiously for any undue stretch of power, any infringement of the sovereign prerogatives of the States, by Jefferson, the extreme upholder of State rights. Accordingly, we sometimes find the Federalists and the Democrats taking exactly the opposite course to that which would have accorded with their doctrines and their antecedents. The struggle of parties for the next twenty years—that is, until the Federalists ceased to exist as a party—was rather a war for persons than for principles. This tendency was aggravated by the conduct of the President—conduct which suggests a suspicion that his previous advocacy of extreme anti-Federalist views was rather the policy of an ambitious man than the sincere advice of a political philosopher. He required for the Union the territory of Louisiana, and acquired it under circumstances, and on conditions that were afterwards alleged to impose obligations which neither Congress nor the President had any right to undertake. He, moreover, began that system of removals from office without cause which was afterwards carried to such a pitch of extravagance by Jackson and his successors; alleging in excuse that his predecessors had only appointed Federalists, and that he did but restore the balance of power. As only twelve years had elapsed since the formation of the Constitution, and as the great majority of offices were filled before the organization of parties, this excuse can hardly be accepted. It would be difficult to deny that Jefferson did that which he believed to be for the interest of the country; it would be unjust to doubt that his administration was on the whole just, prudent, and successful; but it would be absurd to attribute to it any consistency with his previous Democratic professions.

During his first term of office arose one of the first difficulties on any question distinctly connected with slavery. The territory north of the Ohio had been ceded to the Union by the State of Virginia, on the express condition that slavery should not be legalized there. Several citizens of the territory which afterwards became the State of Indiana, attempted to induce Congress to repeal the ordinance which carried this treaty into effect. In 1803 a Committee of the House reported against the repeal. In 1804 another Committee reported in favour of a partial and temporary toleration of slavery in Indiana. In 1806 a third Committee reported in similar terms; and in 1807 a fourth reached the same conclusion. In the same year a Committee of the Senate reported "That it is not expedient at this time to suspend the sixth article of compact"—the article inhibiting slavery—"for the Government of the territory of the United States, north-west of the River Ohio." And here the subject dropped. By this time all the States north of Mason and Dixon's line, had taken measures to abolish slavery within their frontiers. Since that time no State has followed the example.

Jefferson's re-election was almost unanimous, so far as the Electoral Colleges were concerned; a fact which shows the comparative insignificance into which the Federal party had sunk in the eight years which had elapsed since the election of Adams. They had only seven senators, and twenty-five members of the House of Representatives; and though they continued for some time longer regularly to nominate candidates for the Presidency, and to hold together as a party, they never again became formidable.

The boldest exercise of the Federal power that history records occurred during the Presidency of Jefferson, and was made the subject of a long and obstinate party contest. Napoleon's famous decrees excluding the English from every Continental port, and confiscating English merchandise, provoked the retaliation which the British Government inflicted by the Orders in Council of 1807, forbidding all trade with the parts from which British shipping was excluded. Of course the right of issuing such orders was exceedingly questionable. As a retaliation upon France, they were perfectly justified; but inasmuch as they struck at all neutral Powers in order to strike at France, it can hardly be wondered that the neutrals, and the United States as the most important of neutral nations, were exceedingly indignant at such an invasion of their right of trade with ports not actually blockaded. There was a general feeling in favour of resenting by arms the pretensions of England. Mr. Jefferson, however, like both his predecessors, was honestly and wisely anxious to avoid war. The leaders of the Revolution knew much better than did the people how great was the power of England, and how very small a fraction of her strength had been put forth against the revolted colonies. They remembered, too, if the people did not, that even that fraction of her strength might have proved too great for them, but for the aid of France. England was now stronger than ever, and France was powerless except on the Continent of Europe. War would therefore be imprudent; more, it would be of doubtful justice. Admitting, as we must now admit, that England was quite wrong in point of law, still it could hardly be contended that she was bound to submit quietly to the illegal conduct of her enemy; and American statesmen saw and made allowance for her embarrassments, which the American people could not be expected to do. We must allow that the conduct of the immediate successors of Washington towards foreign countries generally, and towards England in particular, was eminently wise and fair, when compared with that of the successors of Andrew Jackson. But we are concerned with the party rather than with the national aspects of that policy. Determined, if possible, to avoid a collision, and knowing that if American vessels were illegally made prizes by British cruisers in pursuance of the Orders in Council it would be almost impossible to restrain the people from war, Jefferson recommended to Congress a measure intended to prevent all possibility of such untoward event, though at a heavy cost to American commerce. He recommended an embargo precluding all American vessels from leaving port. It might have been expected that the Federalists would be the only supporters of so extreme an exercise of the authority of Congress. It might have been expected that every Democrat would have given his vote against it. But the case was exactly the reverse. Quoting from a reliable authority, the author of "Parties and their Principles," says:—

The Bill for laying an embargo passed the Senate 22 yeas and 6 nays, and was carried in the House 82 to 44. On looking at the yeas and nays, I notice the name of one gentleman, at that time holding his seat as a Federalist, who voted for the embargo—and one also, so regarded as a "Democrat," who voted against it.

Perhaps there never was a more strict drawing of the lines between parties than on this occasion. It was the great point or "landmark" of Mr. Jefferson's Administration, involving in its practice the whole of his theory in favour of peace, and in opposition to war. But it rekindled the old fire of party. He that was for the embargo, was a Democrat, he that was against it a Federalist. It was a wall between the parties, to be seen, and almost felt [with the hand (so strong was it)], in every State, city, county, town, village, or hamlet of the United States, and in every class and condition of the people, "high or low, rich or poor." It was the touchstone of principle.

As Jefferson, following Washington's example, declined to be put in nomination for a third term of office, the choice of a majority of the Democratic party fell on James Madison, of Virginia, Jefferson's Secretary of State. The other Democratic candidate was James Monroe, also of Virginia. The Federalists made a nomination, but their candidate only received forty-seven electoral votes, to 122 for Madison. Congress had substituted what was called a "Non-intercourse Act," for the embargo; and this policy of commercial self-sacrifice in order to avoid war, was the ground on which the battle for the Presidency was fought. Mr. Erskine, the British Minister, attempted a compromise, but was disavowed by his own Government, and the hostile feeling towards England was thereby increased.

In 1811 the Bank, established by Hamilton, expired; Congress having refused to renew its charter. The two Houses were very nearly divided, and the probability is that, but that for the fact that the Bank was chiefly under the direction of Federalists, and that the President had opposed its original foundation, the renewal would have been granted. As it was, the Bill was lost by one vote in the House, and by the casting vote of Vice-President Clinton in the Senate. Henry Clay was one of the chief speakers against the Bill. In the next Congress he was elected Speaker of the House; a choice which marked the ascendancy of that section of the Democratic party which was urgent for war with England. Yielding, it is said, to the temptation held out by the prospect of re-election, and against the better judgment of himself and his confidential advisers, Mr. Madison consented to declare war with England; a course in which Mr. Monroe, his successor, and now his Secretary of State, seems to have fully concurred. Nor are we sure that Mr. Madison was wrong. A war with England was not prudent, and would probably have been disastrous, had England acted with vigour and good sense. But it must not be forgotten that England had very sorely tried the temper of the American people. Acting on her own municipal law of impressment, she had asserted the right of seizing English seamen on board American vessels; and, as was natural, her officers sometimes made a mistake, and seized American-born citizens. It was hardly to be expected that the United States should endure this, especially from the Power to which, of all in the world, they were least kindly disposed; nor do we think that it was their duty to endure it. Unless redress could have been obtained without war, we do not know that peace was any longer possible. However, there was a strong opposition in both branches of Congress to the declaration of war.

The measure was adopted in the House by a vote of 79 to 48, but was delayed in the Senate for fourteen days after it was submitted to that body, when it finally passed 19 to 13. At first it was evident that the majority was against the war; and a proposition was made, on which the Senate was equally divided on the first vote, for granting reprisals against the commerce of Great Britain, by public or private ships of the United States; but after several days of disciplining and urging, a majority voted in favour of it. Of the seventy-nine members of the House who voted for the war, sixty-two resided south, seventeen north of the Delaware; of the nineteen senators who voted on the same side, fourteen resided south, and five north of the Delaware. Thus the war may be said to have been a measure of the South and West to take care of the interest of the North, much against the will of the latter. The whole number of members residing north of the Delaware was sixty-eight, of whom only twenty-one voted for the war.

The Act declaring war was approved on the 18th of June, 1812.

The Federalists, who had been strongly opposed to the war, supported Dr. W. H. Clinton, the nominee of the New York Democrats, as their candidate for the Presidency; but he received only eighty-nine votes to 128 for Madison. In the 13th Congress, which assembled in December, 1813, the Federalists had sixty-eight representatives out of 182, and nine Senators out of thirty-six.

In 1814 occurred what has been called the first secession movement—the Convention of Delegates from the New England States at Hartford. The actual steps taken by that Assembly do not seem to have involved any infringement of the Constitution. It proposed an application to the Federal Government for permission to New England to provide for her own defence,—that is, virtually, to stand aloof from the war—and recommended the Legislatures of the States to take measures for separate defence; a scheme which almost implied secession, but abstained, with great cunning, from expressing any illegal intention by the saving clause requiring an application to the Federal Government. The Convention also recommended several amendments to the Constitution, limiting the powers of Congress in reference to measures of hostility, and requiring the concurrence of two-thirds of both Houses in an interdiction of trade or a declaration of war; abolishing the representation of slaves, prohibiting the reelection of a President. The sting of the resolutions, however, lay in the threat implied in the last of the string.

Resolved, That if the application of these States to the Government of the United States, recommended in a foregoing resolution, should be unsuccessful, and peace should not be concluded and the defence of these States should be neglected, as it has been since the commencement of the war, it will, in the opinion of this Convention, be expedient for the Legislatures of the several States to appoint delegates to another Convention to meet at Boston, in the State of Massachusetts, on the third Thursday of June next, with such powers and instructions as the exigency of a crisis so momentous may require.

THE AMERICAN CHURCH IN THE DISRUPTION.*

We are glad to see this able essay reprinted from the Christian Remembrancer, for it gives some valuable information upon a subject but little understood and considered in this country—the condition of the Transatlantic "Church of England." Not the least of the benefits conferred on the New World by the mother country is her ecclesiastical system, which exercises a large influence on the most important classes of the community. In 1859, according to the returns of the Triennial General Convention held in Richmond in that year, there were in the North 97,388 communicants, and in the South 38,561. Of course the number of communicants is only a percentage of the number of worshippers, though probably a larger percentage than in this country. In general religious statistics the South "can show larger relative figures than the North. The number of 'Churches,' so called, in the South was 16,671, and in the North 21,295, in 1850—i.e., the South is as 115 to 150 to the North in point of number of places of worship, while it is as 100 to 150 in respect of population." The negroes are to a great extent Methodists, and the number of communicants among them is very large. Our author reminds his readers of the freedom of the South from "isms." He says: "We have evidence to show that such forms of devil-worship as Spiritualism, Mormonism, Free-love, &c., are very abhorrent to the general Southern mind."

Before the South seceded from the Union, there had been a disruption of the Presbyterian, Baptist, and Methodist Churches. Long ere the election of Mr. Lincoln, Mason's and Dixon's line cut their connection in two: and shrewd men, seeing this, had a presentiment of the coming political disruption. If religious sects could not hold together, it was impossible the political bond could endure. The Episcopal Church remained united to the last—until the political separation had been accomplished. Such a proceeding was natural to a conservative Church. When the new Government was formed, the Episcopal Church in the Confederate States was constituted. We elsewhere give the pastoral of the bishops issued at the close of the Session of the First General Council, the text of which we take from this pamphlet. English Churchmen will be gratified to learn how their brethren in the South hold fast to the laws and forms of the mother Church. The canon law "is the same moderate, just, and equal body of ecclesiastical law, by which the Church has been governed on this continent since her reception from the Church of England of the treasures of an Apostolic ministry and a Liturgical form of worship."

For an interesting summary of the proceedings of the Northern Church Convention we must refer our readers to the pamphlet; and we will conclude this notice with a passage which testifies the religious character of the South:—

All authorities agree that the secession has remarkably evoked a general feeling of religious earnestness in the people, which is thus staking its all on one heroic venture. Of this earnestness the living embodiment is found in General Thomas Jefferson Jackson, of Virginia, better known as "Stonewall" Jackson—a young man under forty, who had for some years past been quietly serving his State as head of its military academy—whose earnestness in prayer and constant reliance on the blessing of God has extorted the admiration even of the enemy. McClellan, to his credit, ordered the observance of Sunday in his army, an order which Lincoln has repeated; but such a man as "Stonewall" Jackson the North has not yet produced. We shall not be suspected of any predilection for Presbyterianism, or any great confidence in revivalism, because we pay a hearty tribute to his merits. His religion is at least terribly real; the congregations whom he assembles at his prayer-meetings are men whose lives, like those of their leader, are pledged to their country. At bye-times between his revivals he is found reviving Marathon and Sempach. Yet not one calumniator has been found to whisper that the religion of "Stonewall" Jackson is either a pretence or a political stratagem. His real greatness will, we have no doubt, make itself seen, if his life is prolonged into the years of peace which will follow the consolidation of the Southern States into a nation which owes its existence to its own unaided and heroic sufferings.

But the conflict in Virginia is not without its special features of peculiar interest to Churchmen. When the good old Squire-Bishop Meade, who went so steadfastly with Virginia, was on his deathbed—a deathbed, by the way, hurried by the exertions which the aged prelate made to preside at the consecration of Bishop Wilmer of Alabama, the first fruits of the separated Church of the Confederacy—he sent for General Lee, whom he had known from a child, to give him his blessing and enjoin him to persevere in the contest. The cause was just, said the Bishop, and he would succeed at last. How Lee fulfilled this behest history testifies.

LETTER FROM RICHMOND.

(To the Editor of THE INDEX.)

RICHMOND, January 3.

SIR,—“God has granted us a happy new year,” says General Bragg, in his latest official telegram announcing the result of the recent battle near Murfreesboro, in Tennessee, and surely the people of the Confederate States have abundant cause for gratitude to the only Giver of all victory in the glorious success which has so recently crowned their arms. The second year of the War of Southern Independence could hardly have been brought to a more triumphant close. Two immense and well-appointed Federal armies, upon whose operations in the winter campaign the most confident hopes of the subjugation of the South had been built, have been rendered powerless for a time—the armies of Burnside and Rosecrans; while a third, the army intended for the reduction of Vicksburg, despairing of a successful land attack upon that obstinate little city, has re-embarked on its transports and gone up the Mississippi. Victorious throughout their borders and defiant of the foe, patient under all the sufferings and privations incident to a state of blockade, and the invasion of their territory by innumerable hosts, and hopeful of the future, the Southern people await the events of the current year with a firm reliance on their own unaided efforts, under Divine Providence, to work out their national salvation.

The repulse of Burnside at Fredericksburg, though productive of no immediate benefit other than the demoralization of his troops, was felt and acknowledged by the Yankees as a staggering blow. We captured no colours, no guns, no camp equipage, and but few prisoners. Our generals were not themselves aware of the extent of the injury they had inflicted on the enemy, until the latter had recrossed the Rappahannock. Indeed, it was supposed by Lee, Jackson, Longstreet, and all their brother commanders, that the serious advance of the enemy upon their lines would be made on Sunday, the 14th of December, the movement the day previous being regarded by them as only a reconnoissance in force. But though Burnside had ordered the whole army under his command to dash itself against the “rebel” entrenchments with the morning light, and had telegraphed his Government that the next day he would “carry the crest,” when the day came, generals and army were mutinous, and thought only of getting safely across the river again, behind their heavy guns in position on Stafford Heights. For miles the open plateau, between the wooded high grounds, where lay the army of General Lee, and the river behind them, was strewn with the dead of Franklin's and Sumner's divisions, while, on the extreme Yankee left, the streets of the dismantled little town of Fredericksburg were cumbered with “unhandsome corpses.” In view of this terrible decimation of their ranks, the Yankee troops cried out that they had been forced into a “slaughter-pen,” and positively refused to renew the attack. Burnside himself, when he dictated to the operator the telegraphic message about “carrying the crest” on the morrow, and estimated his loss at 5000 men, little knew the fearful sacrifice that had attended the attempt of the day. Up to that moment he had not been on the field in person, his point of survey having been fixed in an observatory on the top of Phillip's House, on the northern bank of the Rappahannock, from which place he regarded the scene through a powerful glass, and issued his orders for the disposition of his troops as the fight went on. When he came to know the whole truth of the sorrowful business, he at once saw the necessity of withdrawing his shattered and disaffected army; and on the morning of the third day, before dawn, profiting by a thick rain, the discomfited legions that should have marched joyfully into Richmond were glad to make their escape from “the rebels” across their pontoons. Some unfavourable criticism has been indulged in by the Richmond press on the conduct of General Lee, in permitting this vast force to regain the opposite bank of the river in safety. It has been said, too, that had he shelled Fredericksburg the night succeeding the battle, he might have destroyed half the Yankee survivors of the fray that were huddled together in the streets and houses of the town. It is always easy to say, by the light of facts which have subsequently transpired, what ought to have been done upon any particular occasion, and the fame of these “prophets of the past” is cheap enough. Voltaire, in his life of Charles XII., tells us of a Council of War held the day after a battle had been lost, which satisfactorily demonstrated how it might have been won; but the Q.E.D. is not so conclusive as to the destruction of Burnside's army in its retreat across the Rappahannock. The entire open space from the river to the position of the Confederates was commanded by the heavy guns of the Yankees posted on the hills of Stafford, and to have pursued the retiring columns to their pontoons, would have been to subject our brave troops to a murderous fire that we had no power to silence, and thus to make a sacrifice greater even than the enemy had just sustained. General Lee is not so bad an economist of his forces as to have hazarded this. With regard to the midnight bombardment of Fredericksburg, the propriety of such a measure may well be doubted, when we consider that it must have imperilled many of our own citizens, and brought total ruin upon the habitations of more than 5000 persons, whose sufferings had already been severe and whose unswerving loyalty to Virginia and the Confederacy, in this cruel extreme of fortune, will adorn one of the brightest pages in the history of the war.

The disastrous defeat at Fredericksburg has been generally attributed by the press of the North to what they are pleased to call the impregnable positions chosen by General Lee, and the frightful havoc made in their ranks by the plunging fire of our artillery. A word or two on each of these points. That General Lee's positions were chosen with consummate military skill is undeniable, nay, he had an immense reserve of resources in his lines of entrenchment of which the enemy knew nothing. But it is worthy of remark that the Yankees undertook at Fredericksburg for the first time, the dangerous work of carrying batteries by assault, and found it, to their surprise, a very different thing from defending batteries assailed from the front. Hitherto they have waited, behind "impregnable positions," for the Confederate attack, and, in the great majority of instances, have been compelled to abandon them before the impetuous onset of men whom they speak of as an undisciplined, bare-footed, shirtless rabble. In the memorable days of June and July, 1862, the gallant boys of Gregg, Featherstone, Pryor, Rickett, and others among our brigadiers then in command, carried battery after battery, and field-work after field-work, along a distance of thirty miles, in all respects as formidable as the "impregnable positions," that "fighting Joe Hooker" could not take at Fredericksburg; indeed, the pursuit of McClellan from Mechanicsville to Malvern Hill was one continuous assault of heavy fortifications and strongly-posted batteries. At Malvern Hill alone they made a successful resistance, and even there it is admitted by the Yankees themselves we should have carried their positions had the storming party consisted of a division, or even a brigade, instead of two or three thin regiments thrown out in every instance. As for the withering fire of our artillery at Fredericksburg, the report of the Committee of the Federal Congress, appointed to inquire into the causes of the defeat of Burnside, furnishes a striking commentary upon the assumption that no body of men could have stood against such a feu d'enfer. That our guns were well served there can be no question; but, as is usually the case, the destruction in the ranks of the enemy was caused mostly by the infantry. Upon a careful examination of the field, and the dead bodies found upon it, as well as of a large number of wounded men in the hospitals, the committee found that 83 per cent of the casualties must be attributed to Minié balls fired from the regulation rifled musket; 14 per cent they attributed to the explosion of shells, while only 3 per cent. was supposed to be the damage caused by round shot, grape, and canister combined.

The enemy's entire loss on the 13th of December will probably be never accurately ascertained, but it did not fall short of 20,000 in killed, wounded, and missing.

The number of slain left upon the field was not less than 4000, and the New York World declares that 20,000 cripples for life were made by that fatal day's fighting; but as the latter statement occurs in the midst of an article bitterly rebuking the Administration, it may be considered extravagant. All the decencies of life, all the promptings of humanity, were disregarded by the enemy in the burial of their dead. Hundreds of bodies were thrown together in a fosse commune dug upon the very edge of the town, and so thin a layer of dirt was laid above them that the first heavy rain will expose the festering mass of corruption to the sight. In other instances, the ice-houses, the sinks, the sewers, were made the receptacles of the carcasses. It may well be believed that an army so reckless of its duties to its fallen comrades was under no restraint in its conduct towards the people whose territory it invaded. Accordingly the "abomination of desolation" marks its footsteps upon the soil of Virginia. The wanton cannonade opened upon a town of non-combatants, after barely twelve hours' notice, was a direct encouragement given by the commanding general to his brutal soldiery to commit any barbarity that pleased them towards the people of Fredericksburg, but such encouragement was not needed. The place was sacked. The furniture and plate of the very houses of God were carried off or destroyed. Private dwellings were pillaged of their contents, and defaced by insulting inscriptions scribbled upon the walls. The Masonic Lodge of Fredericksburg has long boasted among its treasures the regalia that was worn by George Washington as a member of the ancient and honourable fraternity of free and accepted Masons. This regalia was stolen, it is said, by an officer of the United States. Upon the main street of the town there still stands a quaint and venerable structure, well known to all who have visited the place, as the dwelling, in former days, of Mary the mother of George Washington. The structure enjoyed no immunity from the general defacement and defilement. All that it contained was seized as booty, and ribald sentences were scrawled upon the wainscots and ceilings of its antiquated apartments. If anything could be more touching than the cheerful fortitude and uncomplaining spirit of the noble citizens of Fredericksburg, in their shelterless and impoverished condition, it would be recognized in the spontaneous efforts of the Southern people to alleviate their sufferings, and the warm sympathies of the "undisciplined, barefooted, shirtless rabble" that drove the enemy from the town. In Richmond, Petersburg, Lynchburg, Charlottesville, private houses were opened to receive the unhappy fugitives. A fund of $50,000, the voluntary contributions of kind hearts in all parts of the Confederacy, has already been collected in this city, while the Mayor of Fredericksburg has received half as much more from the soldiers in the field.

While the Confederate loss in the battle was not numerically severe in comparison with the loss of the enemy, it was large enough in figures, and bitter enough in contemplation of the character of many of the slain, to repress any feeling of exultation on our part. The gallant gentleman and accomplished scholar, General Thomas R. R. Cobb, of Georgia, who fell dead upon the soil he was defending, will be lamented all over the land. South Carolina does not weep alone over the honoured dust of her heroic son, General Maxey Gregg. The lives of such men make a fearful item in that sorrowful sum total which must be paid in the price of our liberties. Our advices from Murfreesboro are not sufficiently full to enable us to estimate the entire value of the victory gained over Rosecrans by the forces of General Bragg. We only know that the day was ours, that 7000 prisoners (including three brigadier-generals), thirty-one pieces of artillery, 200 waggons and teams, and a considerable quantity of commissary stores, have fallen into our hands, and that the great Army of the North-West, made up of the best fighting material of the United States, has been badly beaten. It may be that General Bragg will yet be compelled to fall back from Murfreesboro before heavy reinforcements supplied from Nashville, the Yankee base of operations in that quarter, in which event the decisive conflict for the redemption of the Mississippi Valley must yet be fought on another field; but our troops will go into that conflict, wherever and whenever joined, with a prestige of victory from brilliant successes already achieved, and under the lead of a commander, Joe Johnston, who has never known a defeat.

Nonnew year's intelligence has been received here, at the present writing, from Albany, where Governor Seymour was inaugurated on the 1st of January, or from Washington, where Lincoln was expected to signalize the day by his final proclamation declaring slavery absolutely non-existent in the Confederate States. The latter document will prove a mere brutum fulmen in much the larger part of the Confederacy, everywhere, indeed, except in the immediate presence of the Federal armies. The 1st of January dawned here in cloudless glory, no thunder shook the sky, no earthquake stirred the ground, all the operations of nature went on in their accustomed order, not a thought of Lincoln's upheaval of all social institutions disturbed the ordinary routine of our domestic concerns, or interrupted the labours of the factory or the plantation. Governor Seymour is pledged to put the State of New York in antagonism to the Government of the United States upon this question of slavery, and upon the lettres de cachet by which citizens of that State are now thrown into Fort Lafayette at the pleasure of Mr. Seward, but we build small hopes of peace upon the triumph of the Northern Democracy. They would carry on the war strictly in accordance with the Constitution, forsooth, but they still would carry on the war. It matters little to us practically, therefore, who is in power, Tros Tyrusæ, we must fight it out. The Hon. James Brooks, who has spoken some noble words in rebuke of the Washington tyranny, is desirous of peace, but looks for reconstruction, and would invite the seceding States to meet their Northern friends (!) in convention, during an armistice of six months, to compose the unhappy differences that divide them. The conservative gentlemen of the North address us in the affectionate formula of the second column of the Times.

If the "Wayward Sisters," who, two years ago left their homes, will return to their disconsolate relatives, all will be forgiven.

Trop tard, Mr. Brooks—the sooner the honest recusants you represent, who have at last woke up to the fact that all constitutional liberty has been lost in Black Republican rule, can open their eyes to the inexorable necessity of a final separation, the better will it be for all parties. We want no reconstruction, and will hear of none; we ask no forgiveness, as we are wholly unconscious of offence; all we demand is to be let alone, and we will fight until you are willing to call off the dogs. It is patent now, that the war is only prosecuted as a question of boundary, a question which the unconstitutional admission into the Federal Union of the new State of "Western Virginia" greatly perplexes, and in the ultimate solution of which all Europe must see that the principle of the uti possidetis is wholly inapplicable. Not until every rightful foot of Southern territory has been relinquished, and the States of Maryland, Kentucky, and Missouri, shall have been left free to decide for themselves whether they will go with the United, or the Confederate States, will we hearken to overtures for a settlement. In the forty-five counties composing the pretended new State of "Western Virginia," a majority of voters endorsed at the polls the Ordinance of Secession, and this fact of itself should decide the future of that disloyal section, apart from the paramount question of indefeasible State sovereignty.

President Davis has been absent from Richmond for several weeks, on a visit to the South-West, accompanied by General Joseph E. Johnston, now commanding in the department. His presence has everywhere called forth the liveliest enthusiasm among our troops and our people at their homes. At Jackson he addressed the Legislature of Mississippi in a speech characterized by his accustomed simplicity and strength, which may be accepted as a formal exposition of his views upon the stirring questions of the hour.

You have not failed to observe the proclamation of President Davis concerning Butler, declaring him an enemy of the human race, the justice of which has been recognized by the antislavery verdict of Christendom, nor the general orders which preceded this proclamation, looking to retaliation for the butchery of innocent citizens of Missouri by the fiend McNeil. The Beast of Boston has escaped the just vengeance of an outraged people, by giving place to General Banks in the command at New Orleans, but the execrations of mankind will follow him through the remnant of his disgraceful life. In the State of Virginia the policy of retaliatory measures has been adopted by Governor Letcher, who has caused five prisoners, taken by General John B. Floyd, of the Virginia State Line, to be imprisoned in the penitentiary, where they will be kept in safe custody (two of them in solitary confinement) until Lincoln shall release Col. Zarvona, of St. Nicholas notoriety, who is now confined as a felon in Fort Lafayette.

The blessed season of Christmas, which has just passed, was celebrated with less of festive commemoration in Virginia than has been observed for half a century. Our hearts were lighter than they were at the last return of the anniversary, and under a becoming sense of gratitude to God for his signal mercies in our deliverance from the hands of our enemies, we might, perhaps, have indulged innocently enough in the merriment and good cheer of the holidays to the fullest extent. But the hilarity and hospitable rites of Christmas were restrained, in the recent instance, by many circumstances and considerations. A large number of the old mansions in Piedmont and Tidewater, Virginia, in which, a year ago, the yule fires blazed cheerily and happy groups were assembled, have been dismantled and despoiled by the ruthless foe—some of them, alas! are in ruins, and their former occupants fugitives and in poverty. As for the bounteous good-living that belongs to Christmas, it was given over in the late season upon sheer compulsion. The straits in which we have been placed by the blockade admit of no unnecessary profusion, and the cellar, in too many cases, did not furnish the requisites for the annual symposium. Wine there was not, nor even its more fiery substitutes. Jolly Dr. Maginn might well sing, in his abundance of "the rosy"—

Drink to me only in a jug, and I will pledge with mine;
Come fill my glass with whisky-punch, and I'll not ask for wine.

But a glass of whisky punch, without Irish whisky and without lemons, is an impossibility. Yet if the country districts had not been laid waste, and we had possessed for merry-making "all appliances and means to boot," it were enough to repress the disposition for mirth and revel, that so many bosoms were stricken with sorrow throughout the Confederacy. We could not but remember, too, that the war is not yet over; that the foe, though beaten back in disgrace, has yet great power, and the greatest desire, to do us further mischief, and we have universally deferred until a future holiday the social enjoyment which the period of the year would otherwise have sanctioned.

Our winter has, so far, been mild, almost without a precedent within living recollection. One fall of snow in the month of November, and two sharp, brief spells of freezing weather since, have been all of the rigours of winter that we have experienced. Five days of every week have been like the dreamy, hazy, golden winter days of Rome; and the intense blue of our American sky has at times seemed deeper and more lovely than that which bends over the Campagna. Nature has appeared to mock the desolations of the war.

Richmond is uncomfortably full of strangers just now. Among them are Colonel Leslie, of the House of Commons, and the Marquis of Hartington, son of the Duke of Devonshire, the same gentleman whose name President Lincoln facetiously remarked upon as furnishing a rhyme to Mrs. Partington. They have just returned from a jaunt, with the correspondent of the Times, to the army near Fredericksburg, and go hence to Charleston.

Congress will meet in this city on the 12th inst.

A SOUTHERNER.

THE HISTORY OF THE FUGITIVE SLAVE LAW.

(To the Editor of THE INDEX.)

Sir,—So much having of late been said about Mr. Mason's connection with the Fugitive Slave Law, I beg to send you the following brief sketch of the true history of that law, and its real authorship, as derived from the most authentic records.

The Constitution of the United States is the author of the so-called Fugitive Slave Law. It contains a clause stipulating between the States parties to it, for the surrender of fugitives escaping from one State into the jurisdiction of another State, and without which such fugitives could not be reclaimed; that is to say:—

1st. Felons, called fugitives from justice.

2nd. Apprentices or indentured servants, called persons "held to service."

3rd. Slaves, called persons "near to labour."

This stipulation is found in Article 4, Section 2, of the Constitution, in the following words:—

A person charged in any State with treason, felony, or other crime, who shall flee from justice, and be found in another State, shall, on demand of the executive authority of the State from which he fled, be delivered up, to be removed to the State having jurisdiction of the crime.

No person held to service or labour in one State, under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labour, but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labour may be due.

This provision, it is seen, makes it incumbent to "deliver up" a fugitive of either class to the jurisdiction from which he fled.

The Constitution went into operation in 1787, but no case arose calling for the aid of this stipulation until 1792-93, and it arose then in the case of a fugitive from justice. The Governor of one of the States desired to reclaim a person guilty of felony who was found in another State. The Governor of the State where the fugitive sought refuge decided that he had no power either to apprehend or to "deliver him up." An appeal was then made to the Executive of the United States, as a duty devolving on it under the Constitution, General Washington being then President. The question was referred by him to the Attorney-General of the United States, as its law adviser. The Attorney-General reported that, although the duty was imperative, the Constitution required legislation to give it effect, and that without such legislation the Government was without power in the premises.

President Washington laid this report before Congress, with a recommendation that proper legislation should be supplied to give effect to the Constitution in this regard. No difficulty had arisen at that day about the surrender of slaves escaping from their masters; "Runaways," as they were called in common parlance; they were retaken by their masters wherever found, without hindrance, and with the aid, if necessary, of the vicinage.

Congress, on the President's recommendation, took up the subject, and finding that three classes of fugitives were provided for in the same article of the Constitution, enacted a law embracing the three classes as in pari materia, by the Act entitled, "An Act respecting Fugitives from Justice, and Persons escaping from the Service of their Masters," approved by President Washington, February 12th, 1793. This Act, the first passed for the recovery of fugitive slaves, provided for their arrest by the owner, in whatsoever State such fugitive was found, and imposed penalties on any who should obstruct or hinder such arrest, or rescue the fugitive from the custody of his owner, or should harbour or conceal him.

If there be any prurient curiosity to establish the authorship of the so-called "Fugitive Slave Law," it is thus historically traced. The Constitution of the United States is author of the principle of the reclamation of the slave, and General Washington, by his recommendation to Congress, was the author of the law to give effect to the principle, the Constitution being powerless proprio vigore.

Mr. Mason, thus, was not the author of this law, but he was the author of a subsequent law of Congress, passed in 1850, more effectually to carry into effect the provisions of the Act of 1793, which the title of the Act of 1850 fully discloses, it being entitled, "An Act to amend and supplementary to an Act entitled an Act respecting Fugitives from Labour and Justice," approved February 12th, 1793."

JUSTICE.

THE CONFEDERATE EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

PASTORAL OF THE BISHOPS OF THE EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN THE CONFEDERATE STATES, 1862.

At your request, brethren of the Clergy and Laity, we conclude the session of our First General Council by presenting to you and reading in your presence a Pastoral Letter, addressed to the members of the Protestant Episcopal Church scattered throughout the Confederate States. By the mighty power of the Holy Ghost we have been permitted to bring our deliberations to a close in a spirit of harmony and peace which augurs well for the future welfare of our branch of the Church Catholic; and our first duty is to thank Him who has promised to be with His Church to the end of the world, for His presence with us during our consultations, and for the happy conclusion to which He has brought our sacred labours.

Seldom has any council assembled in the Church of Christ under circumstances needing His presence more urgently than this which is now about to submit its conclusions to the judgment of the Universal Church. Forced by the providence of God to separate ourselves from the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States—a Church with whose doctrine, discipline, and worship, we are in entire harmony, and with whose action, up to the time of that separation, we were abundantly satisfied—at a moment when civil strife had dipped its foot in blood, and cruel war was desolating our homes and firesides, we required a double measure of grace to preserve the accustomed moderation of the Church in the arrangement of our organic law, in the adjustment of our code of Canons, but, above all, in the preservation, without change, of those rich treasures of doctrine and worship which have come to us enshrined in our Book of Common Prayer. Cut off from all communication with our churches of the world, we have been compelled to act without any interchange of opinion even with our Mother Church, and alone and unaided to arrange for ourselves the organization under which we should do our part in carrying on to their consummation the purposes of God in Christ Jesus. We trust that the Spirit of Christ has indeed so directed, sanctified, and governed us in our work, that we shall be approved by all those who love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity and in truth, and who are earnest in preparing the world for His coming in glorious majesty to judge both the quick and the dead.

The constitution of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the Confederate States, under which we have been exercising our legislative functions, is the same as that of the church from which we have been providentially separated, save that we have introduced into it a germ of expansion which was wanting in the old constitution. This is found in the permission which is granted to existing dioceses to form themselves by subdivision into provinces, and by this process gradually to reduce our immense dioceses into Episcopal Sees, more like those which, in primitive times, covered the territories of the Roman Empire. It is at present but a germ, and may lie, for many years, without expansion, but being there, it gives promise, in the future, of a more close and constant Episcopal supervision than is possible under our present arrangement.

The Canon Law, which has been adopted during our present session, is altogether in its spirit, and almost in its letter, identical with that under which we have hitherto prospered. We have simplified it in some respects, and have made it more clear and plain in many of its requirements; but no changes have been introduced which have altered either its tone or character. It is the same moderate, just, and equal body of ecclesiastical law by which the Church has been governed on this continent since her reception from the Church of England of the treasures of an Apostolic Ministry and a Liturgical form of worship.

The Prayer-book we have left untouched in every particular, save where a change of our civil government and the formation of a new nation have made alteration essentially requisite. Three words comprise all the amendment which has been deemed necessary in the present emergency, for we have felt unwilling, in the existing confusion of affairs, to lay rash hands upon a book consecrated by the use of ages, and hallowed by associations the most sacred and precious. We give you back your Book of Common Prayer the same as you have entrusted it to us, believing that if it has slight defects, their removal had better be the gradual work of experience than the hasty action of a body convened almost upon the outskirts of a camp.

Besides this actual legislation which we now submit to you, our assembling together has given us a view of the condition of the Church throughout the Confederate States, which renders it our duty to speak to you as chief pastors over the flock of Christ, reminding you of the peculiar encouragements which surround us, specifying the points towards which our efforts, as a Christian Church, should be directed, and pointing out the deficiencies which require instant correction and amendment. No moment seems so propitious for the performance of this duty as that in which we are beginning a new life in the Church, and are preparing to stamp ourselves upon the world, for good or for evil.

Our highest encouragement is derived from the fact, that we hold the sacred trust of the faith once delivered to the Saints, and that we hold it in connexion with a ministry whose succession from Christ and His Apostles is undoubted, and with a form of worship simple and pure, yet sublime and Scriptural. These are not gifts to make a boast of, but to use for the glory of God, and the advancement of Christ's kingdom. Far from filling us with vainglory, their possession should humble us to the dust, unless we approve ourselves faithful stewards of such inestimable treasures. To whom much has been committed, from him will much be required, and it remains for us to prove whether we have deserved so spiritual an inheritance. But possessing it, we may rightfully feel that we enter upon our warfare with the world, the flesh, and the devil, having all the strength that Divine Truth and a Divine commission can give us. We can press on without any doubts resting upon our hearts as to the truth which we are teaching, as to the validity of the Sacraments which we are administering, or as to the authority of the orders which we are transmitting. Upon all these points we are secure, and we can go forward offering to all men, with boldness and confidence, the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ and the fellowship of the Saints. Whatever hindrances we may meet, or whatever contradiction of men we may encounter, we can rest assured that truth will finally prevail, and that God will set His Son upon His holy hill of Zion.

Our next source of encouragement is, that we enter upon our work with our dioceses fully organized, and with the means which Christ has instituted in His Church well distributed throughout the Confederate States. When we remember the very different auspices under which the venerated Fathers of the American Church began their work, and mark how it has grown and prospered, we should indeed take courage and feel no fear for the future. In their case all their ecclesiastical arrangements had to be organized; in our case we find these arrangements all ready to our hand, and with the seal of a happy experience stamped upon them. In their case every prejudice of the land was strong against them. In our case we go forward with the leading minds of our new Republic cheering us on by their communion with us, and with no prejudications to overcome, save those which arise from a lack of acquaintance with our doctrine and worship. In their case they were indeed few, and separated far from one another in their work upon the walls of Zion. In our case we are comparatively well compacted, extending in an unbroken chain of dioceses from the Potomac to the confines of the Republic. Despite all these disadvantages, "the little one became a thousand, and the small one a strong nation," and shall we despair? If we be watchful, and strengthen the things that remain, our God will not forsake us, but will "lengthen our cords and stretch forth the curtains of our habitations." In visible token of this fact, we have already, since our organization, added to the House of Bishops, the Right Rev. Dr. Wilmer as Bishop of Alabama, and received into communion with the Church the Diocese of Arkansas.

Another source of encouragement is, that there has been no division in the Church in the Confederate States. Believing, with a wonderful unanimity, that the providence of God had guided our footsteps, and, for His own inscrutable purposes, had forced us into a separate organization, there has been nothing to embarrass us in the preliminary movements which have conducted us to our present position. With one mind and with one heart we have entered upon this blessed work, and we stand together this day a band of brothers, one in faith, one in charity. There may be among us, as there always must be, minute differences of opinion and feeling, but there is nothing to hinder our keeping the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace. We are all satisfied that we are walking in the path of duty, and that the light of God's countenance has been wonderfully lifted up upon us. He has comforted us in our darkest hours, and has not permitted our hearts to faint in the day of adversity.

These striking encouragements vouchsafed to us from the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, should fill our hearts with earnest devotedness, and should lead us even now to inquire, "Lord, what wilt thou have us to do?" And the answer to this question will lead us, your chief pastors, to specify the points towards which our efforts, as a Christian Church, should be especially directed.

Christ has founded his church upon love—for God is love. It is the highest of all Christian graces. "And now abideth faith, hope, charity, these three, but the greatest of these is charity." Charity! not mere alms-giving, which is only one of its manifestations, but love—Christian love! As Christ, our Lord, loved the world so divinely that He was satisfied to suffer all things for its redemption, so does He command us to love one another, and to be ready to do all things for each other's salvation. This was His especial commandment, "A new commandment give I unto you, that ye love one another." And this is truly not only the new commandment, but the summary of all the commandments. The whole Gospel is redolent with it, with a broad, comprehensive, all-embracing love, appointed, like Aaron's rod, to swallow up all the other Christian graces, and to manifest the spiritual glory of God in Christ. A church without love! What could you augur of a Church of God without faith, or a Church of Christ without hope? But love is a higher grace than either faith or hope, and its absence from a Church is just the absence of the very life blood from the body.

Our first duty, therefore, as the children of God, is to send forth from this Council our greetings of love to the Churches of God all the world over. We greet them in Christ, and rejoice that they are partakers with us of all the grace which is treasured up in Him. We lay down to-day before the altar of the Crucified all our burdens of sin, and offer our prayers for the Church militant upon earth. Whatever may be their aspect towards us politically, we cannot forget that they rejoice with us "in the one Lord, the one faith, the one baptism, the one God and Father of all," and we wish them Godspeed in all the sacred ministries of the Church. Nothing but love is consonant with the exhibition of Christ's love which is manifested in His Church, and any note of man's bitterness, except against sin, would be a sound of discord mingling with the sweet harmonies of earth and heaven. We rejoice in this golden chord which binds us together in Christ our Redeemer, and like the ladder which Jacob saw in vision, with the angels of God ascending and descending upon it, may it ever be the channel along which shall flash the Christian greetings of the children of God.

But while we send forth this love to the whole Church militant upon earth, let us not forget that special love is due by us towards those of our own household. To us have been committed the treasures of the Church, and those of our kindred and lineage, who have sprung from our loins both naturally and spiritually, who are now united with us in a sacred conflict for the dearest rights of man, ask us for the bread of life. They pray us for that which we are commanded to give, the Gospel of the grace of God. They put in no claim for anything worldly—from anything alien from the mission of the Church. Their petition is, that we will fulfil the very purpose of our institution, and give them the means of grace. Every claim which man can have upon his fellow-man they have upon us, and having these claims they ask only for the Church. They pray us not to let them perish in the wilderness; not to permit them to be cut off from the sweet communion of the Church. "If," says the Apostle, speaking of Christian professors, and alluding to mere earthly things, "any provide not for his own, and especially for them of his own house, he hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel;" what shall we say of that church which shall not provide for its own children? How can it hope to be watered itself with gracious rain from Heaven, when it hoards up for itself the river of life, which is ordained to flow through its channels of grace?

Many of the States of this Confederacy are missionary ground. The population is sparse and scattered; the children of the Church are few and far between; the priests of the Lord can reach them only after great labour and privation. Hitherto has their scanty subsistence been eked out from the common treasury of our united Church. Cut off from that resource by our political action, in which they have acquiesced, they turn to us and pray us to do at least as much for them as we have been accustomed to do for the Church from which they have been separated by a civil necessity. We can do what they ask, and we ought cheerfully to do it. Unless we take care that the Gospel is sent to these isolated children of the Church, who will heed their cry? They have no Church to cry to but the Church which we now represent, and they cast themselves upon us in full faith that we will do our whole duty towards them. They are one with us in faith, in care, in suffering; they are bearing like evils with those which disturb us, and they have no worship to cheer or support them, no Gospel to preach to them patience and long suffering. For Christ's sake they pray that they may be given at least a mother's bosom to die upon.

Voices of supplication come to us also from the distant shores of Africa and the East, but only their echo reaches us from the throne of grace. The policy of man has shut out those utterances from us. How can it help their cause to separate the children of God from one another? He only knows, but we can hear them when we kneel in prayer, and commune with their spirits through the spirit of Christ. But God is perchance intending, through these inscrutable measures, to shut us up to that great work which He has placed at our very doors, and which is, next to her own expansion, the Church's greatest work in these Confederate States. The religious instruction of the negroes has been thrust upon us in such a wonderful manner, that we must be blind not to perceive, that not only our spiritual but our national life is wrapped up in their welfare. With them we stand or fall, and God will not permit us to be separated in interest or in fortune.

The time has come when the Church should press more urgently than she has hitherto done upon her laity, the solemn fact that the slaves of the South are not merely so much property, but are a sacred trust committed to us, as a people, to be prepared for the work which God may have for them to do in the future. While under this tutelage, He freely gives to us their labour, but expects us to give back to them that religious and moral instruction which is to elevate them in the scale of being. And while inculcating this truth, the Church must offer more freely her ministrations for their benefit and improvement. Her laity must set the example of readiness to fulfil their duty towards these people, and her Clergy must strip themselves of pride, and fastidiousness, and indolence. The teachings of the Church are those which best suit a people passing from ignorance to civilization, because, while it represses all fanaticism, it fastens upon the memory the great facts of our religion, and through its objective worship attracts and enchains them. So far from relaxing, in their case, the forms of the Church, good will be permanently done to them in proportion as we teach them through their senses and their affections. If subjected to the teachings of a bald spiritualism, they will find food for their senses and their child-like fancies in superstitious observances of their own, leading too often to crime and licentiousness.

It is likewise the duty of the Church to press upon the masters of the country their obligation, as Christian men, so to arrange this Institution, as not to necessitate the violation of those sacred relations which God has created, and which man cannot, consistently with Christian duty, annul. The systems of labour which prevail in Europe, and which are, in many respects, more severe than ours, are so arranged as to prevent all necessity for the separation of parents and children and of husbands and wives, and a very little care upon our part would rid the system, upon which we are about to plant our national life, of these unchristian features. It belongs, especially, to the Episcopal Church to urge a proper teaching upon this subject, for in her fold and in her congregations are found a very large proportion of the great slaveholders of the country. We rejoice to be enabled to say that the public sentiment is rapidly becoming sound upon this subject, and that the Legislatures of several of the Confederate States have already taken steps towards their consummation. Hitherto have we been hindered by the pressure of abolitionism; now that we have thrown off from us that hateful and infidel pestilence, we should prove to the world that we are faithful to our trust, and that the Church should lead the hosts of the Lord in this work of justice and of mercy.

Another duty which, for the present, devolves upon the Church, is an oversight of the children of God, as they lie without religion and without Christian care in the camps and hospitals of our Government. Far be it from us to say that there has been no Christian supervision of our soldiers, and we cheerfully concede all praise and thanks to those who have done their duty through danger and privation; but we must affirm that there is still a great lack of service on the Church's part in this connexion. From whatever cause it has arisen, whether from the scarcity of clergymen, or from unwillingness to bear the hardships of the soldier's life, we are obliged to acknowledge that we have been unable to find men who were willing to answer this call and to take their places, not as soldiers fighting for their country, but as soldiers fighting for the victory of Christ over sin and death. In the opinion of the House of Bishops, no position is more suited, at this moment, to the true spirit of Christ and his Church, than that of a faithful minister of the grace of God and of the Sacraments of the Church to the soldiers in the field or in the hospital; and we would urge it upon those Ministers who have been exiled from their parishes, to enter upon this work as their present duty, trusting for support to Him who said, "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee."

The most striking deficiency in the Church's work which we perceive in looking at the Church's life, is a lack of zeal in spreading the influences of the Church through her Services and Sacraments. Our ministry has become too local and sedentary, too well satisfied to sit down and do the work which it has undertaken to do, and overlooking the fields white for the harvest which are spread out all around them, and which cannot be cultivated save through their agency. Every well-established congregation should consider itself as a centre of missionary work, and should encourage its pastor to extend its usefulness beyond its own limits, and while he is a priest to them, to be, in some measure, a missionary to all about him. As long as the selfish idea is indulged, that a minister is tied down to a local congregation, and has no business to work around him, the Church must languish or increase but slowly. Missionaries cannot be furnished for every village and neighbourhood, and they must remain unengaged for by the Church, unless the settled clergy will make up their minds to extend the sphere of their operations beyond the narrow limits of their own immediate cures.

Another deficiency which requires amendment is the little spiritual intercourse which takes place among the clergy in their work for the Church. Each man works in his sphere, but for the most part he gives nothing to his brother clergyman, and receives nothing from him in return. When our Lord sent forth his Apostles, He sent them two by two for the evident purpose that they should support, strengthen, and comfort each other. The spirit of this action is very much overlooked in the Church, and the clergy are weakened by it. While the House of Bishops would not specify any mode by which this defect should be remedied, it would recommend to the clergy a more free spiritual intercourse, a more frequent interchange of clerical services, greater communion in prayer and in counsel. Many a despondent heart would thus be cheered and many a weak brother would be comforted and strengthened.

Another deficiency which requires amendment is the little spiritual help which is given to the clergy by the laity. We have no reference now to the temporal support of the clergy, although we might well dwell upon that, but to the spiritual help which a Christian laity might give to the clergy. In reading the Acts of the Apostles, we find many illustrations of this truth, and we perceive how the greatest of the Apostles was not above the help of his yoke-fellows in the gospel. There are many ways in which spiritual and earnest laymen can help their clergy in the work of the Church, and, under their guidance and direction, can become valuable missionaries of Christ, even while unordained. It requires sacrifice and self-denial, but we must all remember that we are not our own, but are bought with a price, and belong to Christ, body, soul, and spirit.

But over and above all these special deficiencies looms up that greatest of all deficiencies, the lack of the Holy Spirit in and with our Churches. Because of the degree to which spiritual influences have been abused in our land, we have been tempted to run into the other extreme, and to forget that we are living under what the Apostle calls the dispensation of the Spirit, and that the Church's work must derive all its power from his presence. Our danger is to merge the Holy Ghost into the means of grace, and overlook the important fact that He is a personal agent, acting indeed through those means, but not necessarily tied to them. Our Saviour said: "The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh or whither it goeth, so is every one that is born of the Spirit." And as with the individual, so with the Church. The Holy Spirit will be in the Church, if His presence is kept there by an acknowledgment of His power, by a sense of His necessity, by a constant prayer for His presence; but the addresses to the Churches in Asia Minor instruct us to be watchful over ourselves, and to hold by him who is the representative of Christ upon earth, while he is interceding and advocating for us in heaven. Let the Church and her ministers always bear in mind, that the growth of the Church, and the vitality of the Church, are "not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit," saith the Lord.

And now it only remains for us to bid you, one and all, an affectionate farewell. We cannot but remember that when we last separated from you, there stood among us two venerated brethren, dearly beloved in the Lord, who have since entered into their rest. When we parted we knew it must be, but we could not foresee where the hand of death would fall. And, now again we know, that separating once more for the like space of time, we shall not all meet again. Whose shall be the summons? Well for us that the curtain of God's providence hides this knowledge from us, teaching us the lesson of Christian truth, that we must all watch and be sober, because we know neither the day nor the hour when the Son of Man cometh. May God's gracious Providence guide you in safety to your homes, and preserve them from the desolations of war. And should we not be permitted to battle together any more for Christ in the Church militant, may we be deemed worthy to be members of the Church triumphant, where with prophets, apostles, martyrs, saints, and angels, we may ascribe honour and glory, dominion and praise, to Him that sitteth upon the throne, and to the Lamb, for ever.

THE URGENCY OF RECOGNITION.

(From the Morning Post of March 3.)

It is not surprising that the advisability of recognizing the Southern Confederacy should be discussed in Parliament. The time may not have come for according to the infant republic that acknowledgment of its independence which it demands, but it would be simply puerile to say that the position of affairs in America is not such as to make the topic a fair one for discussion. By those who adopt the rather singular views propounded some time since by Sir George Lewis on the subject of recognition, of course the question would be postponed until, in American parlance, the North had "caved in." So long as the Federal Government are willing and able to protract the war in which they are engaged, so long, according to the opinion of the Secretary for War, neutral Powers would not be justified in recognizing the independence of the South. Against the soundness of this theory we protested at the time, and pointed out what appeared to us the true principles which governed the law of international recognition. The independence of a State, it is perfectly evident, must be a question not of opinion, but of fact; whilst the recognition of that independence by other Powers is entirely a matter of political expediency. Recognition, under any circumstances, is not prescribed by international law. It is accorded in conformity with usage, and for purposes of mutual convenience. When the American colonies had finally achieved their independence, and we had desisted from a hopeless struggle, we might have refused to recognize their sovereignty. But such a course would have led to serious inconvenience. In the absence of diplomatic relations with a great Power, which, de facto, enjoyed the most absolute independence, no means would be at hand for arranging any of those several complications which constantly arise, even between friendly States. Now, as regards the Southern Confederacy, we are under no obligation to acknowledge its independence, nor should we be even if the blockade of its ports were raised to-morrow. But whether in conformity with usage, or for the sake of mutual convenience, or in the hopes of materially contributing thereby to shorten the war, we ought to grant the desired recognition, are, to say the least of them, debatable points on which much may be said. In the discussion which would have supervened on Lord Stratheden's motion in the House of Lords, had it not been unavoidably postponed, the question of Southern recognition would doubtless have been fully ventilated. In the meanwhile, however, it may not be out of place briefly to review the present position of the Southern Confederacy and the grounds which appear to justify it in expecting, though not in demanding, an early recognition from the European Powers.

That the Southern States of America at the present moment enjoy the most absolute independence is an admitted fact, which even their bitterest opponents cannot gainsay. They are ruled by a Government of their own choice, which makes laws, levies taxes, contracts loans, and wages war utterly unhampered by any foreign jurisdiction. The exercise of these several functions constitutes what by international law is considered sovereignty or independence. The fact that the Southern frontier is threatened by hostile armies, and its ports blockaded by hostile fleets, does not in the slightest degree militate against the theory of its independence, though it may very possibly endanger it. By national independence is meant the power of vindicating a nation's authority within its own confines, and not the power of enforcing respect beyond the limits of its territory. If, for instance, a war had arisen between this kingdom and Brazil, in consequence of the reprisals lately made by our Government, the coast of Brazil would have been easily and effectually placed in a state of blockade, but its sovereignty and independence would have remained unaffected. The South enjoying their perfect independence, the sole question which remains for the consideration of foreign States in respect to its recognition is, whether in all probability it will be able to perpetuate that sovereignty which it now undoubtedly possesses. If the Southern Confederacy had previously been recognized as a sovereign State, the mere fact of its being threatened by a superior Power would not have deprived it of its independent character, seeing that its diplomatic relations would still have continued in force with neutral States. But as it has never existed as a sovereign State, neutral Powers are obliged to consider the probabilities of its being able to establish its independence before officially recognizing it. It would be manifestly inconvenient and unseemly to open diplomatic relations with a Power which in the course of a short time might de facto cease to exist.

The official correspondence between Mr. Seward and the American Ambassador in Paris, lately published, affords an insight into the real or affected sentiments of the Federal Administration on the progress of the war. It may be sufficient, however, to say that those opinions are shared by none on this side of the Atlantic. The belief of ninety-nine out of a hundred Europeans is that the North must sooner or later confess itself vanquished. The confidently expressed opinions of the Federal Government supply no reasons, therefore, for refusing to the South the recognition it desires. The motives which have actuated neutral Powers in hitherto withholding from the South the acknowledgment of its independence spring from other sources than the empty boasts of the North. The fact is that recognition does not per se afford to the infant State any additional strength; and under existing circumstances it was supposed that it might have embittered and protracted the war instead of abbreviating it. Another cause which has operated in no slight degree in postponing the recognition of the Southern Confederacy has been the absence of all inconvenience to neutral States by continuing to withhold it. One of the principal grounds for recognizing the sovereignty of a State which has achieved its independence is, as we mentioned, mutual convenience. But blockaded as the Southern ports are, commercial relations between the Confederacy and the rest of the world are rendered impossible. Now, however, that the South has succeeded in establishing a navy, complications might very easily arise which would make it incumbent on neutral States, in their own interests, to recognize Southern independence. If, for instance, the Alabama or Florida should accidentally or wilfully destroy a British merchant ship, our Government would be obliged, as affairs now stand, to apply for compensation to the Government of the United States; and, in the event of it being refused, which it very probably would be, make reprisals on the Federal marine, and declare war against the United States. On the other hand, if the Confederacy were acknowledged as an independent State, then the demand for compensation would be made to its Government, and under the circumstances supposed it would immediately be acquiesced in. But although, regarded from a selfish point of view, it may not at present be worth the while of neutral States to recognize the independence of the South, it is worthy of consideration whether such a step might not materially conduce to terminate the war. The North is heartily tired of a contest in which it can gain nothing, and has lost much. The large majority of thinking men north of the Potomac are satisfied that the Union never again can be re-established. If the principal maritime Powers of Europe were to recognize the independence of the South, and thus solemnly protest against the further protraction of a hopeless struggle, we cannot but think that such an act would carry with it a moral weight which would be irresistible. If European statesmen candidly believe that the Southern Confederacy has established its independence, then why should they not give practical effect to their convictions? The recognition of the Southern States of America would be no intervention in the war. It would not in the slightest degree effect the rights of the belligerents as between themselves. The recent despatch of Mr. Seward shows how little may be expected from the Federal Government either in the way of prudence or of moderation. We have now witnessed a war of two years' duration, and it is really worth while to consider whether, by boldly giving effect to our opinions, we may not prevent the American nation continuing during another twelvemonth to sacrifice thousands of lives and expend countless treasures in the pursuit of an object which we know can never be attained.

AN IRISH VIEW OF THE AMERICAN WAR.

We are accustomed to sensational items from Ireland, or the following extract from the Connaught Patriot of February 28 might startle us:—

THE AMERICAN WAR.—The London Times and other cognate journals have thought proper to publish to the world "that a beginning of the end of the war" seems to be fast approaching. In this matter we will use the aphorism, "The wish was father to the thought." The Times and some of our Dublin papers say so because it is their ardent wish that the glorious Republic—the home of the oppressed of every country, and especially of the down-trodden and exiled Irish—would be disrupted. John Bull wishes this, American weakness being in his opinion a great damper upon Ireland's expectation of redemption from England's thralldom of seven centuries of dire oppression and unheard of cruelty. But we have strong hopes that between North and South, reason once more taking its place upon a high pedestal, will make itself be heard by the contending parties, and that mutual concessions (if for no other cause, from necessity) will be made to the end that, brothers in strife, ceasing to be so, will become brothers in love, and that thus the Union will be re-established on firmer basis than at first. We are sanguine that there is every sign of peace, but that it will not be by a severance of North from South, but from the conviction that it is their duty as well as their interest to combine against the common robber of mankind.

THE MINISTERIAL DEFEAT.—The Government sustained their fourth defeat on Monday night on the Corrupt Practices Bill, the second clause of which, proposing to disfranchise solicitors, agents, and messengers, was struck out by a majority 110 to 103 votes.—The Morning Herald, ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE BEAUTIES OF TROPICAL SCENERY AND SKETCHES OF OBJECTS OF INTEREST.

With Notes, Historical and Explanatory. By the Author of "The Nuptials of Barcelona."

"This is a volume of word pictures, in which the author gives several graceful poetic descriptions of the scenery in the tropics, and of various objects interesting to himself and to a large portion of the public generally. The natural splendour of the islands of the Western Archipelago and the richness of their productions certainly afford abundant sources of inspiration to the poet; and we very fairly congratulate the author upon the successful manner in which he has treated the various subjects that he has selected for the outpourings of his graceful muse."—Observer.

"He has happily combined poetical sentiment with much interesting historical and general information."—Weekly Times.

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

AMERICA.

Speech was not given to the Federals to conceal thought or to mask the truth. Their falsehoods are so clumsy that only the perversely blind can be deceived by them, and the corruption, covetousness, and ferocity of New England is not concealed by the impudent assumption of sanctified philanthropy. But we must, in fairness, give the Federals credit for genius in inventing charming phrases for the announcement of unpleasant and inconvenient incidents. The relief of a felon, who did not like to utter a direct lie, and who, nevertheless, naturally wished to disguise the disagreeable fact of her husband being hanged, used to tell her friends that, after addressing a large public meeting, her husband fell through the platform and broke his neck, in consequence of one of the supports giving way. But what, we should like to know, could be more delicate than the wording of the despatch which announced to the good people of Washington and New York that the attack made on Vicksburg on the 18th of February was repulsed? Under date Chicago, Monday, February 23rd, Mr. Lincoln permitted his loving subjects to be informed that

A special despatch from Memphis, dated on Saturday, furnishes us with advices from Vicksburg to the 18th inst. Active hostilities against Vicksburg commenced on that day. The mortar-boats were towed into position, and opened the ball by firing briskly. The effect of their shots was not known. The firing was responded to by three Confederate batteries, when our position was found to be too much exposed for effective operations, and was changed. The bombardment was then renewed.

If a benighted European had been called upon to describe the affair, he would have said, "The fire of the Federal gunboats was ineffective, and the Confederate fire obliged them to retire." What a difference between such an unvarnished tale and "the effect of their shots was unknown," and "our position was changed." We will not presume to call any place impregnable, or to follow the example of the North and prophecy glorious victories; but we may, without the least tinge of arrogance, express a belief that Vicksburg, no more than Richmond, will be captured by "changes of position" induced by Confederate guns. It is now stated there is to be no bombardment, but a siege. Woe unto the army that is located during the next few months in the swamps surrounding Vicksburg. We can hardly credit the rumour of the siege.

The redoubtable Queen of the West, the Federal iron-clad ram, has, to paraphrase the style of the North, changed owners. The Queen of the West was, in consequence of her passing the batteries of Vicksburg, the theme of much complaisant congratulation in the Northern papers. Her capture would teach the Federals a useful lesson if they were not so far above all instruction; they might learn that Vicksburg is the beginning, not the end, of their difficulties. Captain J. Kelso, commanding the fortification on the Red River, reports:—

Two gunboats made their appearance in front of this position at 5 o'clock last evening (February 17). After a brisk cannonade the leading gunboat, Queen of the West, struck her colours. I immediately ordered Captain Hutton, of the Crescent Artillery, and Lieut. Dahenty to go aboard and demand the surrender. These officers report but thirteen of the officers and crew on board. The others escaped under cover of the night. The visible results of the capture consist of one 32-pounder rifle Parrott gun, one 24-pounder, three 12-pounders, one ditto slightly damaged, besides a large supply of ordnance stores, quinine, two cases of amputating instruments, clothing, flour, bacon, beef, pork, lard, bread, and other stores in proportion.

As we stated last week, the Confederate navy is being rapidly recruited from the Federal navy—much, no doubt, to the profit and delight of the New England contractors. It is stated that the success is due to the gallantry of a Confederate pilot. The Richmond papers give the following account of this affair:—

The Queen of the West captured the Confederate transport Eva, No. 5, forced her pilot, John Burke, to take the wheel, and ordered him to take the boat to our batteries. Burke feigned fear, but finally took the wheel under a Yankee guard. Upon nearing the batteries, he told the Yankees they were fifteen miles from them, and then, putting close in shore, she received a shot which broke the steam pipe, disabling the boat, the Yankees being wholly unprepared for a fight and suspecting no danger. Burke, the pilot, jumped overboard and drifted ashore. The boat drifted to the opposite shore, when the crew made their escape, with the exception of eighteen, who fell into our hands. The crew subsequently got aboard the Yankee boat De Soto, and with 200 stolen negroes effected their escape.

The Queen of the West is but slightly injured and will soon be ready for sea. The Confederate steamer Webb recaptured the Eva, and the Federal transport De Soto is said to have been burnt to prevent her falling into the hands of the Confederates.

The Federal steamer Indianola has passed Vicksburg, and is reported to have destroyed a Confederate steamer near Port Hudson.

The Confederate soldiers are amphibious and capture ships, as well as fight on land. About the time the Queen of the West was changing owners an affair was going on, not very important in itself, but still worthy of record, which is thus described in a despatch dated Memphis, February 18, which, we ought to remark, being a Northern version, does not tell the whole truth, and must, from the very nature of things, assert much that is false:—

The tug Hercules, having two barges of coal in tow, going to the fleet, rounded to on the opposite side of the river early this morning, being unable to proceed on account of heavy fog. Scarcely had the boat touched the landing, when a party of rebels rushed aboard, took possession, captured officers and crew, stole what they could, and set fire to the vessel. All this was accomplished in a remarkably short time, but was not discovered by the gunboats that lay not far off till the flames attracted their attention. By that time those who had been taken prisoners were released, and the rebels were out of reach. The boat is a total loss. It is reported that the whole fleet will run the blockade at Vicksburg.

According to Savannah advices of the 17th February, the Confederate steamer Alice had arrived at that port, having run the blockade from Mobile on the night of the 14th of February, and made the passage to Savannah without seeing a single cruiser. The blockaders find it advisable not to keep too near the ports at which they are stationed, and the Washington Government finds it easier to blockade British ports, and overhaul and capture British ships. According to the Savannah Republican, the steamers Ruby, Leopard, and Wagner, arrived at Charleston on the 9th. The steamer Douglas ran out on that night. The same paper adds, that the blockade is virtually raised, as not a shot was fired at any of those vessels. No matter, by a lenient interpretation of the law of nations, Mr. Seward may announce its resumption when he likes, and be enabled to entrap our merchants.

We have no news of important warlike operations on land. The remnant of the Army of the Potomac,—which, by the way, the Northern papers assert to be 100,000 strong, but which, we venture to think, means that rations are drawn for 100,000 men—was on the 22nd February suffering from extreme cold, and blocked up with snow. When the snow melts the mud will make any movement impossible, and, what is of more consequence, increase the sickness in the camp. The prospect is not cheering for the command of General Hooker. Some Federal stores have been captured near Romney, Western Virginia.

Except the Washington Government, none know better how slight is the Federal military hold in Kentucky than the United States' officers in that State. The slightest movement of the Confederates throws them into a panic. On the 22nd of February—we are writing from Northern reports—a small body of Confederate cavalry entered Richmond, Kentucky, and passed through to Winchester. Upon this there was a rumour in Louisville that "the Confederate General Longstreet, at the head of 10,000 men, had entered the State, and was threatening Louisville, Lexington, Frankfort, and Danville." From this we may gather that, in the opinion of the Federals who are best informed, there is so little "Union sentiment" in Kentucky that 10,000 Confederate soldiers will enable that State to get rid of the Northern troops. These rumours, though only straws on the surface, faithfully indicate the current of men's thoughts. General Morgan has added to his daring exploits the capture of a steamer on the Banner River; and the guerilla forces have interrupted the communication between Louisville and Nashville.

If the Lincolnites had their deserts, they would become the mere tools of a despot; but they are cunning, and seek to endow Abraham Lincoln with despotic power because they know he is only a puppet in their hands. By the Conscription Bill they would give him the command of the whole military forces of the Union, independent of the rights of the States, and unfettered by the action of Congress; and, in addition to this, a Bill has passed the Federal Senate authorizing the suspension of the Writ of Habeas Corpus. New England is determined to rule the rest of the Union with a rod of iron. The tyranny of the North is often comical as well as gross. Col. Morgan, who has assumed the command of the post at Key West, has issued a general order, in which, we are told, "he enjoins the closing of shops after 8 p.m.; the assemblage of persons in the streets or at street corners is not to be allowed; persons found in the streets after half-past 10 p.m. without the countersign, or being able to assign satisfactory reasons, are to be arrested; all white persons having relatives in the Confederate army, or who had declined to take the oath of allegiance, are required to register at headquarters, in order that they may be transported to Fort Royal." Why not take a hint from English history, and have a curfew bell to announce to the people at what hour they are to extinguish their lights? The proposal to transport "all white persons having relatives in the Confederate army" may disturb the domestic serenity of Mr. Lincoln, for, according to rumour, Mrs. Lincoln is a white person, and she has relations in the Confederate army. Or, by a little extension of the principle to relatives by marriage, and of this Morgan rule to Washington, Mr. Lincoln may be called upon to register himself preparatory to transportation.

The Northern papers report that, "A great Union meeting has been held in Cincinnati. Resolutions were adopted pledging the State of Ohio to the vigorous prosecution of the war, and the support of the present Administration until replaced by another." We know that it is as easy to manufacture "a great Union meeting" as it is "a great Union victory," and if Ohio is resolved to carry on the war, we do not put much faith in the pledge to support the present Administration "until it is replaced by another," unless it means that Ohio is calculating upon an immediate change of Administration. The staunchest advocates of a reconstruction of the Union are the bitterest enemies of New England and the Lincolnites.

A private letter from New York, received from a gentleman in Liverpool, states that General Wool's military police are making quiet but vigilant search after concealed arms in that city, and under pretence of having discovered suspiciously secreted stores, have already forwarded large quantities of private arms to Washington. The correspondent concludes from this that there is a settled plan of stealthily disarming the citizens, and states that considerable alarm is felt in some circles.

The dispute between Generals Hunter and Foster is now admitted; and General Townsend has gone to Port Royal to settle the differences. General Hunter is a very short-tempered fanatic, and cannot behave civilly to his comrades. No sooner had General Foster gone to Washington than Hunter ordered his (Foster's) staff to leave his department. He next ordered General Stevenson into custody for expressing disgust at the idea of co-operating with negro troops. This officer has been honourably acquitted, and it is rumoured that Hunter will be superseded by General Burnside.

However fond Hunter may be of negroes, his own troops do not like them, and there has been several collisions between the white and coloured soldiers. The Port Royal correspondent of the New York Tribune, who must be fond of a grim joke, asserts,

That 5000 negroes, led by white officers, and supported by regular troops, will shortly make an expedition into the most densely populated districts of the department of the South to call the slaves to arms. Communication had been opened with the negroes on plantations, who were prepared.

Neither negroes nor white officers would be such fools as to go "into the most densely populated districts" on such an errand, even if they could get there, but just now they cannot do so. When the North has a firm footing on the frontier, it will surely be time enough to brag about what is to be done in the interior.

Mr. Cassius Clay has thought proper to notify to Mr. Lincoln that he will only fight under an abolition policy. Any policy that will induce such men as Mr. Cassius Clay to take part in the military affairs of the North will be a gain to the South. We are not surprised to learn that Mr. Clay is urging Mr. Lincoln to replace General Halleck by General Butler. A courageous brute is a hero in the eyes of a cowardly bully.

The Conscription Bill has been passed by the Federal House of Representatives by a vote of 115 to 49. It is reported that the New York Legislature will take some action on this Bill; but it is likely that if the Legislature do not resist it, the people will, if Mr. Lincoln attempts to enforce it.

Mr. Wilson, of Massachusetts, who knows so well the sentiments of his fellow-citizens, has proposed in the Senate that the President shall have authority to enrol as many liberated negroes as he may deem necessary to arm for service during the war. Mr. Wilson quite understands that the Yankees prefer fighting by deputy, and particularly as they can by this plan get rid of the much-hated negro. Mr. Wilson defended General Butler and his brother from the charge of having acquired large plunder in New Orleans, which was preferred by Mr. Davis, who gave notice that he should call for a committee of investigation.

The Federal Congress is doing some queer things. We are not surprised that Mr. McDougall should denounce the Secretary of War, in the Senate, "as a base man, who had wronged the country," because we are used to strong language in Congress; but we are rather surprised at a Bill making it obligatory for the President to select for promotion officers who have distinguished themselves in the field, for this is a palpable infringement of the President's undoubted and necessary prerogative. Still more astounding is a rumour that Congress will pass a joint resolution, before the adjournment, indicating the policy to be pursued in case of foreign mediation. This is rich if true; for then Congress would affect to control the Government, not only after it is adjourned, but after it has absolutely ceased to exist; and to legislate for the unknown future.

The Delaware Legislature has sent a requisition to the sham Governor of Missouri, asking him to send delegates to a Convention to effect an armistice. Of course the bogus Governor and Legislature of Missouri have refused to comply with the request.

It is reported that General Banks has been fired at in New Orleans.

The United States no longer welcome emigrants to their shores, except as food for powder. A movement has been inaugurated among the mechanics of New York to prevent the importation of foreign labour. It is astonishing how much the Northerners, in their Government and conduct, continue to approximate to the Government and conduct of China. The Chinese protest against the influx of foreigners, so do the New Yorkers.

The New York Chamber of Commerce has passed a resolution recommending the Bill for the issue of letters of marque and reprisal.

A dispute has arisen between the people of California and Nevada, in reference to the jurisdiction over the lands in the Honey Lake Valley. At the latest dates both parties were preparing for an appeal to force.

On the 24th of February gold in New York was 72½ prem.; on the 27th it was 70¼ prem., and on the 28th 73½.

ENGLAND.

The demonstration of a great people may be felt and imagined, but it cannot be described, and the Princess Alexandra's welcome and the wedding of the Prince of Wales were essentially national demonstrations. The ovation of the bride, from the time she came within sight of our shores till she entered Windsor Castle, was unprecedentedly grand. The Mayor of Margate, with that ultra, and in this instance commendable, officiousness which distinguishes those functionaries, gave the Royal Bride her first English greetings, but could hardly have prepared her for what was to follow. From the moment she landed at Gravesend, the pageantry of processions was lost in the greeting of the assembled people, and yet the Gravesend greeting was hardly a foretaste of the enthusiasm that awaited her in the metropolis. The daughter of the 'Sea Kings' might be excused for forgetting the honour paid her by the Corporation of London in the loyalty manifested by the countless crowd that thronged the streets. Her way was through a sea of human beings, and the cries of welcome rang in her ears from the moment she arrived at the Bricklayers' Arms Station until she had traversed the great city, and was on her way to Windsor. When she arrived at the Royal Town, she found that London had only represented the feeling of the entire country. It was a scene that Englishmen may well be proud of. A people so unanimous in their loyalty, though differing so widely on every political, social, and religious question, need not fear the power of their adversaries.

The marriage ceremony was gorgeous and singularly affecting. In St. George's Chapel were gathered together the flower of the English aristocracy. The Knights of the Garter, in their gorgeous robes; the foreign Ambassadors covered with decorations; the ladies at once representing the beauty and wealth of England; an Indian prince covered with jewels, reminding the spectators of that mighty empire which is a part of the vast dominions of England, constituted the most brilliant assembly that could be convened. The bride and bridegroom, both youthful and comely, both bearing themselves as befitting their exalted station and magnificent destiny, were, of course, objects of intense curiosity, admiration, and loyal emotion. But there was another present at that scene, taking no part in the ceremony, not altogether shunning, yet not courting observation; habited not in wedding garments but in robes of mourning; for whose sorrows every heart sympathized, and on whom none could look without a feeling of reverence. The widowed Queen bore herself bravely. Whatever she felt when she first gazed upon the festive scene, which must so have reminded her of her irreparable loss, she concealed, and only incompetent motherly interest and pleasure in the presence of her children; but at length, when the solemn chorale, solemn though joyous, that had been composed by her late husband broke upon her ear, her emotion could no longer be suppressed, and she wept bitterly. All who witnessed this and all who have read of it, whilst trusting that time, whilst it cannot heal, may soften the sorrow, feel that such womanly grief was not only inexpressibly touching, but was not unbecomingly Queenly dignity.

After the marriage ceremony, the bride and bridegroom departed for Osborne. At every stoppage on their route thousands of persons were assembled to greet them, and, of course, the Mayor of Southampton took the opportunity of presenting an address. At night London was splendidly illuminated, and from dusk till early morn the streets were thronged with carriages and people. The Prince and Princess of Wales enter upon their married life with a nation's hearty wishes and prayers for their future happiness.

The tide seems to be again turning in Lancashire. The diminution of pauperism last week fell short of 1200; and in some districts, as notably in Ashton, there was a serious increase. This increase was attributed by Mr. Hugh Mason, at the meeting of the Central Executive Committee at Manchester, on Monday last, to two principal causes. In the first place, several factories which had reopened for a short time have been compelled again to close. Secondly, classes of persons, who have hitherto kept off the poor-rates, and contrived, somehow or other, to keep themselves and their families alive by their own resources, have succumbed to the long continuance of a pressure which is gradually crushing out every sort of trade and industry subsidiary to, or dependent upon, the cotton manufacture and those employed therein—that is to say, nine-tenths of the whole trade and industry of Lancashire. As regards the closing of factories, the case of Ashton appears to be that of the cotton districts in general. During the last month, the number of persons working full time has been reduced by nearly 6000, and that of persons working short time by about the same number; so that, while the pressure on the poor-rates has somewhat slackened, that on the operative classes, induced by the cotton famine, has again increased. The long continuance of the distress has told upon a numerous class not directly connected with the factories. The small tradesmen have lived on their capital until their capital was exhausted; and credit, in the present state of trade, it would not be worth their while to ask, or worth any one's while to give them. The labourers in engine-shops, in the manufacturing of various kinds of machinery, and so forth, have been thrown out of work, and they are falling by degrees upon the rates. The consequence of a prolongation of the present state of things must be the reduction to pauperism of much more than half the population of the cotton manufacturing districts. Neither Government, nor the Relief Committees, nor the Poor-Law Guardians, have any idea what is to be done, though one and all are forced at last reluctantly to open their eyes to the prospect before them, and realize its full significance; emigration is talked of; and the colony of Victoria has sent £5000 to be employed in bringing out persons of suitable age and character from Lancashire. But a sum like this is a mere drop in the bucket. And one unhappy feature about all these partial schemes of emigration is, that they propose to remove from Lancashire the élite of her working population, and leave the inferior part only behind. The managers, the overlookers, the mechanics, the best of the weavers and spinners, both men and women—the people who have given tone and character to the operative class—are those who will be taken away. This will seriously injure Lancashire, morally and economically. She has hitherto maintained her commercial rank chiefly by the excellence of her labour—it is now proposed to draft off her best labourers to lands where their work will for years to come be less valuable than it has been at home. She has prided herself on the high, moral, and social character of her operative class—it is proposed to deprive her of those from whom that class takes tone and character. This may be kind; it may be necessary; but it involves the confession that the greatness of our cotton manufacture is at an end. And if so, the commercial prosperity and pre-eminence of England is doomed to sustain the severest trial it has ever yet undergone.

The Parliamentary debates of the week have not been interesting. Mr. Bramley Moore made a sensible motion about the Brazilian quarrel, expressing the regret felt by the House at the occurrence of so violent a dispute, and the general wish for the renewal of more friendly relations with the empire. But the motion was ill-timed. As the Morning Herald remarked, we were wont of old to pardon criminals on occasions of Royal rejoicing; and on the eve of the arrival of the Princess Alexandra—now Princess of Wales—it would not have suited the convenience of the Court, the feelings of Parliament, the temper of the country, and the decorum of the occasion, that justice should be done even on so great a political offender as Earl Russell. And therefore the motion was withdrawn as a matter of course. It was nothing of itself; but as, if it had been intended to be passed, the tone of the speeches in its favour would have given it the force of a vote of censure, and compelled the Ministry to a division, so, as it was, the sting of the discussion lay in those speeches, and the Government was so thoroughly worsted in debate that the effect of the motion is not lost by its withdrawal. Mr. Layard spoke with much bad taste and a little bad temper, discourteous towards his opponents, uncandid in dealing with the facts, and actually insolent—after the manner of his chief—towards the Government of Brazil. Mr. Collier stated the case for the Government with the same disingenuousness and violence which are permitted to the counsel for the defence of a prisoner whom every one knows to be guilty; and even so far forgot his audience in his subject as to address them as "Gentlemen of the Jury." Sir Roundell Palmer did his best with the legal aspect of the case. But the Opposition had by far the best of it. Mr. Bramley Moore was somewhat feeble; but Mr. Fitzgerald's summary of the facts, and his comparison between the conduct of the Government towards weak and strong Powers, were very effective. Lord R. Cecil's strong and contemptuous tone was perhaps a little daring, but the sympathy of the House seems to have been with him; and Mr. Cobden was, as usual, very cruel and very telling. Except when he blunders upon naval and military questions, on which his well-known antipathy to armies and navies deprive him of all claim to attention, he is one of the most dangerous assailants in the House.

Much less interest was excited by Mr. Adderley's motion concerning tickets-of-leave. It is plain that Sir George Grey hopes to escape, under cover of a Royal Commission, from the judgment of a public which has by this time recovered from the terror inspired by garotters. But there is a very general feeling, as Mr. H. Seymour plainly told him, that the English system of prison discipline is a complete failure; there is a permanent uneasiness, in consequence of such events as the garotte robberies and the outbreak at Chatham, in regard to the growing audacity of the criminal population of London; and there is an all but universal conviction that Sir G. Grey is to blame for everything. He is one of those unfortunate men who always contrive to displease both the few and the many. It is scarcely possible for a Home Secretary to act well and wisely, and at the same time to be popular; but both in his prison administration, and in his use of the Royal prerogative of mercy, Sir George Grey has through his whole official life managed, with singular infelicity, to be invariably both unpopular and wrong. Were it not that Mr. Walpole, who held the same office under Lord Derby's Government, and Mr. Adderley, who knows more about criminals and convict discipline than any man on the Liberal side, are altogether indisposed to factious annoyance, Sir G. Grey would cause as much trouble to the Government as does his unlucky colleague, the Chief Secretary for Ireland. Moreover, Sir Robert Peel's dashing imprudence is not calculated to displease the world at large, though it may make him a good many bitter enemies; the Home Secretary's pedantic perversity offends every one, and nobody would grudge him a fall.

But Parliament, like the country, has really thought of little or nothing except the arrival of the Princess and the marriage which followed it. Poor Sir G. Grey was more worried about the order of the procession through the City than about the blunders which produce a few additional murders and a few score of extra robberies every year; and the anxiety of intending sight-seers and sight-makers has cost him more trouble than the indignation of those who object to see criminals petted and murderers pardoned.

Sir James Outram—"the Bayard of India"—the companion of Havelock, and indeed his superior, though he declined the command, in the relief of Lucknow, died in Paris at one o'clock yesterday morning. His death is a calamity for India; for few men with equal knowledge and authority are left to guide the Indian policy of the English Government.

EUROPE.

There is a hitch somewhere in the diplomatic intervention on behalf of Poland. The French press lays the blame at the door of the English Government, and complains that Earl Russell, after talking very largely about the wrongs of the Poles, refuses to join with France in any effort to redress them. The proposal of M. Drouyn de Lhuys to make a joint representation at St. Petersburg has, it is said, been decidedly rejected. The conduct of England in this business is the subject of a good deal of very uncomplimentary comment on the Continent. It is pointed out that the newspapers which support the English Government, and are supposed to speak its opinions, indulged at first in the most vehement advocacy of the cause of the Poles, and set themselves to prove that France must go to war on their behalf. The Emperor is said to have addressed a letter to the Czar, urging upon him to make some concession to the Poles, and to have already received an answer to the effect that no concession can be made until the insurrection is subdued. The debate on the question, which was to have taken place in the Senate this week, has been postponed.

The intelligence from Poland is very meagre. What there is is quite as contradictory and unreliable as usual. We have some particulars of the fights which we described last week as claimed as victories by both sides, and these particulars enable us to come to the conclusion that there, as heretofore, the lying has been pretty equally divided. We have an account from the Czas, a Polish organ, of the battle of Malogosez. According to it 4000 scythemen, under Langiewicz, attacked the Russians for five hours, and captured two guns, which, however, as the Russian artillerymen had carried away the horses, they could not remove. It will be remembered that the Russians claimed to have captured two guns, and so, in the letter, they did, but it was only the recovery in the afternoon of what they had lost in the morning. Ultimately, the insurgents found it necessary to retire, so the battle was certainly not a complete victory for them. The Russian account of the engagement of Myskow, which we also recorded last week, makes out that the insurgents retired at the first cannon-shot. Further Russian telegrams represent the engagements reported to have turned out advantageous to the insurgents in the district of Plock to be pure inventions, and claim to have cleared some districts of them entirely.

The only engagement of any importance announced this week, is one described from Cracow as fought near Tarnowa and Skala, between the Russians and the Poles under Langiewicz, in which the Russians were defeated and put to flight in great disorder; whilst a Warsaw account, apparently referring to the same contest, declares that the Russians surrounded a band near Skala, and dispersed the insurgents, with the loss of a hundred killed and wounded. We must leave our readers to choose between the two versions. It is possible that both may have some foundation. The Russians may have dispersed a small band of insurgents, and themselves have been routed subsequently by Langiewicz. The antecedent probability is always in favour of a Russian victory, when the troops engage in any numbers. For every champion of his country who bites the dust, three or four press to take his place. The defeated band disperses and reunites to be just as effective as it was before, and the Russian column has its work to do over again. The insurrection spreads—the hope of foreign intervention sustains the patriots in the unequal struggle. They are winning, by desperate sacrifices, time for Europe to aid them, even by the slow processes of diplomacy; they are putting its professions of sympathy to another and a final test.

The Kreutz Zeitung, of Berlin, which is likely to be well informed upon such a subject, speaks of the early departure from Warsaw of the Grand Duke Constantine as probable. In that event his place would be temporarily taken by General Count von Berg—a pretty certain indication, that the Russian Government has resolved to put the movement down at any cost, and will not have recourse to reconciliatory offers—and eventually by the Prince Alexander of Hesse, a brother of the Empress, and uncle of Prince Louis, the husband of the Princess Alice of England. This change is probable enough; the Archduke must be sick of Poland. His intentions when he undertook the Government were good, and he did not even allow the disgraceful attempts to assassinate him to deter him from his purpose; but at last, in sheer weakness and despair, he gave way to the men who surrounded him, and authorized the infamous conscription. On the other hand, we need scarcely say that the story of a Paris paper, that the Emperor means to re-establish the kingdom of Poland, separate it from his Empire, and make his brother Constantine its King, is one of the largest canards ever hatched.

The Whites, or Moderates, have, it is said, coalesced with the Reds, or extreme party, and avowed, by the hand of Count Zamoycki, their solidarity with the insurrection. On the other hand, it is said, that the appearance of Mieroslawski, of whom nothing has been heard for some time, is viewed with much distrust by the better classes of patriots.

Five hundred Poles of Posen eluded the vigilance of the Prussian Government, and crossed the frontier, near Słupce. At first they gained a slight advantage over a small detachment of Russians, but they were soon attacked by a large force from Konin and driven back with great loss. They fled across the frontier, and there, being challenged by a small detachment of Prussian troops, shot the captain, which was the signal for an attack which dispersed them again. They were mostly students. The official organ of the Prussian Government, recounting this incident, declares that in consequence of the organization of the insurrectionary party in Posen, and the terrorism exercised by it, it is impossible to despatch troops at the proper moment to prevent insurgents crossing the frontier, and that a larger force must be employed to oppose the terrorism of the Polish party of action. Large reinforcements have been since despatched to the Polish frontier. We have no doubt that the Prussian Government will find it hard work to prevent its Polish subjects from aiding their countrymen across the border.

The quarrel between the Prussian Government and the House of Deputies, or rather the nation, has not changed its aspect. The Government, by its official organ, has given the Deputies a hearty scolding, and they, on their part, have refused to vote the 30,000 thalers (£4500) included in the Budget for press purposes. They have, in the same manner, struck out a number of small items to show their dissatisfaction with the Government, a proceeding which displays no great dignity or wisdom. It is a very poor way of showing want of confidence in a Government to refuse petty votes of one or two hundred pounds, and want of confidence has been the sole reason assigned for the rejection.

Kossuth has issued an address to the Poles. Fortunately for them, the opinions of the ex-Governor of Hungary enjoy very little credit now. No doubt the priests who serve the altar of liberty ought to live by it, but there is a very strong and perhaps unreasonable prejudice against a sudden reconciliation between a standard-bearer of revolution and a Sovereign he has denounced as its chief enemy, when the reconciliation is known or supposed to have been cemented by money. The address of Kossuth might have been written in a Russian cabinet. It is decidedly calculated, if it has any effect at all, to help the Russians—it counsels the Poles to make Austria and Prussia their active antagonists, by demanding Posen and Galicia—and generally to make moderate Europe, which now sympathizes with them and is disposed to help them, rather anxious than not for their extirpation. Menotti Garibaldi was said to have passed through Berne, on his way to join the insurrection. We are glad, for the sake of the Poles, for that of his father, and for his own sake, to find from the Turin newspapers that he has not left Caprera. The Poles do not require the services or the name of a Garibaldi. The Cabinets of Europe can alone save them.

The belief we expressed last week that the Pope would not accept the resignation of Cardinal Antonelli has been verified. The Holy Father has insisted and entreated until he has induced the Cardinal to continue in the office which no other prelate of the Roman Court can fill so well. Whatever scandal can bring up against Antonelli as a man and as a Cardinal, little can be objected to him as a statesman, except by those whose aims he thwarts. He has a policy, which he steadily carries out, and which, undoubtedly, can alone retain the Papacy the remnant of its temporal power. Italian unity may yet be wrecked on the non possumus.

The Italian Senate has, in its turn, passed the Bill authorizing the loan of 700 million lire. A despatch addressed by the Marquis de l'Isle, charged with a secret mission in Italy, to M. Fould, giving a most gloomy picture of Italian finance, has somehow found its way into the columns of the Frankfort journal L'Europe, and produced an explosion of anger from the semi-official press of Italy. The publication is certainly somewhat ill-timed, so far as the interest of the Italian Government is concerned. It is not a very friendly thing—although it may be the honest thing to do—to show that your acquaintance, who is trying to contract a loan, is thoroughly insolvent.

The inhabitants of the Ionian Islands have just had notice given them that the annexation to Greece is not quite so certain as they supposed. The Lord High Commissioner has prohibited a meeting, at which the Archbishop of Corfu should have presided, to express the desire of the Corfiotes for the union; and the police have received instructions to suppress all assemblages called for a similar purpose.

The sentiment of nationality seems to be strongest in those who have the least right to talk about it. The Ionians are a mongrel race, more Italian than anything else, and the so-called Greeks of the mainland have as little Hellenic blood in them as the North-American Indians. Yet the Ionians rave for the annexation to Greece, and are prepared to abandon for its attainment the security of life and property, the moderate taxation, and the universal protection they now enjoy; and the Greeks, quite unable to form a settled Government of their own, a prey to almost complete anarchy, put forward claims to dominion over the whole of Turkey in Europe, on the ground that it is their heritage as Greeks. The news from Greece is most unsatisfactory. The National Assembly has, indeed, appointed a Ministry responsible to itself, and it has authorized a loan of six million drachmas, a little more than £200,000, but the Ministry has no power outside Athens itself, and may fall any day by a demonstration, as the Provisional Government did; and no Greek is patriotic enough to lend his country a drachma. Things go every day from bad to worse. The failure to get a King from another house has revived rumours of an attempt to restore the Bavarian dynasty; in reply to which Mavrocordato, the new Minister for Foreign Affairs, has issued a circular declaring that no Prince of the House of Bavaria can reign in Greece "unless he cuts his way to the throne through rivers of blood and piles of dead bodies;" and the Bavarian Consul has been arrested upon the charge of conspiring against the Government of Greece.

The Greeks are greatly to be pitied. They had a chance of making themselves a nation. They seemed disposed to use it. They have been sacrificed to the petty jealousies of the great Powers, or more correctly, to the fussy ignorance of Earl Russell.

It seems probable that Prince Couza, the Hospodar of the Moldo-Wallachian Principalities and his National Assembly will try to settle their differences by the last argument of blows. The Assembly is composed of the boyards or great landed proprietors, and the populace is on the side of the Prince. Turkey looks eagerly on, with the hope of regaining a little of the power which she has lost since the Treaty of Paris; and Russia, as well as her difficulties in Poland will allow, is on the alert to pursue the great purpose which the Crimean war scotched but did not kill. Prince Couza refused not unnaturally, we must admit, to allow the deputation of the Assembly which presented the address we mentioned last week, to read it to him.

A telegram from Ragusa announces that the Turks—meaning the Mahometan inhabitants of the neighbourhood—attacked, without cause, a Christian village, compelled the Christians to take refuge in the mountains, and carried away their cattle. A second telegram from Ragusa announces that an order had been sent from Constantinople to the Pasha of the Province to punish the Mussulman inhabitants of Kalachin who attacked and plundered a Christian village. The two telegrams, no doubt, refer to the same affair. There is very little to choose between the Mussulman and the Christian inhabitants of these parts of the Turkish empire. The only difference is, that the former murder and pillage in the name of Mahomet, and the latter in the name of Christ. All telegrams from Ragusa must be taken with extreme reserve; they do the Turks about as much justice as the Russian bulletins do the Poles.

PARLIAMENTARY NOTES.

THURSDAY, MARCH 5.—HOUSE OF LORDS.
No business of interest was transacted.

THURSDAY, MARCH 5.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

In answer to several questions, Sir G. Grey reiterated explanations previously given in regard to the Royal procession on Saturday.—On the order for going into Committee of Supply, Sir J. Jervoise rose to put a question to the Treasury on the subject of treasure-trove. He was interrupted by the appearance of the Usher of the Black Rod, who required the appearance of the House at the bar of the Lords to hear the Royal assent given to the Prince of Wales' Annuity Bill, and another Bill for postponing payment of Bills of Exchange due on Saturday.—On Mr. Speaker's return, Sir J. Jervoise proceeded, and commented on the fact that Lord Palmerston had himself appropriated a gold "torque," or ornament of an ancient Briton, found on his estate. The Premier explained that the grant under which the estate was held gave him a right to all treasure-trove.—Mr. F. Peel explained the rights of the Crown, and said that the circulars recently issued with regard to those rights were found to contain errors of law, they had been withdrawn.

Mr. Cobden rose to call attention to the maintenance of great numbers of obsolete vessels of war in the navy. He did not mean to include small wooden vessels—frigates, corvettes, gunboats, and so forth—which were useful for maintaining the police of the seas. He complained only that we have 105 wooden ships of the line, which are quite useless, inasmuch as a single shell would convert them into mere slaughter-houses, and they could not possibly encounter even a small iron-clad vessel. The American Government had been wiser than we; it had built no line-of-battle ships. American experience had recently proved the helplessness of the largest wooden vessels against the smallest iron-sided. Our 105 liners had cost about twenty millions; one half of which had been simply wasted by the Admiralty's continuing to build liners after other nations had abandoned the practice. When Lord Derby's Government came into office in 1858 they appointed a cabinet committee to inquire into the state of the navy, and the comparative progress made by England and France since 1852. That committee reported; and their report, embodied in a Treasury Minute, was laid on the table of the House of Commons after Sir John Pakington had introduced and carried his naval estimates. That Minute, he supposed, was a party dodge. It reflected on the conduct of the Admiralty—pointed out that the French Government had got far ahead of us in converting sailing ships into screws, and recommended that our Admiralty should follow the example. But Sir John Pakington, though he did convert sailing-ships into screw frigates, also built screw liners; and this while laying down iron-clads, which must make liners useless. While he was doing this, and while he was declaring that France was making dangerous attempts to rival us in line-of-battle ships, he had in his possession the Minute stating that France had given up building line-of-battle ships, and turned all her attention to iron-clad frigates. Then Lord Clarence Paget, who had formerly insisted on the uselessness of line-of-battle ships, and the superiority of small vessels, had, since he came into office, done as his predecessors had done—encouraged the building of line-of-battle ships, on which, even within the last few years, large sums of money had been wasted. It was in vain to hope that any effective responsibility could be attached to the Ministers who had misled the country. But both Sir John Pakington and Lord Palmerston had always been trying to get up a panic by alleging that France was trying to rival us at sea—a statement which was wholly unfounded. We must not allow ourselves to be hurried by similar allegations into having wooden ships plated with iron, when, by waiting a few months, we might have ships made entirely of iron. There were 30,000 men employed in these useless wooden ships, and by that number the force voted for the navy might safely be reduced. He accused the country gentlemen of desiring a large expenditure, threatened them with the vengeance of the £10 householders, and concluded by urging a reduction in the number of men voted for the navy.—Lord R. Montague said that the reconstruction of the Admiralty was as necessary as the reconstruction of the navy had been.—Lord Clarence Paget asked what Mr. Cobden would have Government to do? There were not 30,000, but only 900 men in wooden ships of the line. Mr. Cobden had eulogized American naval management. But the Americans were the last people in the world to take up iron-clad ships, and though it was true that they did not build line-of-battle ships, they built "frigates" fit to take their place in the line of battle, in order to be able to boast of victories over British frigates, and of matching their frigates against British ships of the line. The Minutes of Lord Derby's Government referred to by Mr. Cobden showed that in six years France had added to her navy thirty-eight steam liners, and England only thirty-three; and, therefore, that Government did right to increase our navy. Great difficulties had been found in manning our ships. Now we had a sufficiency of men; chiefly continuous service men; and if we broke faith with them now, we should find it almost impossible to get them back in time of need.—Sir John Pakington complained that Mr. Cobden had made a violent attack on his administration, without the usual courtesy of giving him notice. It was a pity that people should talk on subjects they did not understand. The Minute referred to had never been intended for publication; but, having been mentioned by him, it had been called for and laid before the House. It had been his duty to provide an efficient fleet of wooden screw steamers, both by building and by conversion; for he could not tell whether or not the iron-clad frigates would prove a success. In conclusion, he said that he should always look back with pride on his naval administration in 1858-59, in spite of Mr. Cobden's censures thereupon. Sir S. M. Peto said that with an iron-clad fleet we should require fewer men. He insisted that Mr. Cobden was right as to the number of men employed in wooden line-of-battle ships. He stated that some of the armour-plated ships had been so much injured by the weather, that their plates had become quite loose.—Mr. Bentinck defended the Admiralty.—Mr. Cobden had charged him with wasting ten millions sterling, the very sum which Mr. Gladstone, with Mr. Cobden's assistance, had wasted during the last five or six years. The men now employed in wooden ships would be wanted for iron-clads as soon as those were built, and it would not pay to dismiss them in the meantime. The worst of all economy was that which was always reducing to-day and increasing to-morrow. If we had had such a fleet as we have now, the late Russian war would have been brought to an end in three months.—Sir Charles Wood said that the navy had for many years been in a state of transition. The progress of the science of naval construction had compelled the Government to make frequent and very expensive changes. Sir John Pakington had very properly converted into screw ships all sailing vessels fit for conversion; whilst that was doing, experiments were made on iron-plated vessels, which resulted in their adoption. At present there were thirteen line-of-battle ships in commission, with 9176 men. It was not true that the iron-plated vessels had been damaged by the weather, their armour was not shaken at all. The House then went into Committee, and the Naval Estimates were passed.

After the House resumed, Mr. Gladstone explained certain changes which he proposed to make in the Tobacco Duties, Malt Duties, and Post Office Savings Banks' Bills. A Bill to provide relief in certain cases in which the present Marriage Law of Ireland bears hard on Protestant Dissenters was read a second time, after some debate, and the House adjourned at half-past 10 o'clock.

FRIDAY, MARCH 6.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

A Bill to regulate the recovery by Poor-law Guardians of the cost of maintaining illegitimate children was read a second time, and referred to a Select Committee. Some other business of no interest was transacted, and the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, MARCH 6.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

At Lord Palmerston's request, Mr. Baillie Cochrane postponed till the 16th a motion of which he had given notice regarding our relations with Greece.

Mr. Bramley Moore rose to call attention to the recent quarrel with Brazil. Our trade with that country was greater than with any other foreign country, save two; and there was property in Brazil belonging to British subjects to the amount of probably twenty millions sterling, which had been jeopardized by the conduct of our Government. The circumstances of the wreck of the Prince of Wales were simply these. The vessel was driven on a low shore, where, during a south-east gale, no ship could be saved. It was alleged that the crew were murdered; but of this there was no evidence whatever; indeed, all the facts seemed to point to a contrary conclusion. Some plundering had, it appeared, taken place. The owner of the ship had made violent and unfounded statements and extravagant demands, apparently with no other view than that of getting compensation, and his assertions had been supported by Mr. Vereker, our Consul at Rio Grande do Sul, and by the British Government. To enforce his claims they had had recourse to very violent measures. Lord Russell had justified these measures by talking of what would have been done had a Brazilian ship been wrecked and plundered on the coast of Cornwall. But that part of the Brazilian coast on which the Prince of Wales had been wrecked was a desert, and on similar coasts in this and in other countries wrecking still constantly took place, the offenders were not punished, and compensation was not made. In the present case delays had occurred, for which our Government, rather than that of Brazil, was responsible; and at last, when the matter might have been settled peaceably, a collision was brought on by the precipitate conduct of our Minister at Rio. An offer of arbitration had been made, but on the inadmissible condition that Brazil should first admit her liability. If we had had a prudent representative on the spot the whole matter might have been arranged amicably. The mischief had arisen from the conduct of Mr. Vereker and Mr. Christie, the former of whom had been long suffering from nervous delusions, while the latter had quarrelled with his own attachés and several of his diplomatic colleagues. He hoped that the Government would take such steps as would conciliate Brazil and establish cordial relations between the two countries. He moved "That this House has learned with regret the interruption of amicable relations between this country and Brazil; and this House expresses the desire that Her Majesty's Government may take such measures to restore a cordial understanding between the two countries as may be consistent with the character and honour of this country, having, at the same time, a just regard to the dignity and honour of a friendly and independent Power."—Mr. Collier said that a Sovereign had a right to make reprisals when there was a denial or a delay of justice. Every Government was bound to control its subjects, and if it failed to do so, it must take the consequences. It appeared to him that the case against Brazil might be thus summarized:—"An English vessel was wrecked upon your coasts. All on board her perished. Probably some of the crew were murdered. It is certain that their bodies were stripped and plundered. It is admitted by yourselves that wholesale robbery took place upon the cargo and the effects of the passengers. Those functionaries in the locality to whom you entrust the administration of justice, for whose conduct you are responsible, whose duty it was immediately to repair to the spot to succour the survivors, if any, and to protect the cargo, or at least to take prompt measures for the apprehension of the offenders and the restitution of the stolen goods, and to hold an immediate inquest on the dead bodies, were in all probability accomplices in the atrocious crimes which they were bound to investigate and punish. It is certain that they failed in their duty." (Cries of "No.") Failing to obtain justice we had recourse to reprisals. The inhabitants of Albardao, where the wreck took place, were habitual plunderers. News of the wreck had reached Mr. Vereker through Soares, who incidentally mentioned at Rio Grande do Sul that some English bodies had been washed ashore. Mr. Vereker, who was then perfectly sane, went to the spot. He found in the house of Soares two new English Bibles and some broken packing cases. On the shore he found portions of the cargo in a condition which showed that they had been landed dry, and plundered. The inspector of the coast would not allow him to see the bodies that had been washed ashore. Inquests were afterwards held, but so late that the cause of death could not be ascertained. The Brazilian authorities acted so tardily that all the culprits escaped. Two officials were dismissed, but against Soares no proceedings were taken. These facts were conclusive against the Brazilian Government, and Lord Russell had acted quite rightly in having recourse to reprisals.—Lord Robert Cecil said that we never thought of having recourse to reprisals when Italian brigands seized British subjects and held them to ransom. If official neglect justified reprisals then the escape of the Alabama from Liverpool would furnish the United States with just grounds for war. He thought that the Brazilian authorities had acted promptly and vigorously, but the case of the Prince of Wales was not our only ground of quarrel with Brazil. We had now asked the King of the Belgians to arbitrate on a dispute arising out of the arrest of three British officers charged with being drunk and disorderly. Brazil deserved from us the utmost consideration, and yet we had bullied and humiliated her, because of a trumped-up charge resting on the testimony of a mad Consul, and three tipsy sailors.—Mr. Buxton thought that, whatever objection might be made to the peremptory tone of Earl Russell's despatches, the noble earl had displayed a very commendable love of justice and good temper in offering to submit the case to arbitration.—Mr. C. Bentinck supported the resolution. He saw no reason to think that the Brazilian Government had behaved otherwise in the matter than they would have done if the parties interested had all been Brazilian subjects; and if he was right in that conclusion there was manifestly no justification for the extreme measure which Her Majesty's Ministers had adopted.—Mr. Seymour Fitzgerald pointed out that the scene of the wreck was seventy-eight miles from Rio Grande; and yet the authorities at that place had gone down at once and made inquiries with all possible speed. He was sorry to say that Brazil had always been violently and harshly used by Lord Palmerston. In the present instance Lord Russell had made outrageous accusations against the Brazilian Government on the ex-parte statement of Mr. Vereker; but for six months he said nothing about compensation. When he did, the Brazilian Government denied its liability, and it was right to do so, for it had showed no negligence. As to Soares, there was no evidence against him, and it was simply impossible for the Brazilian Government to put him on his trial. The charges made by Lord Russell against Brazil were unfair and unfounded; it was not the fault of the authorities that some of the culprits had escaped beyond their jurisdiction. There was a painful contrast between the violent conduct of Lord Russell towards Brazil, and his patient endurance of wrongs inflicted on British ships in the United States. Mr. Fitzgerald concluded by condemning, in the strongest terms, the abusive language of Lord Russell's despatches to the Brazilian Minister, and his general tone towards foreign Powers. Mr. Layard said that on a careful examination of the evidence it was impossible to escape from the belief that some of those seamen had been murdered, and that the Brazilian authorities had refused to cause a searching inquiry to be instituted into the transaction. The Brazilian Government had been given to understand that any proposal they might make for any amicable settlement of the question, unaccompanied by any preliminary condition, would be taken into consideration by Her Majesty's Ministers. No such proposal, however, had come from them; and it should be borne in mind that when redress was claimed for an alleged grievance it was usual that any suggestion for a peaceful termination of the difference should proceed from the defendant, and not from the complainant. If the Brazilian Government had met Her Majesty's Government from the commencement in a frank and an earnest spirit the question might easily have been brought to a satisfactory conclusion. He believed that if the present resolution were adopted, British life and British property would be exposed to a new danger in every quarter of the world; and upon that ground he trusted that it would not receive the sanction of the House of Commons.—Mr. Cobden said he found it impossible to attach complete credit to the evidence upon the English side throughout that controversy. A morbid suspiciousness seemed to pervade all the views of Mr. Consul Vereker, who was our principal witness; and there was no satisfactory proof of any of the gloomy conclusions which he was perpetually drawing. There existed, besides, positive evidence that he had at one time been labouring under a state of hallucination as to the danger to which he was personally exposed; and in no court of justice would the testimony of such a person in a case of this description be regarded as trustworthy. But even if some of those seamen had been murdered, such a circumstance would not justify the demand we had made of the Brazilian Government, unless it could be shown that that Government had rendered itself an accomplice in the crime; and it would be wholly impossible to maintain such a position. He had reason to know that the British merchants at Rio Janeiro unanimously disapproved of the course which had been pursued by our Government upon that occasion, and that they disapproved of it because they could not be led to believe that the Government of Brazil really meant to offer any insult or to make any denial of justice to the representatives of this country. He had only to add that he could not help condemning that system of secret diplomacy which alone had rendered possible the continuance of that miserable quarrel, and the peril to life and property which it had created. The Solicitor General said it was an undisputed principle of international law that when a Government refused to proceed against any portion of its subjects who had despoiled foreigners, that Government could be required to make compensation to those foreigners for the injury they had sustained. But that was precisely the nature of the present question. It appeared from the acknowledgments of the Brazilian authorities themselves, that a robbery of a part of the cargo of the Prince of Wales had taken place, and that the population generally of the scene of the wreck had been implicated in that crime. It was equally manifest that the Brazilian Government had refused to prosecute the offenders in any earnest spirit; and, indeed, they had refused to examine witnesses upon the evidently futile pretext that they could not compel their attendance. Her Majesty's Ministers had acted in the matter solely from a desire to protect British interests, and to convince foreign Governments that British subjects could not be plundered with impunity.—Mr. Bramley Moore stated that he did not mean to press his resolution.—The resolution was accordingly withdrawn.

MONDAY, MARCH 9.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

The Duke of Somerset requested Lord Malmesbury to postpone the motion of which he had given notice, respecting the arrest of certain British officers at Rio de Janeiro.—Lord Malmesbury consented, expressing, at the same time, a strong opinion that officers of the navy should wear their uniform when on shore in foreign countries.—The Duke of Somerset said that the usual practice was to wear the uniform in countries with which we were not on friendly terms, but not otherwise.—Lord Hardwicke said that, if that was the case, the practice must have altered much since his time.—The subject then dropped.

Lord Grey moved for a Select Committee to inquire into the propriety of enabling the owners of settled estates to charge them with terminable annuities for the purpose of taking shares in railways likely to increase the value of the land. A recent law allows them to incur such charges for the purposes of draining and building, with the approval of the Enclosure Commissioners, and as the construction of a railway would often benefit an estate as much as draining or building, he thought that the privilege accorded in one case might be reasonably extended to the other.—Lord Redesdale would not object to the inquiry, but he did not think well of the proposal. The construction of railways often occupied a very long period, and the cost was uncertain.—Lord Granville approved of the inquiry.—Lord Stanhope suggested that the whole law with regard to the investment of trust-moneys required revision.—The Lord Chancellor said that that law ought not to be referred to a Select Committee. As to Lord Grey's proposal, he thought the inquiry desirable, but he should like to see all the powers conferred on landowners embodied in one general act.—The motion was then agreed to.—Lord Dalhousie called attention to the failure of the City Police to preserve order on Saturday. Serious confusion had occurred during the passing of the procession, both at London Bridge and at the Mansion House. He thought that the civic authorities should no longer retain the control of the City Police; but that it should be amalgamated with that of the metropolis generally, under the control of the Home Office.—Several other peers spoke, generally agreeing with the suggestion of Lord Dalhousie.—The House adjourned till Thursday.

MONDAY, MARCH 9.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

In answer to a question from Mr. Hennessy, Sir G. Grey explained the circumstances under which two officers of the metropolitan police had been sent out to Warsaw. The Grand Duke Constantine had expressed a great admiration of our police force, and a desire to establish something of the same kind in Poland. It was at his request that the officers were sent out to give all the information in their power.—The Russian authorities decided that our system was not applicable to that country, and the officers thereupon returned home.—Mr. Hennessy asked for the production of the letter in which the request had been made.—Sir George Grey said it was confidential, and he declined to produce it.

Mr. Adderley (one of the members of Lord Derby's Government, and a high authority on questions of social reform) moved an address to her Majesty, requesting that, pending the inquiry of the Royal commission on the subject, the Acts imposing conditions on tickets-of-leave granted to convicts should be strictly enforced. He complained that in the first place, nearly all convicts, whatever their conduct, were released at the expiry of the minimum period of incarceration. He complained, secondly, that they were never re-arrested, except on conviction for some fresh crime. There was no police supervision exercised over them as in Ireland, and the majority of them had notoriously returned to a life of crime.—Sir George Grey objected to the address. He said that the Acts referred to imposed no conditions on tickets-of-leave, but left the latter to the discretion of the Home Office. It would be difficult to establish a sufficient case for the recall of the ticket, except on fresh conviction. He asserted that only a few of the violent robberies which recently created such alarm were committed by released convicts.—Mr. H. Seymour said that everybody knew that the Irish system had succeeded and the English system had failed, and he censured Sir George Grey for supporting the latter.—Mr. Henley opposed the motion. He said that Parliament ought not to consider fresh legislation necessary whenever a temporary increase of crime took place.—Sir Stafford Northcote said that though the Acts in question did not specify the conditions to be imposed on convicts released on tickets-of-leave, it had been intended that those conditions should be a reality; but the Government had made them a sham.—Mr. Hadfield declared that only 10 per cent. of the released convicts were found to offend again.—Mr. Newdegate said that the abandonment of transportation was a great misfortune.—Mr. Bentinck opposed the motion.—Mr. Cave said that nobody knew what became of the great majority of ticket-of-leave holders. He thought the present system a failure, as being far too favourable to the criminal.—Colonel Sykes thought that something ought to be done to provide honest employment for released convicts.—Mr. Urquhart said that it would be difficult to work the Irish system in the great towns of England.—The motion was then withdrawn, and the House went into Committee of Supply.

Sir G. Lewis moved the Army Estimates. After referring to the reasons which had caused a considerable increase in the charge of the army since the period previous to the Crimean war, he congratulated the Committee upon its diminution this year, the amount of the present estimates being £1,000,000 less than that of last year's, which was £16,060,350, this year's estimates amounting to £15,060,237. The number of men, which was last year 152,403, was this year 148,242, being a reduction of 4161 men, which had been effected, not by a diminution of the number of battalions, which was the same as last year, but by reducing 100 rank and file in each battalion, with a few exceptions; and he stated the grounds upon which the Government did not think themselves justified in proposing a less number of battalions. After explaining the principal votes, and the reason of the increase or diminution of their sums, he moved the first vote of 148,242 for the land forces.—General Peel objected that the estimate did not show the correct number of men, there being two Indian regiments employed in China not included; and he moved that the number should be increased by so many men.—Mr. Massey (the Chairman of Committees) interposed. There is an old and very wise rule which forbids any grants to be made or increased except upon the motion of one of Her Majesty's Ministers; and Mr. Massey decided that a proposal to increase the number of men voted for the army (though in the present case a mere matter of form), was similarly precluded.—Several votes were afterwards discussed and agreed to. Some other business was transacted, and the House adjourned till Wednesday.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 11.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Sir J. Trevelyan (notorious for his hostility to the Established Church) moved the second reading of a Bill to allow to persons objecting to oaths the same privilege of making affirmation that is allowed to Quakers and Moravians.—The Attorney-General moved that the Bill be read a second time that day six months. He insisted that the rule of law was to require in every witness some profession of religious belief: a principle distinctly violated by Sir J. Trevelyan's proposal. The Bill also proposed to allow persons too young or too ignorant to take an oath to make affirmation, which he thought wrong.—Mr. Roebuck supported the Bill, objecting to the practice of administering oaths to children.—Mr. Henley opposed it, contending that it would lead to discussions as to the credibility of infidels before all the courts.—Several other members spoke.—Mr. Coningham, on behalf of the ultra-insignificant Radicals, denounced the policy of the Government as "reactionary and retrograde."—The amendment was carried by 142 to 96, so the Bill is lost.

Mr. Adderley moved the second reading of a Bill for flogging persons guilty of robbery with violence. After some discussion,

Sir G. Grey spoke against the Bill, declaring that there had been great exaggeration about the garrotte robberies.—Sir Stafford Northcote said that the ruffians for whom this punishment was proposed did not mind penal servitude, and it was the duty of Parliament to provide a penalty which they would fear.—The second reading was carried against Government by 131 to 68. Some formal business was transacted, and the House adjourned about half-past 5.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, March 11.

Our last report closed on a quiet market, with some irregularity in prices; Fair Dhollerah worth 16d.

On Thursday a better feeling was perceptible, and a disposition on the part of spinners and exporters to buy more freely at the recent decline, the sales reaching 6000 bales. On Friday a fair business was again done at steady prices, the sales reaching 6000 bales. The improved tone of the two previous days was quite maintained on Saturday, and with sales of 7000 bales prices were rather dearer, and in some instances $\frac{1}{2}$ d. to 1d. advance was paid on the forced sales of Tuesday and Wednesday.

On Monday, the market again opened with a good inquiry, and 6000 bales were sold; to-day a like amount has changed hands at firm prices. We quote Fair Dhollerah 16 $\frac{1}{2}$ d., and Middling American 21d. to 21 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.

The main cause of the improved feeling here is attributable to the recent accounts from America, which, by most people are read in favour of a long continuance of the war. For while less is said of the dissatisfaction of the Western States, the Conscription Bill providing for another army, has passed both Houses of Congress. The feeling that was of late entertained here by many, that the North would soon have to succumb through the difficulty of raising men and money, is being gradually removed, and a strong conviction growing in most men's minds this unhappy war is still far from a close.

MANCHESTER, Tuesday, March 10.

The improvement in the tone of the daily reports of the Liverpool Cotton Market, during the past week, together with the later and more satisfactory telegrams from India, have imparted a little more cheerfulness to our yarn and cloth markets.

In India mule yarns there has been a moderate amount of business done at an advance of fully $\frac{1}{2}$ d. per lb. on the rates of the week previous; but as these qualities are comparatively heavy in stock, and the prices obtained being rather low, there is no inducement as yet for spinners to replenish their stocks.

Yarns for export to the Continent have been very much neglected this week, hardly any sales being reported.

Home trade yarns, from Nos. 32s. to 40s., twist and pincops, were in better demand; but as spinners held out firmly for an advance on last week's quotations, very little business was effected in them. Cloths suitable for shipment to India have been in better request, and a considerable business has been done in jaconets, mulls, and shirtings, at slightly improved prices.

Madapolams of particular weights have also been bought up, and in some cases orders have been given to make.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE CONFEDERATE CONGRESS.

Since our last intelligence the Confederate Congress had been chiefly in secret session, and although our files of Charleston papers come down to the 12th of February, the items of congressional proceedings are few and of slight importance.

On the 2nd, in the Senate, the day has been occupied in discussing the bill to organize the Supreme Court: the question being on an amendment limiting the jurisdiction of the Court.

In the House the Exemption Bill was further discussed until adjournment.

On the 3rd, the Supreme Court Bill was further debated in the Senate without result.—The House was chiefly engaged in considering the Exemption Act.—The substitute offered by Mr. Collier, of Virginia, was rejected.

On the 5th, the Appropriation Bill was passed in the Senate.

Mr. Johnson, of Georgia, introduced a bill proposing an amendment to the Constitution, providing for the peaceable secession of any State in the event of a failure to adjust any grievance complained of. The bill was referred to the Committee on Judiciary.

The Supreme Court Bill was further debated in the House.

Numerous bills and resolutions were introduced—one proposing to abolish the Post-Office Department was laid on the table.

On the 9th, Senator Hunter, Chairman of the Committee on Finance, reported a bill for funding the Public Debt and curtailing the Currency. The Committee adopts substantially the plan proposed by the Secretary of the Treasury in his recent report to Congress.

On the 10th, the Senate while in secret session passed the Finance Bill. The provisions of the bill are not yet made public, but are supposed to be substantially those recommended by Mr. Memminger.

On the 11th, in the Senate, Mr. Phelan, from the Select Committee, reported back the bill to impress cotton for public use, with a recommendation that it pass. The Senate then went into secret session to debate the Bill.

ITEMS FROM SOUTHERN PAPERS.

Mr. Henry Laurens Pinckney, the founder of the Charleston Mercury, and for upwards of fifteen years, its editor and proprietor, recently died in that city.

John R. Edmunds, Esq., of Halifax, Virginia, recently presented to the Court of that country, for distribution among the families of soldiers, fifteen thousand pounds of bacon, worth some ten thousand dollars, besides making a benevolent disposition of an additional quantity. Early in the war he clothed and equipped a company.

The extensive distillery of Mason and Harman's, formerly Stern's, at Rackets near Richmond, was destroyed by fire on the night of the 10th of February.

C. L. Edwards, Esq., Assistant Cashier of the Bank of Charleston, South Carolina, died at Columbia, on the morning of February 11th, after a protracted illness from consumption.

Two hundred and fifty citizens of New Orleans, recently left that city, by permission of Gen. Banks. Some of them have arrived at Jackson, Mississippi, and many of them in a destitute condition.

A supper given in Mobile, Alabama, recently, for the benefit of the Protestant Orphan Asylum, netted the handsome amount of $5,200.

Colonel J. C. Wilkinson, commanding the 8th Mississippi regiment, was mortally wounded at the battle of Murfreesboro. He was in every sense a noble, honest, and honourable man.

The Southern papers are discussing the merits of a new preparation of army food, called extract of flesh, of which the following is a description:—

A half ounce represents the whole amount of nutriment in a pound of fresh beef. The method of preparation is thus described:—"The whole process consists in taking lean beef, free of bone and fat, chopping it fine as when used for sausages or mince meat, and mixing it with its own weight of water. It is then slowly heated to boiling and allowed to boil briskly for a moment or two, when it is strained through cotton cloth to separate the coagulated albumen and fibrin. The evaporation to dryness of the solution must be conducted at a low temperature by a water bath or a steam heat. The powder is readily soluble in water. When properly dried it will keep for months. Enough can be stored in an ordinary watch box to sustain a soldier for a week. An ordinary porcelain lined kettle, holding a gallon, is sufficient for the preparation of the extract. To dry the solution put the kettle into a larger vessel containing hot water."

Foreign Correspondence.

PARIS, March 10.

The Polish question continues to engross public attention here. The excitement which the apprehension of immediate war had given rise to has subsided; but the continuance of the insurrection keeps up a certain amount of vague uneasiness.

As for the insurrection, beyond the fact of its spreading, and of the Russian soldiery being guilty of the greatest atrocities, sparing not even the Russian functionaries who happen to be residing in towns of which the inhabitants are ordered to be put to the sword, very little is known. The soldiers and officers of the Czar appear to combine all the savage ferocity of the insurgent Sepoys with the cold-blooded cruelty which has branded with infamy the Northern heroes, Turchin, Butler, and M'Neil. It is impossible to conjecture how it is all to end. Diplomacy is busy—autograph letters have been exchanged between the Emperor and the Czar, but common sense suffices to make us feel that no negotiations can be effectual whilst the two parties in the field are apparently fairly matched, and bent on a war of extermination.

From Italy we have had the sensation announcement of a falling out between the Pope and Cardinal Antonelli; followed, I need hardly say, by the redintegratio amoris. The cause of the quarrel was a pique of M. de Merode, the favourite chamberlain of His Holiness, whose political zeal and hatred of the gifted cardinal, his rival in the affections of the Pope, are by no means equal to his abilities. The cloud has blown over by this time.

Judging from their acts, their policy, their speeches, it is perhaps a rash hypothesis to suppose that the governing clique at Washington can boast among them one honest politician, and it were a hopeless as well as a thankless task to attempt to open the eyes of the wilfully blind. None but such could pen such despatches as Mr. Seward's last reply to M. Drouyn de Lhuys. But it may not be inexpedient to acquaint the bulk of the population of the Federal States, and it may cheer and encourage our friends both North and South, to be made aware of the fact, that the conviction that the North are utterly sick and weary of the war is now recognized by every shade of opinion in Europe. Look at the papers in England: every journal of standing and respectability—with the single exception of the London organ of Mr. Bright—however they may differ on other points, and they do differ pretty considerably, all, Morning Herald, Morning Post, and Times, agree in their views of the state of public feeling in America. In France, where public opinion has not full play, the only opinion of real weight in public affairs is that of the Government. The despatches of M. Drouyn de Lhuys were plain enough to understand, but as diplomatic courtesy is naturally precluded from calling a spade a spade. Mr. Lincoln and his associates refused to see the meaning which was obvious to every one out of his Cabinet that read the French despatches. It is probably to prevent any possibility of any further apprehension of this kind that the Imperial Government has caused to be inserted in the Moniteur, in the shape of a letter from New York, a statement of its views of the state of affairs throughout the length and breadth of the North. Though not strictly an official document, the insertion of that letter in a prominent part of the Moniteur the nature of its contents, and the significance of its tone invest it with all the importance of a state paper. It is not usual for the French official print to treat with such scant ceremony the government of a country with which France is, I will not say on friendly terms, but at peace. Hear how the Moniteur describes Mr. Lincoln's last convulsive effort to raise an army:—

"That a state which has successively called under arms, first, 150,000, then 300,000, then 600,000 volunteers, spent several thousand millions of dollars as premiums for enlistment, and resorted to 'draughting' as a last resource, should after a war of only two years' duration, be at a loss for men to continue the struggle, is an extraordinary and abnormal fact—yet that such is the fact is proclaimed by no less an authority than the United States Senate itself."

The writer then gives an outline of the last extraordinary measure by which the Federal Congress has actually contrived to surpass itself in exciting the derision and contempt of civilized nations, and proceeds:—

"What has become of those clouds of volunteers that encumbered Washington last autumn? The enemy's fire, disease, the winter can account for a good many no doubt, but the losses heavy as they may be, are out of all proportion, and a state of things which requires such extraordinary efforts * * * It can only be accounted for by the fact which the democratic party have already proclaimed, and which the abolitionists sturdily deny, (of course) but which the measures they are compelled to resort to show to be true, viz:—that the soldiers are (at least) quite as tired of the war as the citizens themselves."

The Moniteur proceeds to demonstrate the correctness of the conclusion it has arrived at, by arguments which Messrs. Lincoln, Seward and Co., will, no doubt, think unfeeling—the official print seems to be strangely forgetful of the fact that those high and mighty seigniors (I cannot with any regard for truth call them "grave and reverend") hold it treason to doubt their ipse dixit:—

"If the soldiers were not weary of this struggle should we have beheld the Army of the Potomac melting away without fighting—that immense agglomeration of men, to form which the United States had devoted the best of their blood and treasure? Letters from officers have described the perpetual flow of desertion, mixed with outbreaks of mutiny which paralyzed in their hands that formidable instrument of war. Its dissolution, which discontent had commenced, weariness completes."

The Moniteur then goes on to give a rapid but graphic and striking sketch of the utter inaction which prevails in the Federal camps from the banks of the Potomac to those of the Mississippi. Tom is doing nothing and Jack is helping Tom. The Federal army is doing nothing, and the Federal navy is helping the Federal army:—

"An immense feeling of hesitation (une immense hesitation) hovers over the war. What are they waiting for? Reinforcements? Why, by their own confession, the Federal Government have not one man at their disposal. The idea is ridiculous,—it seems to be considered so even at Washington as the white population is summoned en masse."

With cruel irony the Moniteur asks if the North are waiting for another "strategic movement." This is the unkindest cut of all, and even the exposure of the absurdity of the Yazoo Canal, and the inaction of Grant in Tennessee and Rosencranz before Vicksburg, "where his army is wasting under the influence of miasma and marsh fever," appears good nature itself when compared with this cruel sarcasm. Surely this should be sufficient to satisfy even Mr. Seward. In case, however, that model of transatlantic diplomacy should not think his last dispatch adequately answered by what I have quoted above, there is more to come. He is told no longer in the urbane innuendoes of M. Drouyn de Lhuys, but with galling bluntness, that it is all over with the war, that the soldiers will no longer fight, because they feel that it is all up with the Union, and that it is hopeless to attempt to restore it; because they have no sympathy with abolitionist cant; because they know that the South are waging a defensive war, not an aggressive war; because they are conscious that they are risking their lives for no practical object; because, in short, the war "don't pay."

So much for the war, and so much for public feeling in the Northern States, but, in addition, the Moniteur acquaints us with the desperate effort making by the desperadoes at Washington to retain their hold of the power they feel slipping from their grasp, by trying to overawe the State legislatures in the West by the myrmidons of Rosencranz; whilst on the Potomac a sanitary cordon is to be drawn round Hooker's army, across which no newspaper is to pass!

I mentioned last week an able paper by M. Hautefeuille, in the Revue Contemporaine, setting forth the fictitious character of the blockade of the Southern coasts, by Northern cruisers. A Southern resident in Paris, M. Edwin de Leon, has published in the Constitutionnel an able letter on the same subject, which has the rare merit of placing the principles which regulate the right of blockade, before the reader in a concise and lucid shape. M. de Leon points out that whilst all the authorities on the subject have arrived at the conclusion that a blockade must be "effective" yet they differ very widely as to what an effective blockade consists in. According to the learned pundits, Hautefeuille, Wheaton, and Phillimore, to be effectually blockaded, a coast requires to be watched at a distance of four miles, at the outside, by a line of cruisers, sufficiently numerous as to prevent any vessel entering or leaving the blockaded ports. Lord Russell, however (probably as M. de Leon humourously remarks, owing to his being a veteran of the Liberal party), gives the most liberal interpretation to the term effective—holding, for instance, that half-a-dozen men-of-war would be sufficient to blockade effectually the coast of Spain, and a portion, considering the fact of Federal ships cruising off the Bahamas, constituting a blockade of Charleston harbour. Touching the late interruption of the blockade at that port and at Galveston, M. de Leon agrees with many writers on your side of the Channel and on this, that whatever doubts may be entertained as regards Charleston, there can be no question but that Galveston harbour was accessible for several days, and that a previous notification was indispensable before the blockade could be legally re-established.

About a week ago the Figaro, a scurrilous bi-weekly paper, which bears considerable resemblance to the Age and Satirist of former days, published a coarse attack on Mlle. Denain, an actress of the Theatre Francaise, whose daughter is about to be married to Edmund About, the novelist. These papers have a decided leaning to direct their filthy slanders against women whom they suppose to be unprotected. In this case, however, Figaro made a mistake. The day the article appeared, a friend of the lady's, M. Didier, went to the Figaro office, armed with a stout cudgel, wherewith he inflicted on the director of the paper, M. de Villemessant, a sound drubbing. M. Villemessant sent a brace of friends to M. Didier to ask satisfaction, and received the following reply:—

The only damage M. de Villemessant has sustained is in his skin—he has no claim to demand the satisfaction of a gentleman—I am not unwilling to pay what compensation he deems requisite for the injuries inflicted by my cane.

The public feel that M. de Villemessant has too long gone unpunished, and the universal verdict is "Served him right."

A NORTHERN EXPOSITION OF NORTHERN FINANCES.

The clearest exposition that has yet been made of the condition of Northern Finances, the exact extent of the resources of the country misruled by Mr. Lincoln, and the inevitable result of Mr. Chase's management will be found in the subjoined article, which we copy from a monthly periodical published in New York, and entitled The Old Guard, devoted to the principles of 1776 and 1787.

THE COST OF THE WAR, AND WHO MUST PAY IT.

The annual Report of the Secretary of the Treasury, which was laid before Congress at the opening of the session, produced a profound impression upon the public mind. The anxiety which before was growing in the community was deepened when the self-contradictory and dissembling Report from the Treasury Department confirmed latent fears of an approaching national bankruptcy. The course adopted by the Secretary last year was one that all-reflecting persons knew would lead to such a result if long persevered in; but the persistent declaration from members of the Government that "sixty days," "a few weeks," "two or three months," would put an end to the war, served, among those who put faith in such predictions, to keep alive a hope that peace would come before financial ruin. The insidious progress of paper promises was rapidly eating out the vitals of the nation, which looked for decisive victory in the field as the antidote to the fatal poison in its system. There seemed to be a race between financial destruction and military victory. If the latter should arrive, it might save the nation. If it came not, or came too late, it could perch only on the banners of a sunken ship, o'er which the billows of bankruptcy were making way. There are few persons who comprehend, in its full force, that which is meant by national bankruptcy resulting from discredited paper money. It is now seventy years since the country was involved in the ruin occasioned by the continental money of the Revolution, and few living had practical experience of those disastrous days, when money did not exist, trade was paralyzed, debts could not be collected, judgments could not be enforced, taxes were out of the question, and armed bands—even in Massachusetts—broke up the sittings of courts, while insurrection defied the execution of any legal authority tending to the collection of taxes. The life of the nation was as a flickering lamp which a breath would extinguish. Through the conciliatory wisdom of Congress, and the firmness of Washington, the difficulties gradually subsided under the influence of the union of States, which gave the Federal Government revenue through the customs, and enabled it relinquish claim to taxes which could not be collected. Its conciliatory conduct, after the lapse of one or two years, induced Rhode Island and Georgia to come back into the Union, and a season of prosperity was inaugurated.

How great soever may have been the dangers and disasters of that dark hour, these were as nothing to the ruin which is now impending from a similar cause. The country then was poor, and but little surplus capital existed in the shape of credit, while all the States were so exhausted by a long war, that necessary prudence tempered rising animosities. This is no now the case. Eighty years of profound peace and unexampled prosperity have made the country the envy of other nations, more particularly for its rapid development of that vast wealth which is evenly distributed among the people. There are now railroad bonds, mortgages, annuities, ground rents, life insurance, bank stocks, savings' deposits, and numerous other credits, to a value of more than 2000 millions, which have already become unsettled, and which, borne on the rising tide of Mr. Chase's paper scheme, are even now moving on the current to be swiftly engulfed in the flood of bankruptcy. In that hour, when the hands of every individual will be filled with "green-back" promises, and currency no longer exists, how and by whom will the $250,000,000 per annum of taxes, that Mr. Chase even now demands as the permanent "peace tax," be enforced? What Federal army will extort taxes from a ruined people? What courts or what juries will be found to accord judgments for debts contracted in depreciated paper and demanded in coin? The creditors of the Federal Government, if it should exist in that disastrous hour, will be numerous, but they cannot outnumber the ruined people no longer able to pay taxes to satisfy their claims. The question of taxation itself would speedily be the signal for collision between States. Thus, should the Constitution survive the assaults of the present party in power, taxation must be laid according to representation: Missouri and Massachusetts are of equal representation. The former has been devastated by the war until her wealth consists only in her land. Massachusetts has derived immense wealth from the war. Her factories, her ships, her jobbers, her contractors, her senators, and their favourites, her expeditions to the Southern coast, her pro-consul Butler, at New Orleans, have drawn within her borders the wealth of the nation, and they foster a war which pays so well. While the hearts' blood of the Middle and Western States has watered the battle-fields of the Union, New England has the profits of the war; but she has not taken a dollar of the general stock. New York has supplied the capital which Massachusetts has absorbed. When the necessity of taxation arises, the response will be the constitutional provision, that "the tax must be equal according to representation," and Massachusetts will pay no more than the ruined people of Missouri can pay—out of that ability the Government creditor will be paid but poorly.

The Secretary of the Treasury evidently foresaw the coming evil, and his Report is simply an attempt to relieve himself of the responsibility. This attempt was met by the Chairman of Ways and Means, who, in a speech Dec. 19th, attempted to repel the responsibility where it is due, says that—"when general bankruptcy overtook the nation, he would have the satisfaction to know that he tried to prevent it." The fact that the architects of ruin are already seeking to escape the falling fabric confirms the public dread, and imports increased caution to capitalists.

The Secretary, in his Report, gave the aggregate receipts and expenditures of the Government for three years as in the annexed statement.

The expenditures for the three years now half expired, it will be observed, are 2204 millions, or more than two-thirds of the whole British debt! This vast expenditure, the Secretary estimates, will leave a debt, at the close of the third year of war, of $1,744,685,586, which, at 6 per cent. interest, will bear an annual interest of $105,000,000. The annual interest of the British debt is $138,696,100. Hence, if the United States' debt could be contracted at 6 per cent., its actual burden upon the people would be three-fourths of the British debt. Now, the only nation that ever approached such a scale of expenditure before was the British, in the first fifteen years of the present century—that Government in one year expended $500,000,000, but they did so under peculiarly favourable circumstances. They commanded the ocean, and monopolized the commerce of the world. The inventions of steam, the loom, the cotton gin, &c., had wonderfully developed her manufactures, and she had the markets of the world to supply at monopoly prices. Owing to the disturbed state of the Continent, timid capitalists there, even from France, with whom she was at war sent to England large sums for safe-keeping. Under such circumstances she could borrow largely, and she did so; but her loans did not exceed 30 per cent. of the expenses. Of every £1,000,000 raised, £700,000 was from taxes, and £300,000 from loans. Notwithstanding this safe course, her stock fell to 48 per cent. once. The United States' Secretary now proposes to borrow 80 per cent. of the whole of an enormous expenditure—double the largest war expenditure ever undertaken in one year by the British Government—and he has the absurdity to assume that those loans can be contracted at par for 6 per cent., and makes large reliance to supply the capital upon a system of paper, which he knows to be fallacious.

Of this large sum required, nearly $1,500,000,000 is to be borrowed in the next eighteen months. The debt is now, indeed, in round numbers, $600,000,000; but of that sum only $200,000,000 is funded, and of that amount $100,000,000 falls due in 1864, and must be met.—The remaining $400,000,000 are due on demand, and must be provided for.

There are only three possible ways of raising the $1,000,000,000 demanded by the Secretary for the service of the next eighteen months:—1. To tax for the whole amount. 2. To borrow the money on issues of stocks at the market rate, whatever that may be. 3. To issue paper money to the amount that may be required. The question of taxation seems not to have entered into the views of either the Secretary or the Committee of Ways and Means. It was, apparently, taken for granted that, after Congress had repealed the direct tax of last year, and imposed the income and internal taxes, that the extent of taxation was reached. The Secretary estimates the receipt of the taxes for the year now half expired at $167,451,798, and for the fiscal year 1861 at $223,025,000, embracing the customs. He proposes to issue no more currency notes, but to borrow $1,000,000,000 on 6 per cent. stock, which he wishes to sell privately at his own discretion, not being limited in terms by Congress. This is the plan of the Secretary, including a proposition to create a National Bank Law, which is too evidently unpractical to enter into a discussion. The Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means also proposed to issue bonds for the sums wanted above $250,000,000, which he proposed to add to the notes now outstanding, making the Government currency $500,000,000. The question is apparently between stock bearing interest and paper money; but this is only apparent, since it is very evident, from the statements of both the Secretary and the Chairman, that but regard the resort to paper money exclusively as inevitable, and both seek to avoid the odium which, in the inevitable hour of national bankruptcy, will overwhelm the authors of the ruin.

The history of the financial operations of the Secretary hitherto would convince an ordinary man—and have doubtless fully convinced him—that loans are impossible, to any great extent, in the market. There is no such amount of capital in the country as $1,700,000,000 which can in the space of three years be taken from the employments of industry, and loaned permanently to the Government at 6 per cent. All questions of credit or discredit apart, this sum could not be raised, but at such an exorbitant rate of interest as would outbid all employments of industry, and, by so doing, stop that production of wealth on which the payment of the taxes depends. The sum expresses an investment of $400 in stock by every Northern family, in addition to all other property held. The Secretary feels the impossibility of the operation, since, in the last year, he has not been able to negotiate any important loan. In fact, since the war began, he has made no loans, except from the banks, who have thus invested money placed with them on temporary deposit, because it had, by the war, been driven out of its ordinary employments. It is to be borne in mind, that the capital which can be loaned to the Government consists only in that surplus which a man may possess over and above what he can employ in his business. In this country of vast natural resources there is never capital enough to carry on industry, and it always bears a high rate. According to last census returns, the amount of capital invested in productive industry in the Free States was $920,568,681. This included the real estate employed. This capital employed 100,000 factories, giving work to 1,250,000 persons active producers. The value produced was nearly double, or, $1,700,000,000. The average annual profit may be placed at 10 per cent., or $170,000,000 per annum. Out of that sum the expenses of the employees are to be met, and the remainder may constitute a surplus that can be invested on interest. If it is assumed that the amount to be invested may, one year with another, reach $100,000,000, then in ten years the nation will have saved $1,000,000,000 for investments. These investments now exist in various forms, as follows:—

State and City debts	$250,000,000
Railroad stocks	300,000,000
.. bonds	700,000,000
Banks	300,000,000
Insurance companies	200,000,000
Savings' deposits	200,000,000
Bonds and mortgages	200,000,000
Other miscellaneous—mines, gas, &c..	150,000,000
Total	$2,200,000,000

This is an approximation to the existing amount of surplus capital invested, and has been the product of at least eighty years' accumulation. Without deducting what existed when the Government was formed, the accumulation would have been at the rate of $30,000,000 per annum; but it has of late years been very rapid, and if put at $100,000,000 in time of peace, it will coincide with the fact that $1,000,000,000 were expended for railroads in the ten years ending with 1860. But in time of war there is no accumulation; on the contrary, one million men—one-fourth the active population—being in the army, production is small, and the immense waste of capital causes a rapid decline in amount. Under the tax law, the Government has constituted itself a partner in every man's business. It sends its agents to inspect books and stocks, and to exact, not a portion of the profits, but 3 per cent. on the production. This being $1,700,000,000, the tax on manufactures will be $55,000,000, which may be more than the profit. The tax on incomes draws a further sum from profits; and if the Secretary obtains the $150,000,000 that he estimates, it will sweep off all profits, and no accumulation will take place. It is now to be remembered that $900,000,000 are expended in keeping industry employed, and that $2,200,000,000 are invested in various securities, making $3,100,000,000 of capital in the country. The Government now comes forward and demands one-half of that capital in eighteen months. What will result? If it offers, by the depreciation of its stock, such a temptation as to make holders sell out other investments, it may tempt them to change. But this is impossible. They cannot change their investments to any extent, because to sell there must be buyers; and all securities, supposing the Government credit to remain as good as that of the States, will decline, step by step, with the Government stocks. Those who sell other securities to buy, will be obliged to sell cheap. If the Government stock sells so low as to induce employers to stop their enterprises, discharge their hands, and convert their capital into Government stock, the industry of the nation will come to an end, and with it the tax upon its production. But it will be observed that the $1,500,000,000 of loans that the Secretary requires, is estimated on getting the amount at par for 6 per cent. twenty-year stocks, and those stocks are now 75 per cent. for gold. Even if he could borrow at that rate, the amount of stock issued will be $2,000,000,000. He cannot, however, borrow at that rate. He must give such rates as will outbid all other interests, and to do so will as surely bankrupt the whole country as that he attempts it, if the credit of the Federal Government should, under the circumstances remain unbroken. This is, however, not the case; its credit abroad is already so disturbed, that all oblige-tions there held are being constantly sent here for realization, making the current of gold which flows out in such a broad stream more than sixty millions—or double the California supply—having been exported in the past year. The foreign capitalist, looking on upon a gigantic war, which, end as it may, will swallow up the resources of the country, naturally asks—Who are the payers of the obligations? The Federal Government presents itself, with increasing wants and depreciating credit, to borrow a sum equal to half the whole capital of the country, with the avowed object of destroying an industry, and deporting four millions of workers, which has been one of the most prolific sources of the existing wealth. During the forty years—1820 to 1860—according to the Treasury tables, there were exported $4,856,863,368 worth of domestic productions. Of this amount $3,250,300,000 was created by those workers which the proclamation of the President proposes to emancipate and deport out of the country, at an expense of many hundred millions of dollars. Whatever may be thought of this as a matter of State policy, it surely does not aid the chance of paying the Government debts. The object of the war, for which $1,500,000,000 must be borrowed, is avowed to be the extinguishment of an interest which produces $500,000,000 per annum. Thus, in any event, whatever may be the result of the war, the Northern industry must pay the whole of the war debt.

DETAILED ACCOUNT OF THE CAPTURE OF THE GUNBOAT ISAAC P. SMITH.

(From the Charleston Mercury, February 3.)

In Saturday's issue we briefly announced the capture of the Yankee gunboat Isaac P. Smith in the Stono River. We are now enabled to present to our readers the full particulars of the exploit.

Several days ago a secret expedition was organized, under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Yates, of the 1st South Carolina Regular Artillery, and dispatched to John's Island to attack the gunboats which occasionally prowl along the Stono. The force consisted of the following troops: The Siege Train, Companies A and B, commanded respectively by Captain B. C. Webb and Lieutenant L. W. Wilson, Major Charles Alston, jun., being in command of the battalion; Company F, of the Palmetto battalion of Light Artillery, under Captain F. C. Schulz; Company D, 1st South Carolina Regular Artillery, with a Light Battery, Captain F. H. Harleston; one Parrott gun, in charge of Lieutenant T. E. Gregg; Company I, 1st South Carolina Regular Artillery, Captain J. C. Mitchell; Companies H and I, of 20th South Carolina Volunteers, commanded respectively by Captain S. M. Roof, and Lieutenant M. Gunter, and acting as sharpshooters. During Thursday night these troops were posted at Legare's Point Place, and Grimbail's, on John's Island; Major Alston commanding the batteries at Grimbail's; Captain Harleston those at Legare's Point Place, and the sharpshooters being under charge of Captain Mitchell.

In the meantime a detachment of Lucas' (regular) battalion, under Captain John H. Gary, was posted at Mr. Thomas Grimbail's place on James Island, and further up the Stono.

They had three 24-pounder rifled guns, which were put in position 150 yards apart, and about 400 yards from the banks of the river. The guns were manned with detachments of Companies A, B, and C, under Lieutenants W. G. Ogier and E. B. Colhoun, and Captain T. B. Hayne. Further down the Stono, and on the James Island side, Major J. Welsam Brown, with two rifle guns, in charge of a detachment of the 2nd Regiment S. C. Artillery (late Lamar's) and with a detachment of the Georgia Battalion as sharpshooters, took up a position so as to man the channel.

On Friday afternoon, at half-past four o'clock, the enemy's gunboat, Isaac P. Smith, steamed up the river, passing the batteries of Major Brown and Colonel Yates, and came to anchor a little above, opposite the residence of Mr. Thomas Grimbail, and within fair range of the guns of Captain Gary. The Yankees made no attempt to land, and, after waiting about twenty minutes, Captain Gary ordered the battery to open, which it did in handsome style, sending its shots crashing audibly through the timbers of the gunboat. At the first discharge there was evidently great consternation on the Yankee decks, and one officer cried out, "Great God! what is this?" The vessel immediately slipped her cable and began a hasty retreat, fighting the battery as she retired. She threw grape, shot, and shell, with considerable accuracy, but without injuring any of our men. One grape shot struck the gun of Company C, leaving its trace longitudinally. The firing of our battery at this point was rapid and well executed. The gunboat in her flight soon came within range of the batteries of Colonel Yates, against which she then directed her broadsides. But the heavy concentrated fire from John's Island soon terminated the struggle. Three shots struck the machinery of the steamer, deranging it so that she could no longer proceed. She then dropped anchor, and her commander unconditionally surrendered the boat and crew, consisting of 11 officers, 105 men, and 3 negroes. Colonel Yates thereupon ordered the Yankee Lieutenant commanding to send his men ashore in the steamer's boats, for our men had none wherewith to board her. The surrender was soon consummated, and a detachment of our force under Captain Harleston took possession of the prize, Isaac P. Smith. She proved to be a very valuable capture. She was built in 1861, and carried a fine armament, consisting of one 30-pounder Parrott gun, and eight 8-inch heavy Columbiads. Her hull and machinery were not materially injured, and will soon be in serviceable condition.

The enemy's loss in the action was nineteen killed and six wounded. The negro pilot was killed outright. Our loss was only one man killed, a member of Alston's battalion, from Horry District, whose name we have not yet been able to obtain. Our forces behaved with the utmost coolness and bravery, encountering, without breastworks or other protection, the enemy's fire at the short range of between 200 and 300 yards. The Signal Corps and Walpole's "Stono Scouts" were very active and efficient in promoting the success of the expedition.

During Saturday night the other Yankee gunboats steamed up the river, and began shelling the Isaac P. Smith, hoping to retake or destroy her. Major Brown's guns, however, immediately opened upon them a hot and well-directed fire, and, warned by the fate of the Smith, they withdrew. The captured steamer is now under the guns of Fort Pemberton.

The prisoners were brought to the city on Saturday morning, and were escorted to jail by a detachment of the Charleston Battalion, Captain Lord commanding. They are a villainous looking crew. The names of the officers are as follows:—

F. S. Conover, Acting Lieutenant Commanding.
John W. Dicks (Executive Officer) Acting Master.
Robert Tarr, Acting Master.
Whitman Chase, Ensign.
Francis Button, Ensign.
Henry S. Borden, Ensign.
Jacob Tucker, 1st Assistant Engineer.
Erastus Barry, 3d Assistant Engineer.
J. O. Hill, Assistant Paymaster.
Charles Estacker, Paymaster's Clerk.
G. H. Marvin, Surgeon.
James S. Tucker, 2d Assistant Engineer, died on his way to the city.

A number of trophies found on board, such as officer's swords, fine mathematical instruments, &c., with a considerable pack of bran new "green backs," were yesterday brought up to General Ripley's office.

The prize will doubtless be speedily put in fighting trim, so as to co-operate in the next dash of our iron clads upon the blockading fleet.

THE GREAT NAVAL VICTORY.

(From the Charleston Mercury, February 4.)

Not since the memorable Saturday and Sunday which succeeded the fall of Fort Sumter, has our community been as elated as during the two days just gone by. Our ability to cope with and sink the hostile vessels which have so long sealed our harbour, is at length indisputably proved. The gallant naval officers, who for months have been longing to meet their country's foe upon the water, have vindicated the reputation of our young navy in a style that will fairly take rank with the exploits of the Merimac and the achievements of Semmes. The blow that has been struck, in realizing the long cherished hope of our noble women, to give to Charleston the means of offence as well as of defence, will, we know, richly repay them for all their labours and all their sacrifices.

The project of attacking the blockading fleet is one that has been entertained for some weeks. On Friday night, everything being in readiness, Commodore Duncan N. Ingraham gave the order to start. Accordingly, at half-past 9 p.m., the Palmetto State (Captain Rutledge), the Chicora (Captain Tucker), with the steamers Clinch, Ettyan, and Chesterfield, as tenders, left the wharves and steamed slowly down the harbour. The whole expedition was under the command of Commodore Ingraham, who was aboard the Palmetto State. It was a fine night. The moon was shining brightly, though the horizon was misty, and a light breeze scarcely ruffled the surface of the water. As it was not intended to reach the bar until the moon had set, the trip down occupied several hours. At half-past 3 a.m., the iron-clads had reached Beach Channel, when the crews were beat to quarters and prepared for action. At four o'clock the lookout of the Palmetto State, which led the way, descried the outline of a Yankee vessel directly ahead. The long-coveted moment was now at hand. When within about fifty yards of the blockader, the engines of the Palmetto State were stopped, and the iron monster darted forward with irresistible momentum towards the doomed ship. At this juncture a voice from the enemy's decks was heard crying, "Back her, or you'll run into us!" The next moment the crash came, the bow of the iron-clad striking the Yankee steamer on the port-quarter, and crashing fearfully through her timber.

Scarcely had the ram wedged itself into the enemy's quarter, when the bow gun of the Palmetto State (a seven-inch rifle, was fired and the shell tore its way through the enemy's hull, hursting the boiler and shattering the engine in its passage. The two vessels hung together for a few seconds only. As the iron-clad was backing preparatory to another onset, the commander of the enemy's vessel called out that he would surrender. Captain Rutledge replied, ordering him to send a boat aboard, which he was some time in doing. On a threat being made to re-open fire upon him, the boat was finally sent, and Lieutenant Shryock was ordered to one of the quarter ports to receive its occupants. The officer in the boat announced himself as commander Abbott, of the United States sloop-of-war Mercedita, Captain Stellwagen, and said that he came to complete the surrender. He was conducted before Commodore Ingraham and Captain Rutledge, and, upon his pledge, he and the entire crew of the Mercedita were paroled. He was then ordered back to his vessel, but asked for assistance in behalf of his crew, as their ship was fast sinking. He reported that, when he left her, there were two inches of water on the berth deck, and all their boats were useless, as, in the confusion, they had been lowered without putting in the plugs, which are usually removed to let the rain water escape. Commodore Ingraham replied that he regretted that want of room and the lack of boats precluded the possibility of receiving them. The boat's crew, as well as the Yankee officer, had evidently made a hasty toilet, being without shoes or stockings, and otherwise dressed in rather scant fashion. The Mercedita was a new sloop-of-war, of the second class, built only fifteen months ago, and mounting eleven guns. Abbot said that the explosion of the boiler had scalded many of the crew, and represented the condition of the Mercedita to be, in other respects, most pitiable.

In the meantime, the Chicora, finding the Palmetto State grappling with the Mercedita, and at about 5.10 a.m., made out a three-masted propeller, with which she immediately closed, firing two shots as she approached. The enemy, as soon as these shots had been delivered, began ringing his fire bell, while the Chicora stood off to the northward, encountering a side-wheel steamer, which came down across her bow. The first shot from the Chicora burst the starboard boiler of this vessel, which was supposed to be the Keystone State. The smoke and steam from the explosion could be plainly seen issuing from the decks, and in a few moments she hauled down her flag, still ringing her fire bell. Orders were given to clear away a boat to board her, but before the order could be put into execution she had fled. At this time a steamer, supposed to be the Quaker City, came down towards the stern of the Chicora, and received several shots from the stern port.

By this time the enemy had learned a wholesome respect for our iron-clads, and these latter had little else to do than chase their large gune bither and thither. At dawn the whole blockading fleet had taken to its heels, and our little steamers cruised out after them in triumph.—But the enemy kept carefully out of range. The last shot was fired about half-past seven a.m. In the afternoon, finding that there was no further immediate opportunity for action, our steamers returned to the city, and were received by a vast crowd, including large numbers of ladies. The cheering of the crowd, and the waving of handkerchiefs gave assurance to our naval heroes that their gallant dash was appreciated.

The following is the official despatch received from Commodore Ingraham on Saturday morning:—

"On board Gunboat Palmetto State.

"I went out last night. This vessel sunk the Mercedita, when she sent a boat on board and surrendered. The officers and crew were paroled. Captain Tucker thinks he sunk one vessel and set another on fire, when she struck her flag. The blockading fleet has gone to the southward and eastward, out of sight.

(Signed)

"D. N. INGRAHAM.

"Flag Officer Commanding."

Our gunboats exceeded all expectations in their efficiency and strength. The enemy's shots glanced harmless from their mailed sides. Not a man on our side was injured, though the enemy's loss must have been quite severe.

The crews of both vessels acted with admirable courage and coolness, and they were no little chagrined to find that the Yankees refused to engage them on Saturday. The number of blockaders outside during the engagement was thirteen, with two first-class Federal frigates—the Susquehanna and the Canandaigua.

The success of the expedition, according to the view of our authorities, raises the blockade. A joint proclamation to that effect from General Beauregard and Com. D. M. Ingraham has been issued.

On Saturday afternoon, at General Beauregard's invitation, the foreign Consuls made an excursion to the bar to see for themselves the true condition of affairs. The blockaders, four in number, were then just visible in the offing. Yesterday the blockading squadron was largely reinforced, but the vessels all kept their steam up, as if ready for a run.

CARGO SALES.—A most extensive and valuable assortment of merchandize, being parts of the cargoes of the British steamers Douglas, Calypso, Flora, and Thistle, which lately arrived here through the blockade, were sold yesterday at the store of Mr. R. A. Pringle, Mr. James H. Taylor being the auctioneer. The sale was numerously attended by buyers from all parts of the South, and the bidding was spirited. The amount of goods offered being very large, they were only partly sold yesterday, and the balance, consisting of ready-made clothing, prints, delaines, shirting, and a general assortment of dry goods, will be disposed of this day at Mr. Pringle's store. The following are the prices obtained:—

Black tea, $5.25 per lb; damaged, $4.12½ per lb; Oolong tea, $6 to 6.50 per lb; Congou tea, $6.12½ per lb; gunpowder tea, $8 to 8.12½ per lb; young hyson do, $6.50 to 7.62½ per lb; salad oil, pints, $30.52 per dozen; Castile soap, $2.10 per lb; rhubarb root, $3.50 per lb; pulv rhubarb, $8.75 per lb; assafetida, $1.45 per lb; caustic soda, $1.80 per lb; soda ash, $1.15 per lb; sal soda, 82½ cents per lb; extract of logwood, $3.12½ per lb; Windsor soap, $5.50 to 6.75 per doz.; nut galls, $4.60 per lb; glycerine, $3.75 per lb; cream tartar, $3.25 per lb; gum opium, $40 per lb; powdered opium, $38.50 to 39 per lb; chloroform, $16.50 per lb; sulph. morphine, $29.50 to 30 per oz; mercurial ointment $6.75 per lb; sponge, $13 per lb; blue mass, $7 to 8.25 per lb; soap cerate, $1 per lb; oil of peppermint, $11.50 per lb; calomel, $8.50 per lb; camphor, $10.50 per lb; balsam copaiva, $14 per lb; carb of ammonia, $3.25 per lb; spirits of nitre, $10 per lb; iodine of potash, $21 per lb; child's Balmoral boots, $6.25 per pair; do. double sole shoes, $4.25 per pair; do. heel boots, $6.37½ per pair; do. patent shoes, $8.75 per pair, ladies' Balmoral boots, $9.50 per pair; ladies' kid congress boots, $13 to 16 per pair; do. black satin heel boots, $17 per pair; do. double sole heel elastic boots, $16 per pair men's calf shoes, $16.50 per pair; men's clump Balmoral boots, $20.50 per pair; French calf skins, $279 to 302 per dozen; sole leather, $4.75 per lb; Saxony Welch flannel, $2.35 per yard; blue twill flannel, $2.10 to 3 per yard; scarlet flannel, $2.27½ to 2.55 per yard; men's merino shirts, $85 per dozen; India gauze shirts, $47.50 per dozen; Shetland ribbed shirts, $95 per dozen; men's finished merino shirts, $97.50 per dozen; grey blankets, damaged, $6.62½ per pair; do. sound, $13.30 per pair; men's shetland merino shirts, $100 per dozen; men's merino half hose, $8.10 to 15.25 per dozen; men's brown cotton half hose, $11.25 to 16.25 per dozen; child's grey merino socks, $4.25 per dozen; ladies' white cotton hose, $18.25 to 29 per dozen; brown grey shetland, half hose, $15.75 per dozen; women's imitation merino hose, $8.75a9 per dozen; child's super merino finished socks, $3.25 per dozen; grey merino hose, $4 per dozen; white merino shirts, $85 to 110 per dozen; children's cloth gloves, $6.50 per dozen; ladies' cloth gloves, $13.50 to 30 per dozen; men's cloth gloves, $28 per dozen; misses' cotton hose, assorted, $14 per dozen; ladies' lisle thread hose, $39 per dozen; men's Crimean shirts, $75 to 92.50 per dozen; men's serge shirts, $85 per dozen; men's tweed shirts, $72.50 per dozen; super French wool shirts, $105 to 110 per dozen; grey wool and serge shirts, pockets and collars, $120 per dozen, tooth brushes, assorted, $12.25 to 12.50 per dozen; cotton handkerchiefs, various, $13.50 to 24 per dozen; linen thread, $8 to 10 per lb.; Clark's three cord white cotton, 100 yards $2.10 to 2.85 per dozen; Clark's six cord white sewing cotton, 200 yards, $1.55 to 1.80 per dozen; shoe thread, $11 to 11.65 per lb.; shoemakers' closing line, $22 per gross balls; linen thread, drab, black and white brown, $12.75 per lb.; Coat's white cotton, 200 yards, $5 to 5.30 per dozen; misses' hoop skirts, $2 to 3.75 each; ladies' ditto, $6 to 13 each.

SALE OF CLOTHS.—Mr. James H. Taylor sold yesterday a lot of fine cloths, which brought the following prices:—Black broadcloth, $16.50 to 22.50 per yard; blue broadcloth, $19 to 21.50 per yard; red broadcloth, $25 per yard; doeskin, single width, $11.25 per yard; doeskin, double width, $21.50 per yard; drab noir, $14.75 per yard; drap breiel, $17 per yard; fancy buckskin, $15.50 per yard; grey cloth, $18 per yard.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, MARCH 12, 1863.

Another Reason for Recognition.

We trust that in the debate which may be expected to ensue to-night in the House of Lords, on Lord Campbell's motion, attention will be directed to one consideration of the subject of recognition, which has heretofore been almost entirely overlooked. We refer to the fact that during the present anomalous condition of the relations of this country with the Confederate States, the large number of British subjects resident in those States, and the immense amount of British property located there, are dependent for protection at this time, when protection is most needed, upon the forbearance alone of the Confederate Government. The appointed protectors of the rights and property of their fellow-countrymen in foreign countries are the Consuls, of whose office this is the most important duty. The British Consuls who discharge this duty in the Confederate States are accredited to, and receive the permission to exercise their functions from, a Government with which the Confederate States are at open war. For two years they have continued at their posts solely by the toleration of the Confederate Government, a toleration, be it remarked, quite inconsistent with the strict theoretical construction of absolute de facto independence.

Suppose the Confederate Government, weary of this inconsistency, weary of retaining this only remaining vestige of a repudiated authority, should decline any longer to recognize the official status of functionaries whose exequaturs and presence are a contradiction of its rights and powers. A proposition to this effect, viz., to dismiss all foreign Consuls not accredited to the Confederate Government on the 1st of May next is actually before the Confederate Congress. The number of British subjects and the value of British property thus left without consular protection in a country engaged in one of the fiercest wars on record, must be reckoned by tens of thousands of persons, and scores of millions of money. We do not mean to imply that the Confederate authorities would seize this occasion to wantonly insult and injure the persons and property so unprotected. Far from it. On the contrary, we feel assured that every care would be taken to mitigate the evil and to relieve individuals from the inconveniences caused by a public necessity. But if Consuls are deemed necessary to the protection of personal and property interests abroad in time of profound peace, and of uninterrupted and rapid international communication, they can scarcely be dispensed with at a time and in a country where general conscription laws convert whole populations into armies, when military conflagrations complete or anticipate the work of retreating or advancing hosts, when Death, in many shapes, stalks over the land, and when, in fact, every part of the social and political fabric is strained in an agony of desperation. It is at such times and in such places that the foreigner most needs the advice and assistance of his country's representatives, and these alone can prevent or relieve much grievous individual loss and suffering.

It is this humane consideration which has induced the Confederate Government to forbear where forbearance from any other motive would have implied a want of self-respect. Its right to dismiss summarily from within its jurisdiction all Consuls exercising their functions by virtue of an exequatur from the Washington Government is unquestioned. It is undeniable, also, that were it to-day to enforce this right, no one could justly accuse it of a lack of moderation in the enforcement. It has given the other Governments of the world two years to consider upon the propriety, expediency, or convenience of establishing with it the usual relations which obtain among Governments. If, after two years' consideration, the other Governments conclude such relations to be improper, inexpedient, and inconvenient, we could not well blame the Confederates for accepting the conclusion as final, and refusing in their turn that convenience of relations which is refused to them. As matters now stand, the forbearance of the Confederate Government affords to foreign nations all the essential advantages resulting from recognition, without reciprocity. The dismissal of the foreign Consuls, although not a step which we are prepared to advise, would simply place all parties on the same footing. Sooner or later, if recognition is indefinitely delayed, the Confederate Government will be forced to this measure.

A contemporary, in a very able article upon recognition, on which we commented in our last impression, states in substance that the chief reason why the Confederate States have not been admitted into the family of nations, is that their non-admission had not heretofore been felt as a serious inconvenience. "If, for instance," says our contemporary, by way of illustration, "the Alabama or Florida should accidentally or wilfully destroy a British merchant ship, our Government would be obliged, as affairs now stand, to apply for compensation to the Government of the United States; and, in the event of its being refused, which it very probably would be, make reprisals on the Federal marine, and declare war on the United States. On the other hand, if the Confederacy were acknowledged as an independent State, then the demand for compensation would be made to its Government, and under the circumstances supposed it would be immediately acquiesced in."

It would be most ungracious perverseness to regard this passage as a friendly hint to Captains Semmes and Maffit, but if the position of the Morning Post be well taken, as we believe it to be, it may soon force itself upon the serious consideration of the Confederate Government whether sound policy does not require that it should avail itself of all honourable and legitimate means to make other nations feel the same inconveniences which, through no fault of its own, it is made by them to experience.

In directing attention to this subject, we are not actuated by any apprehension that the Confederate Government will, except as a last resort, dismiss the European Consuls. The attested character of President Davis is a sufficient assurance against a measure which, however abstractly just, would be at least questionable in point of humanity. Our object is to point out how impossible it is that this country should much longer continue in its present anomalous attitude towards a Power which wages war with armies of hundreds of thousands of men, which occupies a territory equal in area to half-a-dozen first-rate kingdoms, and whose past and prospective trade with England is more valuable than that of all western Europe at the beginning of the present century. This attitude is a contradiction of all established facts and known probabilities; it is in direct and glaring opposition to all logical conclusions from the evidence of these facts. At any moment an incident of the war, or the action of another European country, may render this attitude untenable. It is eminently proper, therefore, that those to whom the nation has confided the direction of its affairs should decide upon a definite course of action. The public has a right to ask of them that they should guide and instruct public opinion. The public has a right to know the position, and the reasons for that position, of every man whose voice is potent in the national councils. It is only the cowardice of indecision which shrinks from such avowals, and it is this cowardice against which Lord Campbell has chiefly to contend to-night. Men dread to commit themselves in favour of recognition, and yet they find it difficult to allege any good reasons against it. This indisposition to touch a question is more difficult to face and to combat than an open and determined hostility. When the question, moreover, is one on which, from its very nature, parties cannot be arrayed, and therefore party support not relied upon, it demands no ordinary firmness and independence of mind to become its champion. These qualities Lord Campbell has pre-eminently displayed in the advocacy of the Southern cause, and however great the odds may be against him, he has truth and common sense for his allies, and whatever may be the result of to-night's debate, he cannot fail to have the secret acquiescence in his statements even of those who may lack the courage to follow him in his conclusions.

The Financial Position and Prospects of the Confederate States.

The statement and report issued on the 10th of January last by Mr. Memminger, the Confederate States' Secretary of the Treasury, is an elaborate document, throwing much light on the present condition and the future prospects of the finances of the Confederacy. The report is addressed to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and is remarkable for its candid admission of existing difficulties, and the radical way in which it is proposed to grapple with them. European and especially English financiers will not altogether agree with Mr. Memminger's views as to the necessity of making provision for the redemption of the public debt. The Confederate Secretary approves the principle of Mr. Pitt's sinking fund, and ascribes its failure to faulty administration. This opinion will not be endorsed in this country. The reason here assigned for the failure of Mr. Pitt's scheme for the gradual reduction and ultimate extinction of the public debt is that it was found more profitable to continue the payment of the interest than to burden the current resources of the country with the imposition of the extra taxation necessary for the liquidation of the principal. Some persons blamed Mr. Gladstone for appropriating the amount placed at his disposal by the falling in of terminable annuities to the reduction of taxation instead of to the reduction of the public debt. We need not discuss whether Mr. Gladstone made the best possible use of the surplus that came into his hands, but that he made a better use of it than if he had appropriated it to the reduction of the debt is indisputable. He used this surplus, amongst other things, for giving such an impulse to one branch of our trade as to materially lessen the inconvenience of the loss of our American trade. He did not relieve us from the necessity of paying the penny a year, but he gives us twopence a year wherewith to pay it. So long as the fundholders are willing to receive a dividend that, in consideration of the value of the national guarantee, is less than they get from commercial investments, or even from mortgage on real property, the tax-payer gains rather than loses by the non-redemption of the debt. The national creditor cannot take any undue advantage of the nation. When money becomes so abundant as to make the selling price of the Funds above par, he must consent to a reduction of interest, or take his principal with the money borrowed at a lower rate; and so with the diminution in the value of money, the rate of interest on the Government debt has regularly and steadily diminished. Our financiers, then, will differ from Mr. Memminger as to the necessity of providing for the redemption of the national debt of the Confederate States, and will think that the plan will prove abortive because it will be found to be inexpedient, though, as we shall presently point out, there is a special reason for desiring the redemption of the Confederate debt; but be this as it may, no one can fail to perceive in the proposition so strenuously urged upon the attention of the Confederate Legislature a further and striking proof of the resolution to place the credit of the Confederacy upon a sure and lasting foundation by present and even needless sacrifices. The United States' Government is contracting a mammoth debt without providing for the payment of the interest thereon—the Confederate States' Government, in the midst of a vast and harassing war for national existence, at a time too, when, unlike its foe, its commerce is completely paralyzed by a blockade, proposes not only to forthwith levy a sufficient sum by taxation for the payment of interest, but to make arrangements for the payment of the principal. We do not contend that the latter plan is desirable, or even feasible, but the fact of its being propounded, at this moment, amply justifies the confidence manifested by European capitalists in Confederate securities.

The evil mainly dwelt upon in Mr. Memminger's report is the redundant issue of Treasury notes, and the consequent depreciation of the currency and concurrent inflation of the price of food, clothing, and, indeed, of all commodities. We need not reproduce his arguments, for the ill-results of a perpetually-depreciating currency are palpable and understood. Every class suffers, and particularly those who have fixed incomes, and those who live by the sweat of the brow. Just now, for example, the Confederate Government is the greatest consumer in the Confederation, because the sums voted for war purposes are expended by it, and it follows that if the currency is depreciated, it has to pay a proportionately extravagant price for its stores, and thus contract heavier engagements than would be necessary if the currency were in its normal condition. Mr. Memminger proposes to deal summarily with this crying evil, and we are not surprised that his bold suggestions should have been canvassed with much anxiety by the organs of public opinion in the South. But though Mr. Memminger's plan is comprehensive and daring, it is neither experimental nor dangerous.

At the close of the last year, the amount of Treasury notes, exclusive of interest bearing notes, was $290,142,692. Besides this, Mr. Memminger estimates State Treasury notes and Bank notes in circulation at $20,000,000. That is to say, the amount of currency was $310,149,692. Now, we must remember that whether a currency be metallic or paper, its increase beyond the natural requirements of a community is sure to lead to inflation of prices and the concomitant ills. The depreciation of the Confederate currency is not evidence of the want of confidence in the solvency of the Confederacy. England owes 800 millions sterling, and her currency is not depreciated, but if instead of a funded debt she had bank notes to that amount floating, the currency would be depreciated, though our solvency would be perfectly secure. The question we have before us is not as to the solvency of the Confederate Government; but whether the 310 million dollars is a larger amount of currency than is demanded for conducting the commerce of the country.

Mr. Memminger estimates the currency of the Confederate States before the war at $100,000,000. He does not refer to the effect produced by the stoppage of foreign commerce, and we think that he is right, for foreign commerce has little or no result on the currency of a country, since foreign commerce is essentially a system of barter, and only the small balances are paid in money. Mr. Memminger considers that during a war a larger amount of currency is necessary, because the circulation is sluggish, and individuals keep more money in hand for meeting unforeseen contingencies. He thinks that under the present circumstances $150,000,000 would not be an excessive currency for the Confederate States. Nor is this assumption mere guess-work. Mr. Memminger very clearly explains the soundness of his calculation. According to the natural proportion between the amount of the currency and the price, not the value, of commodities—and this proportion is the same whether the currency is gold or paper—the price of commodities in the Confederate States ought now to be, if Mr. Memminger's calculation is correct, three times as great as in times of peace. The currency, we are told, is as three to one, and, therefore, the price of commodities ought to be as three to one; and this is the case.

Mr. Memminger wishes to reduce the amount of currency not to the peace limit of $100,000,000, but to the normal war limit, $150,000,000. The matter is urgent. Before the 1st of July next the additional issue of Treasury notes from December will be nearly $200,000,000—that is, not that the resources of the country or the value of property will be advanced 66 per cent., but that prices will, concurrently with the currency, be so advanced. Mr. Memminger begs Congress to adopt a plan to avert the future and remedy the present evil.

He proposes a further development of the Congressional action which affords to the holders of Treasury notes the option of funding them for 8 per cent. bonds before the 22nd of April, 1863. It may be asked how it happens this offer has not been universally accepted. No doubt it would have been, but the 8 per cent. is payable in the paper currency, and is, therefore, not worth nearly so much as 8 per cent. in specie; and considering the respective value of money in the two countries, corresponds to about $1\frac{1}{2}$ or 2 per cent. interest in England on public securities. Mr. Memminger now advises that Congress should pass an Act extending the time for funding from the 22nd of April till the 1st of July, but between these dates at 7 and not 8 per cent., and that after the 1st of July next all Treasury notes issued before the 1st of December, 1862, shall cease to be currency. Notes not so funded, though ceasing to be money, will not lose their intrinsic value. The credit of the Confederacy will still be pledged for their redemption, and they will still be available for the payment of Confederate taxes, which will rapidly absorb the unfunded balance.

This measure is, we submit, just, as it will be, if adopted, effective. The notes were issued with the privilege of funding at any time, and the Government gives long notice that the contract must be completed on or before the 1st of July, 1863. It is a limitation of the time, not directly set forth in the contract, but some limitation was implied. These notes were not intended for a perpetual currency; and if the Government give due notice to the holders to fulfil their contract, it keeps good faith. It does not say, if you do not fund, your property is forfeited, but simply that you have forfeited your privilege of funding, and these specified issues, though property, and a legal tender for taxes, are not to be money after the 1st of July next.

Still more certain is it that Mr. Memminger's plan will not work any practical injustice. By funding two-thirds of the currency, the present holders of the currency will not have a less value of money left. Mr. Memminger remarks: "The modification of the contract is substantially for the benefit of both parties. The object in view is to increase the value of the whole remaining currency. This object it effects by increasing the purchasing power of each note, in proportion to the reduction of the whole. Assuming this reduction to be two-thirds, it follows that every holder of only one-third in proportion of the new issues, will have the same value in money left, after he should have invested the other two-thirds in bonds. In other words, he will make a clear gain of more than two-thirds. If he shall have in his possession more of the new issues, he will, nevertheless, gain in the reduced price of every article of consumption." This is as indisputable as that the inflation of the currency injures all classes, and particularly the classes who are not capitalists, and, therefore, the persons who are not bondholders will participate in the benefit of the measure.

Mr. Memminger does not anticipate any inconvenience from the immediate funding of so much currency. From December to July the issue of Treasury notes will be about $200,000,000—that is, $150,000,000 for the supposed requirements of the country in a time of war, and a balance of $50,000,000 for the amount that may be absorbed by the payment of taxes, or by loans, or other contingencies, for which it is desirable to leave an ample margin. According to his plan and calculation, on the 1st of July next there will be no more currency in the Confederate States than is necessary, and the prices of all commodities will fall, though probably not immediately.

To provide for the payment of the interest on the public debt, Mr. Memminger proposes a property tax and an income tax. What sum must be raised for that purpose? On the 1st of July next the total amount of Treasury notes issued will be:—

Less circulation to be left.	150,000,000
Remaining funded.	$350,000,000
Annual interest on this sum at 8 per cent.	$28,000,000
Interest on 120,000,000 of $7 30c. notes	8,760,000
Interest on 60,000,000 of 6 per cent. certificates	3,600,000
Interest on 8 per cent. bonds, say about $100,000,000	8,000,000
	$48,360,000

Mr. Memminger proposes to raise $60,000,000 as a war-tax to pay this interest, and to provide a sinking fund; the difference between the amount of interest on the debt and the amount of the war-tax to be applied year by year to the reduction of the debt. According to the estimate made to Congress, the value of all the property in the eleven Confederate States in which taxes have been collected is $1,632,000,000. Allowing for parts of the country being in possession of the enemy, and taking the estimate at $1,000,000,000, a property-tax of 1 per cent. on this gives $10,000,000. The income, calculated to be about 7 per cent. on the amount of property, is $280,000,000, and a tax of 10 per cent., as proposed by Mr. Memminger, would produce $28,000,000. This gives a total of $68,000,000—leaving an ample margin between the proposed $60,000,000 and the probable yield of the taxes. There is about $100,000,000 invested in States bonds, and South Carolina has disputed in her law courts the right of Congress to tax the investments in such securities as property, and therefore, until the matter has been decided by the Supreme Court, one million less will be derived from the property-tax. We notice this incident not from its having an important bearing upon the revenue for war purposes, for we here see that there is an immense margin to cover it, but as evidence of the closeness with which the proceedings of the Government are watched, and with what wholesome jealousy the property and rights of the citizens are protected.

The last important matter referred to in this report is the States guaranteeing the Confederate debt. Virginia, Alabama, and South Carolina have proffered their aid, the last-named State, upon certain conditions, offering to guarantee $200,000,000. Mr. Memminger urges that a plan should be decided on, so that all the States may join in this guarantee, and if it extend to $500,000,000 it will enable the Confederate Government to convert the 8 per cent. into 6 per cent. bonds, and to realize a premium on the sale of the bonds. Not a capitalist in Europe will deny the validity and value of the guarantee of the States, or that such guarantee will give the public debt of the Confederate States a reputation second to no other public debt. States that, in spite of invasion and blockade, discharge their obligations with punctuality are first-class guarantors. No doubt the States will pledge their credit for the Confederate debt, and this being so, Mr. Memminger has more ground than an English financier can have for desiring the gradual redemption of the debt, for when the development of the Territories calls for the admission of new States into the Confederacy, it will not be fair that they should escape all share in the public burdens contracted for their good, as well as for the good of the present States, and yet the apportionment of the debt will be tolerably sure to give rise to troublesome negotiations. But however opinions may be divided upon this point, the report of the Confederate Secretary of the Treasury is a document that must satisfy everybody as to the great wealth, the boundless resources, the earnest patriotism, and the ultra-sensitiveness as to the financial stability of the Confederate States. It shows, too, the prudence of the Confederate Government and its confidence in the people. It is not afraid to tell the whole truth, and in the midst of a terrible struggle for independence and existence, to call upon the citizens to provide for the future credit of the Confederacy. Such an appeal would indeed be impossible if independence had not been won, and the Government was not firmly established.

Prospects of the War.

The triumphs of the Federal navy are short-lived. Ten days ago it was announced by the telegram that the Federal ram Queen of the West had "run" the batteries of Vicksburg, had cleared the Mississippi between Vicksburg and Port Hudson of Confederate steamers, and would shortly form in line of battle with Farragut's flotilla off the latter stronghold. The Indianola, another Monitor, had followed her example; others, it was expected, would follow. The Queen of the West, however, has had a short career. Her commander—a colonel in the army, by the way, though this confusion of ranks is not strange in a land where Texan cavalry man two small steamers, and board and carry two Federal men-of-war—seems to have had a roving commission to do as much mischief as possible, and, bent on this service, had proceeded up the Red River, Louisiana. It was by this stream that the main supplies of the garrison of Vicksburg were transported, and the temporary blockade by the Queen of the West was a severe blow to the Confederates. The mission of Colonel Elliott was apparently to burn, sink, or destroy everything that came in his way; and his latest prize had been the Confederate steamer Eva. It seems, however, that the Eva was only a sort of decoy. The correspondent of the Mobile Advertiser, writing on the 4th of February, says: "Arrangements have been projected which will catch her in a nice little trap before she gets very far;" and the Queen of the West apparently fell an easy victim. The pilot of the Eva, John Burke by name, was ordered to take the Federal steamer to the nearest Confederate batteries; and he literally obeyed his instructions. Like the Irish pilot of the coast of Galway, who declared that he knew every rock and shoal in the harbour, and exclaimed, when the ship entrusted to his care, struck one of them, "And, by —! there's one of them," John Burke, in an hour or two, brought the Queen of the West within pistol shot of the batteries at Gordon's Landing; and his correct knowledge was quickly evidenced by a few well-directed shots, which in a few minutes disabled the Federal steamer, and left her to drift, a helpless log, to the other side of the river. There she was taken possession of by the Confederates, the bulk of her crew escaping to the De Soto, another Federal steamer. The Eva and De Soto have been, it is said, captured subsequently by the Confederates. The act of the pilot, John Burke, was a deed of no common heroism. But for the confusion arising out of the unforeseen attack, instant death would have been his award; and there are many men who would head a charge or lead a forlorn hope, who would not have hazarded their lives on such a daring venture. The Queen of the West is a valuable addition to the Confederate navy. Carrying a heavy armament, and possessing a formidable steam power, she will effectually command the navigation of the Mississippi between Vicksburg and Port Hudson. The Isaac Smith on the Stono River, the Harriet Lane at Galveston, and the Queen of the West on the Mississippi, all captures from the enemy, are giving the South the nucleus of a powerful naval force. If the war lasts, we may yet see the South in the possession of a respectable fleet constructed in Northern dockyards, just as her armies are equipped with rifles and cannon purchased in Europe with Federal gold.

This exploit on the Mississippi is of trifling importance in itself, but it deserves notice as one in a chain of events tending to inspire the South. The Northern army and flotilla have been before Vicksburg for weeks; an attack has been made and repulsed—for the admission that the mortar-boats were at too short a range is an acknowledgment of defeat—the gunboats either dare not attempt to force the passage, or are captured when they do; the canal is a failure; all that is left to the Federals, say the Northern newspapers, is to flood the country, invest Vicksburg, and convert an assault into a regular siege. The hope is that the garrison at Vicksburg will be starved into submission. But we have little fear of an investment. McClelland's army can hardly muster 60,000 effective men; the death list is augmenting daily; the season is becoming every week more pestiferous; how is it to be expected that this army will be able, in the presence of an active and enterprising enemy, to maintain the investment? It is said, indeed, that the levees have been cut and that some millions of acres of land around Vicksburg on the Mississippi bank are under water. We will pass by the atrocious barbarism of this act of warfare—an act unparalleled in history, and by the side of which the stone blockade of Charleston is a pardonable offence—and ask what harm it will inflict on the Confederates that will not be more than balanced by injury to the Federals. The Yazoo River, or River of Death, must be the basis of the Federal operations. Its waters, always noxious to human life, must decimate the unacclimatized raw Federal regiments now brought down to Vicksburg. Still more terrible will be the effect of the spring exhalations from the inundated plains upon the Federal camps. Only an immediate and successful bombardment, or an early withdrawal, can save them from the horrors and humiliation of another Walcheren.

Everywhere the war languishes. In Virginia Hooker is making great efforts to reorganize his army, with apparently little success. A letter has been read in the Senate, in which it is stated that the deserters from the Army of the Potomac reach the number of 22,000, and there is a rumour that this army is to be broken up into separate commands, in order that the demoralization may not spread. In the meantime the Confederates are preparing to take advantage of the paralysis that has befallen the Northern army. Generals Stuart and Jackson, the sure forerunners of mischief, are said to be moving northward; a Confederate force is reported at Warrenton, in the rear of General Hooker; another body is moving up the Shenandoah Valley. If Hooker's army be weakened to any considerable extent, although the ground may not at present permit any serious attack upon Washington, the defenceless condition of Washington will almost tempt a dash. At any rate, the threatening attitude of Jackson and Stuart will make President Lincoln hesitate before he despatches more troops southward to assist in the destruction of Charleston and Savannah. There is a small paragraph in the latest news, trifling in itself, but very suggestive of the morale of the opposing forces. "Twenty Confederate cavalry have captured a Federal forage train, protected by eighty men, near Romney, Western Virginia." This reads like a myth, but it comes from Federal sources, and is, without doubt, true. Such is the demoralization of the army in Virginia that detachment after detachment surrenders itself almost at the first shot. The prisoners are paroled, sworn not to take active service again; their accoutrements become the spoil of the captors. The Federal troops gain all the relief without incurring the stigma of desertion. No wonder that the Conscription Bill has been carried. Soldiers must be raised somehow. Enormous bounties and drafting have failed to supply an adequate number of recruits. The Conscription Act promises to place in the President's hands new powers and inexhaustible resources. The North has patiently borne so many violations of its constitutional rights, that it will probably submit to this, but not without a struggle on the part of the Democrats. The New York Legislature, we are vaguely told, is "taking some steps" with regard to it. But we are prepared to see a very general resistance to the Act if it be enforced. Clearly, nothing can be more repugnant to the spirit of the American Constitution and to State nationality than the Act which empowers the President to take men from one State to fill up vacancies in regiments, or even companies, from other States. As the first announcement of a centralizing policy, and the first open step towards that despotism which has been so long predicted as the necessary consequence of President Lincoln's feeble administration, it is sure to give rise to some trouble in the North. The truth is, matters seem to have come to a deadlock. The North is "stalemated." In Tennessee, in Kentucky, on the Mississippi, on the Rappahannock, there is equal evidence of mismanagement and promise of failure. Even the last hope, the arming of the negroes, only creates fresh embarrassments to the Federal commanders. There is not a bit of blue sky to be seen in the gathering gloom which overclouds Federal prospects.

The Northern Clergy and the War.

The great American revolution which has been progressing with such long and rapid strides during the past two years in the States which still acknowledge a sort of allegiance to the Federal Government has, at length, reached that particular stage which presages the final overthrow of every vestige of liberty. The warnings of history have been unheeded, and the States of the North have drifted into that current which they can no longer control, and which is hurrying them rapidly forward into the gulf of despotism. When the war cry of the Republican chieftains first resounded through the valleys and upon the mountains of hitherto peaceful America, the people of the North, startled into a delirium of excitement by the unaccustomed sound, rushed to arms. The passions of the multitude, lashed into fury by the stirring appeals of partisan leaders and reckless demagogues, gave no heed to the warnings of their more farseeing fellow-countrymen. It was in vain that the voice of reason, fortified by the lessons of the past, pointed out that even though they might be able, by force of arms, to subjugate the free people against whom their fury was directed, the very act of consummation would inaugurate for themselves the reign of despotism. The mob soon silenced every murmur of disapprobation. All who dared to speak unpalatable truths were forthwith incarcerated in the Bastilles which were provided for their reception, and Mr. Lincoln was allowed to follow out his schemes of conquest undisturbed by other councils than such as coincided with the bent of his own inclinations.

Vast armies were created as if by magic. The world was ransacked for adventurers, who, under the lure of enormous bounties, high pay, and indefinite promises of prospective rewards in the shape of spoils torn from the vanquished enemy, joined themselves to the multitude who rushed confidently over the borders of the Southern territory, only to be hurled back bleeding, disgraced, and dismayed, at the very moment when they had hoped, almost undoubtingly, to clutch the tempting prize. Once, twice, thrice, ten times, did they madly dash forward to reburnish the tarnished lustre of their military fame, only to witness at Fredericksburg the re-enactment of the bloody recoil from the plains of Manassas. There was a pause which invited reflection. The people began to recover from their strong delusion; the more sober commenced to ask themselves: "For what are we sacrificing our lives, the lives of our children, our prosperity, our liberty? If we gain that which we seek, which now seems impossible, we will have lost all which would make our victory a blessing."

It is a moment of deep peril for the demagogues who have lured the multitude to the verge of ruin, when the people pause for an instant to consider the disasters of the past, in connection with the probable future, which awaits them. So thought Mr. Lincoln, and the vast horde of contractors, jobbers, and Yankee manufacturers, who have grown fat upon the blood of their fellow-countrymen. There was but one hope left. The cry of "the Union" had lost its magic power, and it was necessary to replace it by another. "Revenge for our defeats! the blood of our enemies, as an atonement for the blood of our sons, whose bones are bleaching upon the battle-field!" Who so potent to rally once more the disheartened masses as a fanatical clergy?

In effect both Government and people have surrendered themselves to their leadership, and the management of the war has been confided into the hands of this most dangerous faction. Whatever may have been the power the people once held, it no longer exists. A handful of ambitious and fanatical priests now exercise supreme sway over the destinies of the Northern and most populous section of the once "great Republic." They scout the battle-cry of "the Union," once so potent in raising up victims to be slaughtered upon the battle-fields of the South. God wills not the restoration, in its former integrity, of that "league with death," and that "covenant with hell." "Let us annihilate the Southerners first, and then establish a glorious Union, such as will soften the anger of the Lord against this people." Thus preach the appointed teachers of God's Holy Word.

We will not shock the moral sentiment of the reader by repeating the words of the Cheevers, the Phillips', the Beechers, the Stowes, or of any of the other clerical charlatans, who make merchandize of their fanaticism, and offer it for sale in the markets of the world to the highest bidder; but of another, of a type somewhat similar, and who is only not one of them because nature has assigned to him a rank above them. There is a terrible distinctness in the enunciation of his bloody purpose, which is heightened by the exalted terms in which he speaks of those whom his religion requires him to sacrifice. The vulgar, common-place fanatics refer to the Southerners as reptiles, whom it were a duty to slay even though their destruction were not specially ordained by the law of God. But he whom we now introduce brings no such appliances to his aid to win the multitude to his purposes. No language of eulogy ever fell from the lips of the most devoted friend of the South more striking or significant than that which he employs in portraying the character and characteristics of the Southern people; and yet he says that "God will not be satisfied with less than their entire subjugation or extermination." It was not the life of a hired servant or a slave bought with his money which Abraham was commanded to offer up as an atonement to the Lord. But he was told to place his well-beloved son on the sacrificial altar, and with his own hand to strike the fatal blow. It is this feature of the sacrifice demanded which invests with sublimity the meditated act of the father, whose undoubting faith rendered him thus obedient to the commands of the Almighty.

So with the reverend and learned Dr. Bellows, who ranks high amongst the highest of his brother clergymen as an authorized exponent of the Divine will in the matters of controversy between the North and the South; and, it may be added, as the expounder of the policy of the Federal Government. He would not have the world believe that those whom he proposes to offer up a propitiatory sacrifice to the Lord, as an atonement for the sins of the nation, are men of ordinary mould. They are not the wicked, the dishonest, the cruel, the uncharitable, whom he orders to be slain in obedience to the commands of his Divine Master. He portrays the character of the Southern people in colours so bright, with features so attractive, and in language so eulogistic, that if we could forget for a moment the peculiar characteristics of the class to which he belongs, we should be, while listening to his harangue, in momentary expectation of hearing an indignant protest against the farther prosecution of a war of invasion and subjugation against such a people. But let the reverend gentleman speak for himself; first, in a sermon pronounced in the city of Brooklyn, near the close of the year just passed; and next, in an address delivered about the commencement of the present year. Thus does the reverend gentleman set forth the crimes of the South :—

No candid mind will deny the peculiar charm of Southern young men at college, or Southern young women in society. How far race or climate, independent of servile institutions, may have produced the Southern chivalric spirit and manners I will not now consider. But one cannot deny in that people a certain inbred habit of command; a contempt of life in defence of honour or class; a talent for political life, and an easy control of inferiors. Nor is this merely an external and flashy heroism. It is real. It showed itself in Congress early, and always by the courage, eloquence, skill, and success with which it controlled majorities. It showed itself in the social life of Washington by the grace, fascination, and ease, the free and charming hospitality by which it governed society. It shows itself in this war; in the orders and proclamations of its generals; in the messages of the rebel Congress, and in the essential good breeding and humanity—contrary to a diligently-encouraged public impression—with which it not seldom divides its medical stores, and gives our sick and wounded as favourable care as it is able to extend to its own. I think the war must have increased the respect felt by the North for the South. Its miraculous resources, the bravery of its troops; their patience under hardships; their unshrinking firmness in the desperate position they have assumed; the wonderful success with which they have extemporized manufactures and munitions of war; the elasticity with which they have risen from defeat, and the courage they have shown in threatening again and again our capital, and even our interior, cannot fail to extort an unwilling admiration and respect. The war, then, must have shown us that we underrate the power, the charm, the advantage of a slave civilization. No base, cowardly, idle, worthless people could have waged war as the South has done.

And thus, as the expounder of the will of Omnipotence, he affixes the penalty due to such heinous offences:—

This war is no longer a war in defence of the Union, the Constitution, and the enforcement of the laws; it is a war to be carried on no longer with the aim of re-establishing the Union and the Constitution, with all their old compromises. God means not to be let off with any half-way work! I am now convinced, and I consider it the most humane, the most economical, and the most statesmanlike policy, to take the most radical ground possible, to assume that this is a war for the subjugation or the extermination of all persons who wish to maintain the Slave Power—a war to get rid of slavery, and of slaveholders, whether it be constitutional or not.

It is no ordinary man who has thus clearly exposed the crimes of which the Southern people stand accused, followed by the terrible judgment which is announced as the penalty. In all the qualities which adorn the scholar, the politician, and the fanatic, he is, when contrasted with the herd of noisy spouters or sensation priests and priestesses by whom he is surrounded, as Mahomet the Great, to Joe Smith the Mormon. The exquisite tact displayed in the matter of his appeal to the bad passions of bad men, by bringing into bold relief the higher qualities of the gentleman, which he avers is the distinguishing characteristic of Southerners, exhibits a method in his madness which challenges our admiration, however much the sensibilities of just men may be shocked by its display. He endeavours to stimulate the passion of hatred by exciting a feeling of envy; and a fanatical fervour by announcing himself as the exponent of the will of God.

Let us briefly analyze the grievous offences of which the South stands convicted. First, even as school children there is "a peculiar charm" about them which "no candid man will deny." Second, they exhibit "a contempt for life, in defence of honour, which must be equally accorded to them." Third, "a talent for political life, and an easy control of inferiors." In Congress "they have shown themselves to be eloquent, skilful, and courageous." Fourth, they are distinguished for "a free and charming hospitality," which they "dispense with grace, fascination, and ease." Fifth, "in war they are no less distinguished by their bravery, their patience under hardships, their unshrinking firmness, and their wonderful success, than by the humanity with which they divide with sick and wounded prisoners of war their scanty medical stores, and bestow upon them the same care and kind attention as upon their own."

These are the offences of the South against the North, as distinctly and clearly enunciated as the terrible penalty of "subjugation or extermination" which is awarded as the punishment due to such high crimes. It may, or may not, be true that the reverend and sagacious orator knew that he was laying bare the chief source of that vindictive hostility to the South which has for so many years manifested itself in the conduct of a controlling class of voters in the North; yet He who has fathomed the profound depths of that latent principle of man's nature which was developed by constant culture into an irreconcilable antagonism between the North and the South, will fail to find, in all the expositions of the origin of secession which have been promulgated by the friends of Mr. Lincoln and the approvers of his policy, so truthful a solution of the problem as is embodied in the brief bill of indictment prepared and promulgated by the Rev. Dr. Bellows.

But in what terms, restrained and circumscribed within the limits of sobriety and good taste, may we speak of those appointed guardians of a true religious faith who employ such means to stimulate the bad passions of man to an unnatural fervour? We contemplate with horror the bloody rites of the Aztec priests who sought to propitiate their gods by human sacrifices, yet their crime against humanity was, at least, mitigated by the fact that they murdered their fellow-men in obedience to the stern mandates of their religious faith. It has been reserved for the teachers of the holy religion of Christ to preach in favour of the inauguration of wholesale massacres, from which we may well believe that even the Aztec priests would have recoiled with horror.

Men who wear the priestly garb are the authors of the American war. Their councils have dragged the President of the United States into the adoption of a policy which, by the avowal of its advocates, was designed to produce a war of extermination between the black and the white races upon the continent of America. While the very instincts of mankind make them shudder at the possible accomplishment of this purpose, these priests alone, and their blind followers, amongst civilized men are awaiting with impatience the opening of the bloody drama. Even Lincoln and the political gamblers, contractors, and demagogues, who are his apologists, adopt and approve the expedient only because they have despaired by other means of overcoming the obstinate valour of the Southerners. It is alone the professed disciples of that Messiah who upon the Mount taught to the multitude his sublime precepts of Love, and Charity, and Peace, who look forward with a feeling of satisfaction to the anticipated feast of blood. If true men turn away with a sentiment of disgust from the demagogues who prostitute the sacred name of liberty to purposes of selfish ambition, with what a feeling of loathing must the faithful Christian regard these false teachers of a true religion!

However this may be, into their hands the management of the war has drifted, and into their keeping has been confided all that remains of the once-boasted liberties of that segment of the late Union which still acknowledges allegiance to President Lincoln.

Mr. Seward's "Congressional Form of Conference."

Regarded simply as a State Paper, the despatch of Mr. Seward, in reply to the suggestion of M. Drouyn de Lhuys touching an armistice between the parties to the American war, would sink into merited oblivion along with all his previous efforts in the diplomatic field. But there are special characteristics developed by the document in question which will secure for it a brief respite from the fate of its predecessors. We have already referred to many of these, but there are still others which merit something more than a passing notice. Mr. Seward, with a simplicity, shall we call it? which challenges our admiration, gravely suggests to the United States' Minister at Paris the existence of a fear which had taken possession of his mind, that "M. Drouyn de Lhuys has taken other light for his guidance than the correspondence of the Government at Washington." It is very clear that upon this point the fears of Mr. Lincoln's Premiers were but too well founded; else the suggestion of an armistice would never have been ventured upon by the Government of the Emperor. One scarcely knows whether most to admire, in this pregnant little sentence, the coolness with which the writer employs a form of expression which indicates the existence of a doubt as to whether his "fear" was well founded, or the implied reproach against the Minister of the Emperor for seeking outside of the despatches of Mr. Seward for reliable information in regard to the past, the present, and the future of the great American contest.

If upon a first perusal of this document, M. Drouyn de Lhuys felt any inward misgivings or self-condemnation for having rendered himself obnoxious to such a reproach, a more careful study of its contents has, no doubt, satisfied him that he could not, by any possibility, take to his confidence a more faithless or untrustworthy adviser than Mr. Seward. The well considered suggestion of the French Government is rejected firmly and categorically. The Government of the United States cannot and will not listen to any proposition which involves a conference between the Government of the United States and its insurgent subjects. A mere handful of disaffected squatters, confined chiefly to the Gulf shore of the great American Union, are not to be held and deemed to be an enemy with whom the great Government of Mr. Lincoln would condescend to treat. It is quite evident to Mr. Seward that the French Minister has been reading the political journals which have assumed a hostile attitude towards his Government, and which, for wicked purposes have exaggerated this insignificant rebellion, existing only upon the borders of the Gulf of Mexico, into a great movement of the Southern States of the Union. If M. Drouyn de Lhuys will only have confidence in the correspondence emanating from the department over which Mr. Seward presides, he will perceive at a glance the many reasons which preclude his Government from entering into negotiations with the handful of rebels before they shall have been brought to submission. The only omission with which the Premier of Mr. Lincoln may stand justly charged is that he does not in this despatch, fix the extreme limit which he allows himself within which to sweep every armed rebel into the waters of the Gulf of Mexico—ninety days.

But if these considerations are not sufficient to satisfy the French Government of the impossibility of any arrangement being entered into, looking to an armistice and a conference, there exists still another, and a graver, objection than any others which have been enumerated. Mr. Seward has a conscience! Start not, reader; we are merely interpreting his own language. He has not only a conscience, but his Government is founded upon a Constitution, the terms and requirements of which he has sworn shall be the guide of all his official acts. Within that constitution he finds no provision for the cessation of hostilities once commenced between the partners to the Federal compact, by any other means than by mutual exhaustion, or by the extermination of one or both the parties to the conflict. If the framers of the Constitution had contemplated the closing of a war between the two sections by an armistice and a conference, and an agreement, they were wise and sagacious statesmen, and they would have introduced a clause to that effect. But as no such clause existed, such a means of bringing the conflict to a close would be unconstitutional; and who could suppose, for an instant that Mr. Seward's conscience would permit him to be a party to any, the slightest, infringement of that sacred chart of American liberty.

But a happy thought flashes from the mind of the Premier to illumine the gloomy picture of that war which his Constitution and conscience combine to render perpetual. The Constitution has provided a remedy, though not in the form suggested. The belligerents may not negotiate upon neutral territory; that would be impossible. But the doors of Congress are wide enough to admit the representatives of all the States. There the representatives of the North, the South, the East, and the West, may freely meet, discuss all questions of difference, decide upon suggested wrongs, and apply the remedy. There, Mr. Seward informs M. Drouyn de Lhuys, the seats vacated by the seceding Southerners are still vacant, and ready to receive them; there the discontented Southerners may send their commissioners to state their grievances, and secure a constitutional redress; there the North and the South may agree upon terms of compromise. But let Mr. Seward speak for himself:—

It is true, indeed, that peace must come some time, and that conferences must attend, if they are not allowed to precede, the pacification. There is, however, a better form for such conferences than the one which M. Drouyn de Lhuys suggests. The latter would be palpably in derogation of the Constitution of the United States, and would carry no weight, because destitute of the sanction necessary to bind either the loyal or disloyal portions of the people. On the other hand, the Congress of the United States furnishes a constitutional forum for debates between the alienated parties; senators and representatives of the discontented party, who may be constitutionally sent there from the States involved in the insurrection. Moreover, the conferences which can thus be held in Congress have this great advantage over any other that could be organized on the plan of M. Drouyn de Lhuys—viz:—that Congress, if it thought wise, could call a National Convention to adopt its recommendations, and give them all the solemnity and binding force of organic law.

There is a preponderating argument in favour of the congressional form of conference over that which is suggested by M. Drouyn de Lhuys,—viz., that while accession to the latter would bring the Government into concurrence with the insurgents in disregarding and setting aside an important part of the Constitution of the United States, and so would be a pernicious example, the congressional conference, on the contrary, preserves and gives new strength to that sacred instrument, which must continue through future ages the sheet-anchor of the republic.

It is to be hoped that the reader has fully comprehended the statesmanlike proposition of Mr. Seward—his benevolent intentions towards his rebellious subjects—and the facility with which he disposes of the suggestion of the French Government, by proposing a simpler and at the same time a constitutional means of bringing the war to a close. If any other information is desired, however, touching the feasibility of this mode of adjustment—if any other proof is requisite to show the reliability of Mr. Lincoln's Government in all that concerns American affairs—it will be found in the terms of a now-existing law of the United States' Congress, which forms a necessary sequel to Mr. Seward's despatch.

AN ACT TO PROVIDE AN OATH OF OFFICE, AND FOR OTHER PURPOSES.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That hereafter every person elected or appointed to any office of honour or profit under the Government of the United States, either in the civil, military, or naval departments of the public service, excepting the President of the United States, shall, before entering on the duties of such office, and before being entitled to any of the salary or other emoluments thereof, take and subscribe the following oath or affirmation: "I, A.B., do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I have never voluntarily borne arms against the United States since I have been a citizen thereof; that I have voluntarily given no aid, countenance, counsel, or encouragement to persons engaged in armed hostility thereto; that I have neither sought nor accepted nor attempted to exercise the functions of any office whatever under any authority or pretended authority in hostility to the United States: that I have not yielded a voluntary support to any pretended Government, authority, power, or Constitution within the United States hostile or inimical thereto. And I do further swear (or affirm) that, to the best of my knowledge and ability, I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion; and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter. So help me God."

Which said oath, so taken and signed, shall be preserved among the files of the court house of Congress, or department to which the said office may appertain. And any person who shall falsely take the said oath shall be guilty of perjury, and on conviction, in addition to the penalties now prescribed for that offence, shall be deprived of his office, and rendered incapable for ever after holding any office or place under the United States.

Approved, July 2, 1862.

Thus, while M. Drouyn de Lhuys is informed that all the Southerners have to do to secure the redress of their grievances is to take their seats in Congress, his Government possess a law which prohibits any and all Southerners from appearing in Congress as the representatives of the people of the South.

At the point of Mr. Seward's communication above quoted, a serious question must have suggested itself to the mind of M. Drouyn de Lhuys—Was the American Secretary writing at random, without considering the absurdity of what he wrote? Or, on the other hand, did he really mean to deceive and mislead those who might lend a sort of credence to a statement made by one holding such a high position? We can scarcely give an affirmative response to the first interrogatory, without assigning to the writer a character of mind which, even in the estimation of his partisans, would unfit him for his high position. And yet to assume either that he was ignorant of the existence of the law above recited, or that the fact of its existence was unknown to, or might be kept concealed from, the knowledge of those for whose enlightenment he wrote, constitutes even a stronger imputation against his capacity, as well as his integrity. But it involved more than this; it was an insult, not only to those for whose information it was especially designed, but to the public at large, to whom he submitted it even before it had met the eye of him to whom it was addressed.

The Welcome and the Wedding.

The vast resources of our daily contemporaries have been fairly taxed to present a record of the reception of Princess Alexandra and the royal wedding, and the work has been done so elaborately, and with such excellent taste, as to reflect the highest credit on the English press. To those at home and abroad who did not witness, or rather take part in, the magnificent ceremonial of welcoming the adopted daughter of England to the country with the fortune and glory of which her own happiness and honour are henceforth indissolubly united, the reports of the newspapers will be evidence that the celebration of the gratifying event was altogether worthy of our national greatness. Nevertheless all who were present, and particularly all who were included in the procession, will admit that the clever sketches of the reporters fail to convey an adequate impression of the memorable scene. The pageant itself, though in the City it was far more gorgeous, is as easily described as a Lord Mayor's Show, but what baffles description was the appearance of the great multitude of all sorts and conditions of men who forsook their business and their homes on Saturday last, to offer their free homage to the Queen and to the throne, by heartily greeting the bride of the Prince who, if his life be spared, will one day—may it be a long, long distant day—be King of England. There was something peculiarly touching in the enthusiasm of the people. We have in our midst a population born to toil, and who enjoy comparatively few of the pleasures of life, but they are not the less loyal to the monarchy, which derives its power from its constitutional observance of the rights and liberties of its subjects than their richer fellow-citizens. Our monarch is the first subject of the Constitution, and the administrator thereof. And what is the result? That the nation does not love its sovereign less, though it loves liberty more. The reverence for hereditary authority is combined with that freedom which is oftener the boast than the possession of republics. It is reported that the Emperor (Nicholas) of Russia, in passing through the streets of London, was struck with the comfortable appearance of the people, and exclaimed, "Where are your poor?" If his Imperial Majesty had gone into the bye-ways and lanes, he would have found too much poverty, but no disloyalty; if he had lived till now, he would have seen that even the presence of famine and the imminent ruin of the industry of Lancashire have not caused the slightest murmur of disloyalty. The Princess is said to have been astonished at the demonstration, but even greater will be her wonder when she learns that the homage paid to her as the bride elect of the Prince of Wales was so essentially a free-will offering. Official personages endeavoured to check the popular enthusiasm, but the people would not give up their claim to testify their loyalty on the auspicious occasion. The conduct of the crowd on Saturday is worthy of all praise. The City police did so little—could do so little—to keep order, that we believe they might as well, if not better, have been a hundred miles away from the Metropolis. It was a national levee, and we venture to assert that no reception at St. James's was ever managed with so much good humour and gentlemanly forbearance. We have often heard an English crowd abused as a rough mob, but we venture to say that in no city on the Continent could such a demonstration have been permitted without the control of a large body of forces. Noble lords may be a little horrified at the people being allowed to approach and crowd around the carriage of the Prince and Princess; but the royal couple were not shocked at the intrusion, and felt they were as safe from annoyance as when surrounded by an aristocratic mob at Windsor.

The demonstration on Saturday was impersonal and unselfish. The Prince and his bride were not cheered to the echo for anything they have done to deserve the nation's love, for as yet neither of them has had the opportunity of doing good. Certainly, the demonstration was not on account of any benefit this country can derive from a dynastic alliance with the gallant but small kingdom of Denmark. If an influential alliance had been an object, the Prince would not have looked for a wife in Scandinavia. The universal enthusiasm is evoked by the belief that the marriage is one of affection, and that the heir to the throne has chosen a wife who will emulate the virtues of his mother. And here we may remark that English loyalty is of two kinds. On the one hand, we reverence the King as a King, and on the other, we accord him a warmer but not more enduring attachment in respect to his personal worth. If a King is a bad man, so much the worse for England, but his throne is secure; if a King is a good man, but an unfaithful, unconstitutional Sovereign, his goodness will not save his crown. Under any circumstances, the marriage of a Prince of Wales would be the occasion for public rejoicing, but the hearty goodwill that has been so conspicuous for the last few days is the national acknowledgment of the womanly as well as the constitutional virtues of Queen Victoria—virtues that have made her name glorious and respected throughout the world. We doubt not the Prince and Princess of Wales will gratefully remember this, and loyally give heed to every wish of our widowed Queen. Such conduct will be their best title to the continued affection of the nation, as it will be the most satisfactory evidence of their public and private worth.

We cannot better set forth our good wishes for the Prince and Princess of Wales than by expressing a fervent hope that they may never forfeit the heartfelt love of the British people, and that the historian of the 19th century may be able to relate that Queen Victoria and Albert the Good lived again in the patriotic and domestic virtues of their children.

THE BEGINNING OF SECTIONAL CONFLICTS.

The war with England terminated, without any brilliant achievement on either side, in a peace by which nothing was determined. The only effect which it produced on the relations of public men and political parties in America seems to have been the elevation of General Andrew Jackson, of Tennessee, to the rank of a popular favourite. The successful defence of New Orleans was the only chance afforded the American troops of gaining renown; but so far as the display of soldierly qualities was concerned, the British, who stood up manfully to be shot down by an enemy they could not reach, cannot be said to have lost the honours of the day. But the event reflected infinite discredit on those who sent the best troops in the world—the veterans of the Peninsular war—to be massacred in such a hopeless attempt; while the arrangements which insured an almost bloodless victory to the Americans may be held to have fairly entitled their general to the popularity he ever afterwards enjoyed. Nevertheless, the dearth of great men who were at the same time available candidates for the Presidency, and the unfortunate tendency of the public mind, were not indistinctly evinced by the prominence achieved by a man who had no other title to public favour than a victory of this nature.

After the war was over, it was found necessary once more to take some effective measures to support and strengthen the public credit, for war had plunged the Federal Government into debt. The party which had opposed the policy of Mr. Hamilton appeared on this occasion to justify it. Mr. Dallas, Secretary of the Treasury, reported in favour of a Bill to establish a national bank. The Democratic leaders in the House, mostly men who had come into political life since the time of Hamilton—among them Henry Clay, of Kentucky, and John C. Calhoun, of South Carolina, the two most eminent statesmen of the second generation in America—supported the measure. It passed the House by 80 to 71, the two parties being divided upon it. It received, however, the support of a majority of the Democrats, and only a minority of the Federalists, and was approved by the Democratic President Madison; so completely inconsistent were the present relations of the two parties with their respective professions of faith, and the policy which each had pursued while the Federalists were in possession of power.

The first serious contest on the tariff took place during the same year—1816. The war with England had had, in a minor degree, the same effect on the United States that the present war has had on the South—the effect that war with a great maritime Power must, while the law of blockade and of maritime capture subsist, always exercise upon an agricultural community. It had given impulse and protection to domestic manufactures; and it was proposed to continue this protection by artificial legislation. A protective tariff was accordingly laid before Congress. Its general scope is thus described by the author of "Parties and their Principles":—

"The new tariff measure, which was slightly modified prior to its final passage, arranged imported articles into three classes:—1st, those of which a full domestic supply could be produced; 2nd, those of which only a partial domestic supply could be afforded; and, 3rd, those produced at home very slightly, or not at all. On the first class it was proposed to levy a duty heavy enough to secure the market to the domestic manufacturer, leaving it to domestic competition to keep down the price. On the articles of the second class a duty of 20 per cent. was proposed; thus leaving the field open for foreign competition, and so protecting home labour that it might successfully rival and ultimately supply the whole market. The duties on the third class were adjusted more with reference to revenue than tariff, being articles of quite general consumption, and were for the most part of foreign production."

The plain meaning of a tariff of this nature is simply this: on the first-class of goods a tax of indefinite amount in proportion to their real value—it might be fifty, a hundred, or a thousand per cent.—was to be levied on the consumers, and paid to the producers. On articles of the second class a similar tax was levied, to be applied in the same manner; but its amount was limited to 20 per cent. on the real value of the goods, as delivered at an American port. But in this case a smaller or larger proportion of the tax was to be received by the Exchequer. It is possible that a homogeneous nation may for centuries endure a tariff of this kind—as England did—until a growing enlightenment enables all classes to see where their common interest lies; that is, in making all goods cheap rather than all dear. But in a heterogeneous confederation of States, some of which are chiefly exporters of raw produce and consumers of manufactures, while others are chiefly manufacturers, and consume the raw produce of their confederates and of foreign countries, it is impossible that any such system should long be tolerated. The enlightenment which, in the former case, comes only by the slow progress of economical science, is wonderfully quickened in the other by local jealousy, and by the marked and visible nature of the injury and injustice done. So soon as the separation between agricultural and manufacturing interests—in other words, between those who paid for protection and those who profited by it—became clearly identified with the lines of State boundaries, and most of all, with the lines of geographical demarcation between the great sections of the Union, it became clearly impossible finally to maintain at once the Union and the Tariff. If a difference of another kind had not brought about a sectional disruption of the United States, the question of free trade must before long have done so. But in 1816 the manufacturing and agricultural interests were not as yet clearly identified with any State or sectional boundaries; and among the chief opponents of the tariff were the prominent representatives of those States which are now waging war in the name of the Union rather to restore protection than to abolish slavery. The chief of the Free-traders—if so they may be called—was Daniel Webster, of Massachusetts. He was supported by a majority of the representatives of the North-East; by the greater part of the remnant of the Federalists; and by several of the Southern Democrats, with Mr. Randolph at their head, who warned their fellow-citizens against the measure, as calculated to build up the manufactures of the Middle and Eastern States at the expense of the South. The fact seems to be that at that time the foreign commerce of the North-Eastern States was of far more consequence than their manufactures; and the mercantile interest was naturally and strongly opposed to a system of restrictions on trade. It is less easy to understand the reasons which induced representatives of the South, like Clay, Calhoun, and Lowndes of South Carolina, to give their cordial support to a scheme so unfavourable to the interests of their constituents.

Mr. Madison was succeeded in 1817 by Mr. Monroe, who had been his Secretary of State; and who, like all his predecessors except Adams, held his office for two consecutive terms. His election was the last at which the Federalists made a party stand: and under his Administration they ceased to exist as a party. He was, perhaps, the most strictly consistent of the Democratic Presidents; inasmuch as he thought it his duty to put his veto on bills for internal improvements, as inconsistent with the Constitution, although he thought it not inexpedient that the Constitution should be so amended as to permit them. The extinction of party organization allowed John Quincy Adams, son of the last Federalist President, to take office under Monroe, as Secretary of State.

In 1824 a new and more stringent Tariff Bill was passed by both branches of Congress, at the recommendation of the President, by narrow majorities. On this occasion the sectional division of interests made itself clearly perceptible. Henry Clay was at the head of the Protectionists, and carried the whole vote of his State; Delaware also voted for the tariff; but every other Southern State gave an overwhelming majority against it. It had no advocates among the representatives of Louisiana, Alabama, Georgia, and the Carolinas (Calhoun was Secretary of War, and therefore out of Congress). Tennessee gave two ayes to seven noes, and Virginia had only one Protectionist out of twenty-two representatives. Maine, New Hampshire, and Massachusetts were almost unanimous against the tariff, and Daniel Webster ably stated their case against it. It was carried by ninety-four votes from the Western and Middle States, with twelve from other quarters, against the South and against a strong majority in New England. It was beginning, therefore, to be apparent to the South what was the real meaning of protection—a tribute paid by Southern consumers to Northern manufacturers. The distress which at that time prevailed in the corn-growing States appears to have disposed the West, on this occasion, to take a part altogether opposed to right, reason, and to its real interests. Distress at home has always the effect of inducing the Democracy to look with great jealousy on importations from abroad.

But a more serious cause of sectional division of parties was already at work. The great event of Mr. Monroe's Administration was the passing of that measure which is known to history as the Missouri Compromise; the result of a conflict in which North and South were fairly and distinctly pitted one against the other and in which sectional interests and sectional prejudices determined almost every individual vote.

The contest began in February, 1819. Missouri, a part of the Louisiana territory purchased from France by President Jefferson, claimed admission into the Union. A Bill authorizing the people of the Territory of Missouri to frame a Constitution, and providing for the admission of the new State, had been reported and read a second time. The war began by a motion to insert a proviso forbidding slavery in the Territory, moved by Gen. Tallmadge, of New York. There seems to have been no pretence for any such restriction, except in the fact that the last State admitted had been a Slave State, which mattered the less that the Free States had still a majority in both branches of Congress. But the North took up the matter fiercely, and the proviso was inserted in the House of Representatives by 82 to 78. The Senate struck it out, the House reinserted it, and the Bill was lost.

The case in favour of the proviso was not a strong or a clear one. It was contended on the part of the North, simply that slavery was natura in se, and that Congress had a right to refuse to admit States whose admission seemed to it inconsistent with the public weal. It might have been enough to answer that the Constitution, did not recognize any ground of objection to slavery; that, on the contrary, it protected slave property by a peculiar law; and that Congress, by admitting Tennessee, Alabama, and Mississippi as Slave States, had debarred itself from the right to object to slavery on moral grounds; while the admission of Louisiana as a Slave State had precluded it from claiming the whole soil west of the great river for white labour, even if such a claim could have been reconciled with equal justice to the South. These arguments would probably have been conclusive with an English Parliament; but American representatives have always had less regard for precedent, and more sympathy with popular passions. The one real argument of the North was abhorrence of slavery; a perfectly fair ground for moralists or foreigners to take up, but a ground forbidden to American statesmen by the conditions of the Union. Accordingly, while some eloquence and much angry declamation were employed in the advocacy of the restriction, all reasoning and all statesmanship were on the Southern side. The faith of the Union was pledged to a treaty which secured to the people of the ceded territory all the rights of citizens of the United States, and all those which they already enjoyed; and therefore the right of admission to the Union, and the right of holding slaves. Again, it was absurd to expect that the South would consent to be excluded from the whole of the common territory of the Union—for to this, and nothing less, did the Northern claim point; absurd, above all, to imagine that she would submit to such an injury, when justified by an argument which was in itself an insult—namely, that her institutions were inconsistent with justice and morality. It was, moreover, inconsistent with the character to be assigned to Missouri on her admission—the character of a sovereign State—that she should be hampered in her legislation by any other law than the Constitution of the Union. It would seem, therefore, that if we regard the quarrel from an American and a political point of view, we must pronounce the North to have been utterly and extravagantly in the wrong. The quarrel was, however, passionately adopted by the people of the Northern States, who expressed furious displeasure with all those of their Senators or representatives who showed any leaning to moderation or compromise.

Nevertheless, owing to the firmness and honesty of a few Northern Senators, a compromise was accomplished during the following session. A Bill was passed in the House for the admission of the State of Maine. The Senate tacked to it the Missouri Bill, without restriction (the vote being 23 to 21; Delaware deserting the South, and three Northern Senators voting with it). The House rejected the amendment, and a conference took place, which resulted in the admission of Maine, the passage of the Bill authorizing Missouri to frame a Constitution, and the famous proviso excluding slavery from all territory north of 36°-30', the Southern boundary of the State of Missouri. The latter suggestion had been previously made in the Senate by Mr. Thomas, of Illinois; and carried by 34 to 10, receiving 14 Southern votes. This was the famous Missouri Compromise.

It did not, however, admit the State of Missouri; and when that State applied for admission, presenting her Constitution, a treacherous attempt was made by the Northern party (which had gained two additional votes in the Senate by the admission of Maine under the compromise) to evade the fulfilment of the bargain. The pretext was a clause in the State Constitution, excluding free negroes from Missouri—the same in substance which is now in force in Illinois and several other Northern States. The attempt was, however, defeated; and Missouri was admitted on engaging not to exclude any citizens of any of the United States from any privileges to which they are entitled under the Federal Constitution.

Before assenting to the first compromise, the President put two questions to his Cabinet. Had Congress the power to prohibit slavery in the Territories? They all answered in the affirmative. Did the proviso excluding slavery from the territory north of 36°-30', refer only to its territorial condition, or bind States to be subsequently formed out of it? John Quincy Adams answered that it would bind such States, all his colleagues dissenting. The question was subsequently changed for one which all could answer in the affirmative, to avoid the revelation of this dissension in the Cabinet.

It will be seen from these facts that the beginning of that sectionalization of parties which has proved fatal to the Union took place under the rule of the last President of the "Virginia Dynasty"—the last of the contemporaries of Washington. The power they had so long and so worthily held was now to pass into inferior hands; the honourable repute they had won for their country was gradually to fade. The decline of American statesmanship, and the degradation of American policy, may be said to date from the retirement of President Monroe.

[In our last, the sub-title "Ascendancy of the Federalists" was retained by mistake. It should have been "Ascendancy of the Elder Democrats." And "Dr. W. H. Clinton" was a misprint for "De Witte Clinton."]

LETTER FROM RICHMOND.

RICHMOND, January 21.

Though the meeting of Congress had been fixed for the 12th of January, it was not until the 14th that a quorum was obtained in both houses, and the country was kept waiting forty-eight hours, by the absence of a single senator, for the Message of President Davis. That document has been printed in extenso in the columns of the New York Herald, and will probably have been transferred to THE INDEX before you can possibly receive this letter. What impression it may make upon the political mind of Europe we can only conjecture, but it is regarded here by all parties as an exceedingly able exposition of the relations of the Confederate States to the Government with which we are at war across the Potomac and the Powers which yet refuse to recognize our separate nationality across the Atlantic. Its criticism of the views of the English Ministry on the subject of the blockade and the convention of the Congress of Paris in relation thereto, is equally just and forcible, and it is difficult to see how Earl Russell can escape its cogency. With regard to the conduct of the war, one of the most important passages of the Message is that which announces the purpose of the President to hand over all officers of the United States fighting under the Abolition Proclamation of Lincoln who may hereafter be taken prisoners by our forces, to the civil authorities of the respective States in which they may be so captured, for trial under the local statutes provided to punish the incitement of servile insurrection.

The agents of Lincoln, who enter Virginia with fire and sword, proclaiming freedom to the slave and endeavouring to array the black race against the white, are but carrying out, on a larger scale, the fiendish programme of John Brown, and should perish on John Brown's scaffold; and there is no reason whatever why the law which hanged the criminal of Harper's Ferry should not also hang General Milroy, who appears to be even a more despicable character. The proclamation of Lincoln, which had not been received here at the date of my last letter, is a marvel of malignity and of stupidity as well. It is a crime, but it is worse than this, it is a blunder, a blunder of the most foolish sort. It tacitly confesses the utter hopelessness of the subjugation of the South by force of arms, in the cowardly attempt to destroy our people by the torch of the incendiary and the knife of the midnight assassin. Waiving altogether the stupendous wickedness of seeking to compass the wholesale murder of eight millions of human beings through a worse than Sepoy massacre in a Christian land, at which the civilized world must stand aghast, we may well doubt whether any folly could be greater than that of dividing and distracting one's own forces, and uniting more firmly the forces of one's enemy, by one and the same act. The proclamation is not approved by the whole Northern people. It has caused already many resignations in the army and navy of the United States. It has brought forth a protest from "loyal Kentucky." The Union is unquestionably the weaker for it. But if it was possible it has banded the Southern people yet more firmly together for the prosecution of the war, and it has rendered for ever impossible, even to the purblind vision of the Northern Conservatives, that reconstruction to which they have so unreasonably looked forward as the sequel of a long and bloody strife. Mr. Lincoln has by this instance of folly and crime, lost every claim to respect, and mankind must regard with mingled horror and contempt this cruel, vulgar pitiable, insensible, funny man, half lunatic, half buffoon, Impotens, jocosus, inexplicabilis, fallax—who carries the disposition of a jackall in the form of the quadrumanus, and betrays the asinine instincts in his bray and in his actions. It is a singular fact, some time ago pointed out, that the anagram of Abraham Lincoln is "a h—ll-born maniac," and in this instance, as in that of Lord Nelson (Honor est a Nilo), the new collation of the letters would seem to have a peculiar significance.

In the devoted region of the Valley, General Milroy, following with commendable promptness the example of his master, has issued his pronunciamento, headed in flaring capitals "FREEDOM TO SLAVES!" in which he announces to the negro population of the county of Frederick, wherein is situated the town of Winchester, that they are absolutely free, that no acts they may commit to establish or maintain their freedom will be repressed by the military forces under his command, but that they are enjoined to betake themselves to useful employments and to abstain from personal violence, unless in necessary self-defence. No penalty is set forth for a wanton disregard of this latter injunction, nor is it suggested what will constitute the se defendendo in the opinion of General Milroy. As for the useful employments, if the negroes, acting after their kind, should refuse to betake themselves to such, why General Milroy will bid them go in the Prince's name, the mighty name of Lincoln, and thank Heaven he has got rid of the arrant knaves. Then, of course, it will be necessary for them, in order to maintain their freedom, to plunder their former masters, and no little offences of this sort will be "repressed" by the Federal officers. In other words, the negroes are encouraged to burn, murder, and steal, with the assurance of impunity for these crimes, and solemnly advised to go to work and behave themselves, under no penalty for idleness and brutality. But General Milroy looks with satisfaction to the commission of yet darker and more hellish deeds by the enfranchised blacks than arson, theft, assassination. He has ordered the women of Winchester, one and all, to come forward and take the oath of allegiance to the United States, declaring that all protection of their persons and property will be withheld until such oath has been taken. Admirable Milroy! Let Butler resign the crown of infamy which has been given him by the vote of mankind. Butler would have handed over the women of New Orleans to the lust of his unlicensed soldiery; Milroy, with a refinement of malice, would commit the women of Winchester to the savage passions of the negro, if he can exile them! The proclamation of Milroy has been made the subject of a special Message to the Legislature of Virginia by Governor Letcher, who asks that legislation may be had with direct reference to the necessities of the case.

In the Congressional district, including the cities of Norfolk and Portsmouth, which is mostly in possession of the enemy, the enforcement of the proclamation of Lincoln was made contingent upon the failure to make an election of a member of the Federal Congress by a majority of the voters. The malicious ingenuity of this device is apparent. The polls were opened, and the people were asked to record their free and untrammelled suffrages under the direst compulsion. If they voted in sufficient numbers to exempt the district from the operation of Lincoln's edict, the fact was to be proclaimed as a proof of the loyal feeling of that portion of Virginia; if they refused to vote, then 25,000 slaves were (in the language of General Dix's organ, the Norfolk and Portsmouth Union) to be "turned loose to depredate upon their property," and every recalcitrant suffragan was to be held liable to imprisonment and the confiscation of his estate. As you may suppose, a member of Congress was elected, a native-born Yankee, and the negroes, who had paraded the streets of Norfolk on New Year's Day with music and banners, to celebrate their newly-acquired freedom, were informed by General Dix, when they applied for formal papers of manumission, that as to them, the beneficence of Liberator Lincoln was of no effect. Thus the philanthropists of Exeter Hall may learn that it is hatred of the master, and not love of the slave, which has prompted the great Emancipation decree of President Lincoln. By a practical paradox, at once ludicrous and disgusting, the Union press of Norfolk, established in the interests of the Yankees, made their appeal to the voters of the district to manifest their loyalty as the means of holding on to their negroes, and the support of the Federal Government was considered the test of pro-slavery opinions! All who should refuse to vote were denounced beforehand as worse enemies of the "peculiar institution" than the vilest "incendiary of the Garrison school," in the Norfolk and Portsmouth Union, December 18, 1862.

In the "northern neck" of Virginia, by which geographical designation is known all that tier of counties on our northern boundary lying between the Potomac and Rappahannock Rivers, the Federals are thought to be carrying out the emancipation scheme in a manner which will commend itself but little to the followers of Clarkson and Macaulay. Roaming at will through this defenceless and indefensible portion of the State, the Federal cavalry officers go from plantation to plantation tearing by main force the negro women and children from their homes, and compelling them, despite their earnest protestations and entreaties, to go on board the armed transports which swarm in the rivers. It is known that some of these vessels have gone out the capes to sea, and the belief is that the poor slaves are taken to Cuba for sale. The barracoons of the Guinea coast have been established at Washington, where hundreds of these unfortunate creatures are kept huddled together, and there is little doubt that the horrors of the Middle Passage have been revived by the Abolitionists of New England.

I have mentioned that many officers of the army and navy of the United States have resigned in consequence of the Emancipation Proclamation of Lincoln. It might have been supposed that the resignations would be so numerous as almost to disorganize both arms of the Federal service, and such would undoubtedly have been the result, if all who, at the beginning of the contest, declared that they would lay down their commissions the moment it became an Abolition war, had redeemed their pledges. Brevet-Lieutenant-General Winfield Scott, and Major-General George B. McClellan, are both committed in writing to such a course. Major-General Halleck, upon leaving San Francisco to take service in the Federal army, declared to friends in that city that he would fight only to restore the Union under the Constitution. Major-General Burnside, who is known to many Southern officers as a man of honourable feelings and generous impulses, has again and again repeated the promise that his sword should be sheathed whenever the Government at Washington sought to destroy the social institutions of the South. No longer ago than August 1862, at Chatham, opposite Fredericksburg, while the guns of the second battle of Manassas were sounding in his ears, he assured W. Roy Mason, Esq., of the county of King George (then a prisoner in his hands), that he would not fight to abolish slavery, and when this should be proclaimed as the purpose of the Government, he would never more be officer of Lincoln's. It is difficult now to understand how he can retain both his commission and his self-respect. That he meant to resign rather than join in a war of extermination and servile massacre of the Southern people, we are bound to believe; but having once undertaken to do the bidding of a tyrant and a slave, he has found it difficult to withdraw from the degrading service, or rather he has been degraded by the very character of his duties, and an originally honest nature has been

To what it works in, like the dyer's hand.

Congress has now been in session but seven days, and for a considerable portion of the time both houses have sat with closed doors. Their proceedings, as known to the public, give an earnest of their disposition to perform the business of the country with all possible despatch, and with fidelity to its best interests. Very grave matters demand their earnest attention. First of these in importance is the question of the finances. It is recognized by everybody, from Mr. Memminger down to the most unlettered private in the army, who has drawn his last month's pay in Treasury notes, that something must be done to remedy the evils of a depreciated currency. To fix a maximum of issue is a preventive against further depreciation which students of finance may learn from Lord Overstone, but the undue inflation of the circulating medium, which has brought down Confederate money to its present state of depression, calls for a speedy remedy. Mr. Baldwin, of Virginia, introduced a Bill, a few days ago, which he supported in a speech of marked ability, looking to taxation and the funding system as the means of restoring the currency to a healthy condition. The matter of exemption from military service under the Conscription Law has also occupied the attention of our legislators. In the House of Representatives, Mr. Foote, of Tennessee, has moved an investigation of certain large contracts for commissary stores, in which fraud has been alleged, and an inquiry into the propriety of recalling our foreign Commissioners. Should the latter step be determined on, it is to be accompanied by a notification to foreign Consuls residing in Southern cities, and holding their exequaturs from a Government with which we are at war, that they can no longer exercise their consular functions within the limits of the Confederate States. A joint resolution, introduced in the House of Representatives by Mr. Perkins, of Louisiana, bestowing the thanks of Congress upon the noble citizens of New Orleans, who have kept their "loyalty, their love, and zeal" for the Confederate cause, under the galling tyranny of Butler, was passed by a unanimous vote in both Houses. In the Senate, the death of Hon. W.

Ballard Preston, one of the Senators from the State of Virginia, was announced by his colleague, Hon. R. M. T. Hunter, in the language of appropriate eulogy, and becoming tributes to his memory were offered by Senators Henry, of Tennessee, Semmes, of Louisiana, Clay, of Alabama, and Wigfall, of Texas. In the House of Representatives the sad event elicited proper panegyrics on the deceased from Messrs. Staples, Goode, and Lyons, of Virginia, Miles, of South Carolina, Perkins, of Louisiana, and Chilton, of Alabama.

Two new Senators have been elected recently to Congress, one Hon. Herschel V. Johnson, of Georgia, in the place of General Robert Toombs, resigned, and the other, Allen T. Caperton, Esq., of Virginia, in the place of Hon. W. Ballard Preston, deceased. Mr. Johnson is well known as the candidate for the Vice-Presidency of the United States, on the ticket with the late Judge Stephen A. Douglas, of Illinois, in the election of 1860. Mr. Caperton has borne a most respectable part in the politics of Virginia for some years past, as a member of the old Whig party, and was a supporter of Mr. Bell for the Presidency against Lincoln, Douglas, and Breckinridge. His election was due, to some extent, to the circumstance that he comes from the Trans-Alleghany district of Virginia, there being a generally-accepted, though unwritten law in State politics, that of the two Senators in Congress, one shall be chosen from the counties lying east, and the other from the counties lying west of the Alleghanies, and the eastern section being already represented in the Senate in the person of Mr. Hunter.

So much for Congress and its proceedings.

The military operations of the past three weeks have been without any decisive shock of arms between the Federal and Confederate forces, but they manifest an activity and alertness on the part of our generals at various points in the highest degree encouraging to our cause. As predicted in my last letter, the army of General Bragg was compelled to fall back after the battle of Murfreesboro; but the retreat was conducted in good order, and all the spoils of the victory—the captured stores, guns, waggons, &c.—were safely brought away. The prisoners, numbering over 5000, have arrived, and are kept in the military prisons in this city, preparatory to their discharge under parole and delivery to the Federal Commissioner, in accordance with the cartel for exchange. The cavalry wing of Bragg's army, commanded by the dashing General Wheeler, and the irregular horse of the indomitable Jack Morgan, have been especially active in harassing the enemy in Tennessee. One of the most brilliant achievements of the war was performed last week by Wheeler in the capture of a Federal gunboat and four transports on the Cumberland River. The cavalry has demonstrated so successfully its ability to cope with the enemy on the water that it may perhaps be advisable to send them out to sea to break the blockade. In the European wars in the Low Countries it has more than once happened that vessels of war have been taken by a charge of dragoons upon the ice, but so far as my reading extends, this exploit of General Wheeler is the first instance on record of an armed steamer in motion being captured by a troop of horse. Not less eclatant, and far more important in results, was the coup of General Magruder, in Galveston Bay, in making a prize of the Harriet Lane and the store ship which lay under the protection of her guns. This novel method of attacking the blockaders was suggested more than a year ago by General Magruder with regard to the enemy's ships off the mouth of York River, and might have been put in practice at that time but for the want of proper guns to mount upon the assaulting batteaux. The repulse of the Yankee General Sherman at Vicksburg has been followed by no further hostile demonstration against that gallant city, which still defies the foe. We have, however, sustained a reverse upon the Arkansas River in the loss of Arkansas Post, with a large number of prisoners; the intelligence of which, coming to us only through the Northern journals, we receive with some grains of allowance for the inevitable extravagance of the enemy's reporters.

The army of Fredericksburg has gone into winter-quarters, which means log huts, tents with mud chimneys (for the escape of smoke from improvised fire-places underneath the earth floor), old tobacco houses, still standing upon the estates occupied by the troops, and whatever else of shelter from the frost and the rain they can find or construct. The army of Burnside lies across the Rappahannock, protected from the cold by admirable wooden buildings sent in detached pieces from Washington (with which city they are in easy and rapid communication by steamers on the Potomac), and supplied with all the comforts and many of the luxuries of civilization. The private draws his rations of coffee, and the commanding general sips his glass of claret, while the warm regulation jacket, stout shoes, heavy blankets of the rank and file, and the numberless appointments and contrivances which are supplied to the officers from the shops of New York are in requisition to fortify them against the winter of Virginia. Again and again have we heard from Fredericksburg that Burnside was about to make a second advance, but he comes not as yet, and will probably not move from his present position until the opening of spring.

You will have observed that the Government at Washington, fully endorsing the conduct of Butler at New Orleans, [Nota bene, that this monster has been received with ovations and serenades in the Northern cities], and refusing to render satisfaction for the murder of William B. Mumford, has ordered the Confederate officers captured in the West to be kept in close confinement, in retaliation for the like treatment of Federal officers, which our Government was compelled to decree as a measure of necessary protection to its citizens. Thus has another element of bitterness entered into this cruel and unnatural war, and thus are we rapidly drifting into a strife internecine and unrestrained by the common dictates of humanity. Whatever may be the issue of this resort to the lex talionis, the civilized world will hold the authorities of the Confederate States guiltless of wrong. Upon the heads of those who inaugurated the system, who have upheld the atrocities of Butler and the butcheries of McNeil, who commenced the war by making medicines contraband, and who have continued it by the official outrage of women, be the blood which may flow from the ultimate desperation of the conflict. I have already spoken of Milroy and his diabolical order with regard to the defenceless wives and daughters of the citizens of Winchester. That this heartless treatment of the women of Virginia has been his long-established policy, we know from many sources of information. A gentleman now in Richmond, formerly a citizen of Hardy County, who came to the city to nurse his only son, a brave boy, that lost his arm in the battle of Fredericksburg, yesterday received a letter from his daughter, at home within the enemy's lines, which no man of sensibility could read without a feeling of righteous vengeance—a simple narrative of outrages and spoliation that might—— turn the coward's heart to steel, the sluggard's blood to flame.

After recounting the destruction of property, the pillage of furniture, and the sufferings and privations of the family, the poor girl writes that her mother, sister, and self had taken the oath of allegiance to the United States as enjoined by General Milroy. But out of the depths of a heart bursting with sorrow, and with a touching womanly tenderness, she adds: "Don't be angry, father; we are not false, we did it to protect our persons, not the property!" I cannot add one word to this record of crime.

The exclusion of medicines as articles contraband of war, against all the usages of nations and the doctrines of the writers on international law, whereby the war upon the "rebellion" was made from the start a merciless persecution of the sick and the dying, has been but little noticed abroad, and not much dwelt upon by our own writers and speakers, because we have been unwilling to make unmanly appeals to the feelings of Christendom. It is in striking illustration of wicked inventions returning to plague the inventor that at this moment the Yankees themselves are the severest sufferers from the straitened pharmacopœia of the Confederacy. The gangrene has broken out in the military prisons in this city, and the surgeons are almost powerless to stop its ravages for the want of proper medicines.

The health of Richmond during the winter has been more disordered than we have known it at the same season for many years past. That dreadful malady, the small-pox, has carried off large numbers of the soldiers encamped in the neighbourhood, and prevails to a painful extent at this time throughout the city. By an ordinance of the City Council, all private dwellings in which one or more persons are prostrated by this disease must be designated by a white flag displayed from one of the front windows, and one cannot walk in any quarter of the town without seeing those fluttering pennons of sickness and death. Among the latest victims was Alexander Galt, the sculptor, for many years a student of art in Florence, where he executed many excellent busts, among them the Bacchante, which attracted much attention in the Great Exhibition of 1851, and a full length marble statue of Thomas Jefferson, under a commission from the State of Virginia. This statue has been erected at the University of Virginia. Galt died at the early age of 35. Just before his death he had modelled a fine head in plaster of Jefferson Davis, and a bas-relief of General "Stonewall" Jackson from studies made in the camp near Fredericksburg. He was a man of most amiable qualities, and his death has elicited an universal expression of sorrow. The Confederacy moans the loss of a gallant and accomplished officer in the recent death of Major-General David R. Jones, of South Carolina. He died at his lodgings in this city a few days ago of disease of the heart. General Jones was prominent in the battles before Richmond last summer, in all of which he won distinction. The funeral services were held on Monday last at St. Paul's Church. The military escort were under the command of General Elzey; among the mourners were the President and Mrs. Davis, and the pall was borne by the gentlemen of the President's staff. The remains were deposited in a vault of Hollywood Cemetery, to be hereafter removed to South Carolina.

Bulwer's "Strange Story" has been reprinted by a publishing house in Mobile, and other more recent English novels are promised us by enterprising bookmen in other cities of the Confederate States. This is a gratifying evidence of the resources of the country under the blockade, and when our independence has been acknowledged and we shall commence as a separate nation, "to run the great career of justice," an international copyright law will be in force, by which the rights of the foreign author will be protected, while a stimulus will be offered to native talent.

The winter rains have set in, and the western rivers are at their flood. In the war almanacks for Tennessee they write against the latter part of January—"About this time expect the gunboats." Let us hope that General Wheeler will continue to keep them in check with his "horse-marines." In Eastern Virginia the rains have been attended by a moderate temperature, the mercury not having fallen below 45 degrees of Fahrenheit.

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

AMERICA.

The news per Jura has arrived this morning, and, therefore, we can only give a brief resumé of the important intelligence, of which the details will be looked for with much interest.

On the 5th instant a battle took place at Springville, Tennessee. The Confederates were commanded by General Van Dorn, and the Federals by General Coburn. The result of the battle, which is said to have lasted all day, was the complete defeat of the Federals. According to the New York advices, "the Federal forces consisted of three regiments of infantry, 500 cavalry, and one battery of artillery. Nearly all the Federal infantry were cut to pieces, or captured, but the cavalry and artillery escaped." We may judge from these admissions the severity of the disaster, and the completeness of the defeat. As usual, the defeat is ascribed to the inefficiency of a Federal Commander. The battle was fought on the 5th, and yet in New York on the evening of the 6th, "General Gillit is severely censured for not sending reinforcements to Coburn from Franklin. The news of this victory was preceded by an announcement that "General Van Dorn had been driven back by the Federals."

There has been a demonstration in the Senate. Mr. Doolittle warned "the traitors at home" that America was only beginning to fight, and would crush out the rebellion, and that she would "stand before the world greater, more powerful, more glorious than ever, and beyond what had ever entered into the mind of man to conceive." He said before the Federals would submit to separation, they would reduce Louisiana to "a territory of swamps and crocodiles," and that "it was his religious belief that the American Republic was that political power foretold by the prophets, and for which good men of all ages looked and prayed, and to whose success and duration Heaven with all its omnipotence was pledged." All this hideous blasphemy sounds like the ravings of a maniac. Speaker Grow, in his valedictory address to the House of Representatives, declared that no matter what changes were wrought in the social organism of America, its territorial limits would continue the same; which means that territory is dearer to the North than liberty. Speaker Grow received an unanimous vote of thanks from the House for the manner in which he had presided.

All the general Appropriation Bills were passed by Congress before the close of the session, and have been signed by the President. These, together with the other appropriations, amount to about 1,000,000,000 dollars. The Miscellaneous Appropriation Bill, originally introduced by the Committee of Ways and Means, appropriated only $1,200,000 dollars; but before it passed through both Houses, the sum was enlarged to twenty millions. None so generous as those who never expect to pay.

The bill to admit Colorado and Nevada as States of the Union, which passed the Senate, failed to pass in the House of Representatives, the latter refusing to suspend the rules for its consideration. Both Houses of Congress passed the resolutions concerning mediation, as reported from the Committee of Foreign Relations.

The war of parties in the North is not over, but rather seems to be growing fiercer and more determined. At a meeting of the Democratic Association President Lincoln's name was hissed. A large meeting has taken place at Trenton, New Jersey, in response to a call to celebrate the death of a Congress which had trampled upon the liberties of the people. Speeches were made declaring that the people were in a worse condition than the people of Austria, and hopes were expressed that the State Government would do its duty to protect the citizens. Resolutions were also passed, denouncing the unlimited control of the purse and sword of the nation, and the unrestrained power over the persons of the citizens given to the President, and declaring that it was the duty of the States to resist firmly all encroachments upon their rights; that the Conscription Bill was an aggression upon the sovereignty of New Jersey; and that the State authorities were called on to take measures for the successful vindication of the rights of the State. The employment of negroes was denounced, and New Jersey was stated to be utterly opposed to the prosecution of the war upon any other than a constitutional basis.

The report of General Banks being fired at in New Orleans is a canard. General Banks is charged by the Tribune with being an oppressor of the negro. A secession demonstration occurred at New Orleans on the occasion of the departure of a large number of Confederate prisoners for the South. A large number of people assembled on the levee to witness their departure, and made various secession demonstrations. General Banks sent a regiment of soldiers to disperse the assemblage, and no disturbance occurred.

We have also the following items by telegram:—

It is considered probable that a conflict may have taken place at Vicksburg, and not impossible it may have been evacuated by the Confederates.

General Joseph Johnston, who commands at Vicksburg, is the general who evacuated Manassas and Yorktown in such a wily manner, and at such moments, as to seriously disconcert the Federal plans based upon his resistance at each point. He may have repeated the same move at Vicksburg, which is supplied by one line of railway. If he has—Port Hudson being strong enough to hold in check the Federal advance down the Mississippi—Johnston may throw himself northward upon Memphis, or to the north-east upon Rosencrans, or even by a rapid southward movement in conjunction with the small but formidable Confederate fleet attempt to re-capture New Orleans. But adopting either of these plans, he would of course abandon for the time the Red River country, which lies between Vicksburg and Port Hudson, and through which the Confederates receive immense supplies from Texas.

Much anxiety is felt in regard to Charleston. The expedition against that place is most formidable, and great efforts will be made to take it; but General Beauregard has been allowed time enough to complete all his fortifications, solid and floating, and to concentrate a powerful force.

The Charleston journals say that the privateer Retribution has captured a whaler in the Caribbean seas. The whaler previously showed fight, and killed one man on board the Retribution.

The Federals attacked Fort Macalister, Savannah, on the 3rd instant. The attack continued at last accounts.

A riot has occurred at Detroit, Michigan, caused by an attempt of the mob to take from the authorities and lynch a negro charged with assaulting a white girl. The mob failed to capture the negro, but attacked the coloured people miscellaneous. Fifteen persons are said to be killed, and as many houses burned.

In New York a State judge has declared his intention of executing his writ of Habeas Corpus against a Federal colonel, who, however, remains in his castle at Governor's Island.

There are growing symptoms at the West of popular dissatisfaction, and much is said of secret associations organized both to support and oppose the Government.

The Kentucky House of Representatives has passed a resolution calling a national convention, and a convention of the Mississippi Valley States. It is supposed the Senate would concur in the resolution.

The New York Legislature has appointed a committee to wait on the President in reference to the prisoners from New York State, confined in Fort M'Henry, who, it is alleged, have been cruelly treated.

The municipal elections in New York State indicate great gains for the Democratic party.

It is rumoured that the Federal Commander at Baton Rouge has refused to recognise the negro regiments.

General Banks has issued orders that negro troops are to be regarded as equals with the white troops.

On the 6th of March, gold at New York sold as low 149, but before 12 o'clock had recovered to 152½. At 2 o'clock the price was 155, and at 4 it closed at 154.

The war in America is, for the moment, all but forgotten in the presence of the great Revolution in the North. Three years ago the people of the United States were justified in boasting of being as free as any people on the face of the earth, and now there is no people subject to such an unmitigated despotism. Hitherto it has been supposed that the loss of constitutional freedom must be gradual, but it seems there is, after all, but one step from enviable liberty to shameful servility. The puppet of the White House is invested with more absolute power than the Czar of Russia. At his bidding the whole of the male population, between the ages of 18 and 45, white and black, must become his soldiers. We are not in any way deluded by the Northern announcement that he can, by the Conscription Act, obtain an army of three or four millions. The Border States, and even some of the Southern States, are included in the Northern estimates. If it is true that Mr. Lincoln can raise three or four millions, we in this country might, from our larger and so much less scattered population, be able to raise an army of five or six millions of men; but this is, we know, impossible. But if Mr. Lincoln can enforce the Conscription he may procure men enough to recruit his broken ranks, and even to increase his present total force. He may procure an army large enough to hold his people in utter subjection.

Not only is the means of seizing upon the Sovereign power given to Mr. Lincoln, but he is encouraged to use them. All constitutional restraints are removed, so that he may not have the trouble of getting rid of them. The Northern people have given up their personal liberty with acclamation. The President, who is clothed with full military authority, can legally imprison whom he likes, and for any length of time. The act lately passed by Congress provides, "That during the present rebellion, the President of the United States, whenever in his judgment the public safety may require it, is authorized to suspend the privilege of the writ of Habeas Corpus in any case throughout the United States, or any part thereof." Further, the President and his officers are secured by an act of indemnity, and, as it were, encouraged to venture on any course of oppression that may suggest itself to them.

Besides these things, the President has a credit such as no despot ever before enjoyed—a credit that will enable him to drain his subjects of their last dollar's-worth of convertible property. Mr. Lincoln has also the privilege of issuing letters of marque or reprisal, so that it suits his purpose he can force the too-forbearing nations of Europe into a war.

Why do the people of the United States thus prostrate themselves before an idol—like most idols, nothing in itself, but representative of others—that they themselves have set up? Is the United States invaded? No. Is it necessary to resign freedom at the North in order to conquer the South? Grant that the Conscription Bill and the money bills are necessary, why should the President be allowed to trample on the civil liberty of the citizens? The affair would be farcical if we could not look behind the scenes. Mr. Lincoln will only be permitted to reign as the tool of New England, and the object of New England is not so much to conquer the South, as to reduce the West to a condition of political serfdom. Well may the South rejoice that she is separate from such a people, and well may she determine that at any cost of blood and treasure that separation shall be final.

The Democratic party in the North is frantic with the rejection of its overtures by the South. It is now apparent that the Democrats laboured under the extraordinary delusion that a reconstruction was possible if the South were permitted to dictate her own terms. The threats of vengeance are unreasonable. What have the Democrats done in times past to put a stop to this war? Did they refuse to invade the South? Are not their hands stained with Southern blood? Did they stay the issue of a proclamation for a servile war? What have they done that the South should more esteem them than the Republicans? What have they hitherto left undone that their warm adhesion to Mr. Lincoln should be a danger to the South? They did their best to conquer the South, and failed. Since then they have done their best to persuade the South to accept the Government of the North, and they have failed. Nothing remains for them but to make peace, or, with diminished strength and resources, to make another essay to conquer the South.

The Indianola, a Federal ironclad, sent to recapture the Queen of the West, was attacked by that vessel and some steamers, and forced to surrender to the Confederates. This affair took place twenty-five miles below Vicksburg. According to Northern accounts the Indianola is one of the new iron-clad gunboats recently built at Cincinnati, Ohio. She is four hundred and forty-two tons burthen, and is one hundred and seventy-five feet in length, fifty-one and a half feet broad, six feet in depth of hold, and draws with all on board but six feet three inches of water. The thickness of her bottom planking is five inches, of her lining three inches, of her sides four inches, and of her deck four and a half inches. Over all is a strong layer of iron plating. Her flooring timbers are ten inches square. She is flat-bottomed, and without a keel for navigating shallow waters. Her sides spread out from the bottom to the deck at an angle of forty-five degrees, and fall in above deck at a similar angle for the purpose of glancing off shots aimed at her. The gunners are protected by a kind of casemate formed by the construction of the vessel. She is a valuable prize to the Confederates, and her accession to their naval strength below Vicksburg alarms the Federals. The official despatch of Commodore Porter to the Federal Secretary of the Navy is brief, and somewhat humorous. He says: "I regret to inform you that the Indianola has also fallen into the hands of the enemy. The rams Webb and Queen of the West attacked her, and rammed her until she surrendered. All of which can be traced to a non-compliance with my instructions. I do not know the particulars." An English officer would have wanted to learn the fullest particulars before he charged his subordinates with disobedience, but Federal officers are not so fastidious. What Commander Porter means by the attack of the Queen of the West and the Webb being contrary to orders, we cannot fathom. We suppose the insubordination is, that he ordered the Captain of the Indianola to take the Queen of the West, and instead thereof the Queen of the West took the Indianola.

New England and New York were not particularly annoyed about the loss of the Indianola, for it merely involved the probability of a contract for another ship; but the capture of the Jacob Bell, a merchant vessel, by the Florida, has caused the liveliest indignation. The Jacob Bell was on her way from China to New York, and had on board a cargo estimated at $1,000,000 to $1,500,000. The passengers were transferred on board a Danish vessel, and the Jacob Bell was burnt. The New Yorkers are consoled by the assurance that the Vanderbilt and the Shepherd Knapp are cruising in search of the Florida. Perhaps these ships are not very anxious to catch her.

A dash of eighty Confederate cavalry was made on the Federal lines near Strasburg on the 25th of February. The Confederates captured some prisoners and horses, when they were pursued by a body of 500 cavalry, and had at first to surrender a portion of their booty; but meanwhile the Confederates were reinforced by about 100 men, and drove back the Federals, killing and capturing 200 of them in their flight. This misfortune is also attributed to disobedience of orders.

The Bill of Indemnity was not passed by the Federal Senate without difficulty, and it is questioned whether it is legally binding. At half-past four on the morning of the 3rd, Mr. Bayard, of Delaware, was opposing the Bill, possibly speaking against time, when a motion was made for an adjournment, and rejected. Upon this, Mr. Bayard attempted to continue his speech, when the chairman told him the Bill had passed. The Democrats protested that as no vote was taken the Bill was not law. Next day the Senate agreed to take a vote as to whether the Bill had legally passed. The Senate declared it law, by a majority of 25 to 13. If the Bill was not legally passed, the vote of the Senate will not legalize it.

The Nashville grounded in front of Fort Macallister, on the 1st inst., and was destroyed by the Federal ironclads.

On the 4th of March there was a panic in Wall-street. Gold was quoted at 74 premium, and on the 5th sales were effected at 50, but at the close of the day the quotation was 57½. The excitement was so great that the quotations changed every ten minutes. It is stated that the Legislature of Congress, on the last day of its sitting, passed this proviso:—For the future all contracts for the purchase of gold and silver must be reduced to writing, and stamped under the Stamp Act, at the rate of one half per cent. on the whole amount, and bear interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum. Loans or deposits made for less time than three days, when renewed or extended, are to bear the same burden, and all loans of currency made by brokers on security of gold or silver shall not exceed par value of the coin, under penalty of non-recovery before courts of law. We shall probably find that there are other causes at work.

The New York Chamber of Commerce has manifested its anger at the burning of the Jacob Bell by a tirade against England. The President of the Chamber intimated that a war with England was a possibility, and one not to be dreaded. England's neutrality was denounced, and the conduct of England towards American merchants declared to be a disgrace to the age. We wonder England is not held responsible for the defeats of the Northern army, as well as for the inefficiency of the Northern navy.

Mr. Sumner has reported to the Senate from the committee upon foreign relations concurrent resolutions regarding mediation. After referring to the French offer of mediation the resolutions declare that any idea of mediation or intervention is impracticable, unreasonable, and inadmissible. Also that any offer of interference so far encourages rebellion, and tends to prolong the contest, and that Congress will therefore be obliged to regard any further attempt in the same direction as an unfriendly act. The resolutions express regret that the foreign Powers have not frankly informed the Southern chiefs that the work in which they are engaged is hopeless. May we respectfully suggest that the reason is that foreign Powers happen to think that the attempt of the North to conquer the South is hopeless? Foreign Powers will not believe Mr. Seward's romance of the war.

A meeting of about "fifty thousand and a-half persons," is reported at Indianapolis, Indiana. Speakers at the "fifty thousand" meeting must have powerful voices to be heard distinctly by all the assembly.

The Federal General Sigel has resigned his command. The Mayor of New York, a Republican, has voted a series of resolutions adopted by the Board of Aldermen, condemning the action of the Government in dismissing General Porter from the Federal service, and tendering that officer a public reception.

ENGLAND.

There has been a net diminution of nearly 2,000 in the pauperism of Lancashire—of which diminution one-half is due to Manchester alone. Some noisy grumblers—one or two of whom may possibly be honest, but cantankerous, philanthropists, while the rest are certainly agitators without sense or veracity—have been uttering fierce complaints against the Relief Committees, who are accused of behaving with harshness of manner, and of exercising practical tyranny over those dependent upon their funds. The truth, as it appears from these accounts, is simply that the Committees have insisted, wherever practicable, on attendance either at school or at work as a condition of relief; that they have not always been able to provide suitable work or desirable classification; that they have had to take strong measures in order to get rid of dishonest and undeserving claimants; and that some of their members, in the performance of their unpleasant and harassing duties, have lost their tempers and behaved with some little rudeness. No substantial grievance—scarcely the shadow of a grievance—is made out by the agitators on behalf of the recipients of relief.

The marriage of the Prince of Wales has been celebrated throughout the kingdom with rejoicings, which prove at once the loyalty of the people, and their delight at finding an excuse for making holiday. In Ireland the people have, for the most part, behaved rather better than usual. Only in Cork the occasion was celebrated in true Irish fashion, with a tremendous "row." The object or character of that riot we do not pretend to explain; suffice it that the men of Cork were happy after the manner of their country, having broken some hundreds of windows and a score or two of heads. The rejoicings ended in the regular Irish style, with the interference of the police, a busy day for the magistracy, and the condemnation of a few dozen rioters to various fines and terms of imprisonment. Of course the glaziers gained. In London the accidents of which we spoke last week have occasioned a great outcry; and once more the privileges of "the City" are threatened with invasion. The outcry, however, will probably subside; the City will make a defence of some sort; and its privileges will remain, for the present, as they have existed, "time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary." Fortunately for them, the Chief of the Metropolitan Police, whom it is proposed to place in authority within the sacred civic precincts, has made a fool of himself. The police had made certain arrangements for the presence of the Volunteers in Hyde Park, which seemed unsatisfactory to the military authorities, and the latter altered them. It is clear that Sir R. Mayne, who is not a General, but an officer of police, ought to have taken this quietly. He could not pretend to decide what space a given number of troops required. But he grew petulant, and permitted or caused the publication of a paragraph reflecting on the military authorities and on the Volunteers, which drew down upon him the silent displeasure of the official world, and the loud condemnation of the Volunteer officers, many of whom are influential members of the House of Commons. The shock which this error has given to his reputation will help to damp the eagerness of reformers to extend his authority over the City, properly so called; and, as we have said, things will probably remain as they are until some person of importance is crushed or otherwise inconvenienced by the miscarriages consequent on the present division of authority.

Sir George Grey has contrived to get into a curious scrape; a scrape, moreover, in which he is really chargeable with nothing worse than a forgetfulness of appearances. Some time ago the Grand Duke Constantine, now Viceroy in Poland, visited this country, and was much struck with the efficiency and excellence of our police force. By his instructions the Russian Ambassador not long ago wrote a confidential letter to Sir George, requesting him to send two policemen to Warsaw, to instruct the Russians in the English system. The request was complied with, in forgetfulness of the fact that a state of siege already existed in Poland; and in ignorance of the impending reign of terror, the men went, gave information, were politely informed that the plan would not work in Poland, and came home. Of course, their mission bore the appearance of being designed to assist Russia in her tyrannical designs, and provoked the animadversions of the vigilant Mr. Hennessy; and, of course, Sir G. Grey has been terribly badgered on the subject. It does not appear that he was substantially to blame; but it is a little strange that he should not have seen that he would certainly bring unpleasant suspicions upon himself, and embarrass the Government of which he is a member.

Parliament has done little business this week. Lord Stratheden has kept postponing from time to time his motion for the recognition of the Southern Confederacy; and the Lords have done nothing more useful than the record of their intention to check the encroachments of railway companies on the open spaces of the metropolis, and to insist on some general scheme of railway communication, which shall deliver London from the fear of being torn to pieces at the caprice of projectors. Lord Shaftesbury did good service in defending Finsbury Circus from intrusion, and in pointing out the cruel wrong done to thousands of poor persons in crowded districts, who are ousted without notice or compensation by the companies, and driven at once from their homes and from their work, or forced to cling to their work at the cost of crowding still closer, and living in unhealthy and indecent lodgings at an enhanced rent. In the Lower House, Mr. Baillie Cochrane's Greek motion proved a failure, though the debate told heavily against the Government, and provoked Lord Palmerston to display a little irritation of temper. Some excitement was felt about Mr. W. E. Forster's motion for an inquiry into the Game Laws. The radical members for large towns, and the lowest class of their constituents, have a most foolish tenderness for the crime of poaching. Poaching, as pursued in this country, is simply a kind of robbery. Gangs of men go out by night to plunder for profit—not for sport—the costly preserves of a landowner; go prepared to murder his keepers if they do their duty and resist the robbery. There is no reason why these men should be punished less severely than burglars or highwaymen. On the other hand, what may be called incidental poaching—the snaring of a hare or a rabbit on a common (where the game belongs to the Lord of the manor) by an ill-fed peasant is a very venial, but a comparatively rare offence. However, the country gentlemen are almost as unreasonable in their passion for game preserving as the Radicals in their sympathy with game stealers, and consequently a game debate in the House reflects little credit on either party. On the present occasion Mr. Bright was silent, and Mr. Forster moderate; argument was felt to be of little value, and the division was the one reason on which each party relied. It went against the poachers, and the matter rests for the session. However, something will have to be done. The best thing would probably be to make game property, and game-stealing larceny—felony if in the night and by gangs of armed men—and deprive it of all exceptional protection. The present absurd distinction between a half-tame pheasant and a domestic fowl leads men to poach who would shrink from absolute and avowed theft, and poachers soon become not merely thieves, but murderers.

A meeting of sympathizers with Poland was held on Tuesday at the Guildhall. The Earl of Harrowby, the Earl of Shaftesbury, Mr. Pope Hennessy, M.P., and some other gentlemen, generally of liberal politics, were the speakers. We fear that the cause of Poland will derive no benefit from their sympathy. All expressed the strongest abhorrence of Russian tyranny, and the kindest feeling towards the Poles; but the only practical suggestion offered was that diplomatic relations with Russia should be suspended till Poland was restored to her rights; and nearly all united in deprecating the idea of war. Now in dealing with a power like Russia, and a rebellion like that of Poland, diplomatic intervention can be of no avail unless either the suppression of the insurgents be clearly hopeless, or the intervening States be known to be ready, though only in the last extremity, to resort to force. If the Czar were likely to be affected in any degree by the moral reprobation of Europe, he would never have had recourse to the infamous outrage which provoked the rebellion; and the remonstrances of England and France will be utterly null and void, if he understand that in no case will we go to war. Such intervention can only encourage the Poles to their own destruction.

On Tuesday night—the night of the festival of St. Patrick—the mob of Cork assembled again to do honour to their patron Saint, and break some more windows. It was found necessary to disperse them at the point of the bayonet. The ringleaders were arrested; and, perhaps, by the time they are brought to trial, we may learn what—if anything—was the occasion or object of the riot.

EUROPE.

The most important intelligence from Poland is the assumption of the dictatorship by Langiewicz, and the consequent establishment of a definite visible authority over the insurrection. In the proclamation, in which the hero of the day assumes this authority, he summons all the Poles beneath the Muscovite yoke to join in the struggle, the object of which is avowed to be the expulsion of the "Asiatic barbarians." The dictator points out that, notwithstanding the extremely unfavourable circumstances under which the struggle commenced, although it has been fought throughout against regular troops by a people with "naked hands," it has lasted two months, gains strength, and develops itself with energy. The need of a central power now, he says, makes itself felt, and, although there are better men, he assumes it, to surrender it to the national representatives as soon as the yoke of the Muscovite is shaken off. He confirms the fundamental principles of liberty, expressed in the first manifesto of the Provisional Government of Warsaw, "liberty and political equality for all the sons of Poland, without distinction of belief, condition, or birth, and granting land to the peasants, free of all rents and charges, the proprietors to be indemnified by the State." In pursuance of the functions so assumed, Langiewicz has appointed General Wysocki his military coadjutor, and placed the civil administration in the hands of Poentkowski. He has also issued national bank-notes of the value of two Polish florins, or one shilling. The Secret Provisional Government of Warsaw has recognised the new dictator, and the country generally has accepted him with enthusiasm. The Poles have shown considerable political tact in the choice of their chief. Mieroslawski, although a very able general, was unpopular as a revolutionist by profession. Langiewicz did, indeed, fight with Garibaldi, but he is a Pole above all. He knows the necessities of the conflict, and he has no desire to peril the cause of Poland by mixing it up with that of revolution generally. Mieroslawski has disappeared. If he is still in Poland he is not at the head of any large body of men.

Far from being superseded, the Archduke Constantine has assumed the whole military and civil power in Poland. He has taken the command of the army, and has left Warsaw for Skierniowice, with the intention, it is presumed, of proceeding to the principal theatre of the war in the south-west.

Most of the independent members of the Council of State have sent in their resignations. The Archbishop of Warsaw has also resigned his seat in that body. This act would apparently indicate that the Moderates, or Whites, have resolved to make common cause with the Reds, and either have abandoned all hopes of sufficient concessions from Russia, or believe that the insurrection is likely to triumph.

The war news from Poland is this week decidedly favourable to the insurgents. The battles between Langiewicz and his lieutenants and the Russians, which we mentioned last week, turn out to have been, upon the whole, Polish victories. The only disaster the Poles have experienced has been an engagement at Losnowicz, in which, at first, completely successful, they were in the end overcome by the large reinforcements which the Russians received, and driven to take refuge in Prussian territory. On the other hand, we hear of a victory gained over the Russians at Myszewo, between Plock and Warsaw, and not very far from the latter city, in which a hundred Russians were killed. The Russians have also sustained several defeats upon the Bug, where it forms the frontier between Congress Poland and Volhynia. Warsaw accounts admit that in one of the engagements the Russians lost two guns, and class them all as defeats. These successes point to a considerable extension of the rebellion in those old provinces of Poland, upon which the Poles now place their reliance. And there are further indications to the same effect. It is announced that even in the distant Government of Minsk—two Governments intervene between it and Congress Poland—the state of siege has been proclaimed. It is confessed by the Russian authorities that a detachment of the National Guard was drawn into an ambush, three miles from Wilna, and lost 250 men; and it is reported from Lemberg that the insurrection has broken out in Podolia, and that several thousand insurgents are posted near Bar. Podolia is at the extreme south-west of the former Polish kingdom, and borders upon Bessarabia and Kherson. If the insurrection has really broken out there in such proportions, the Russian Government will be most seriously embarrassed. May the new confederation at Bar have better fortune than the old one!

In the south-western district, where Langiewicz himself commands, there has been much marching and counter-marching, but no fighting. The insurgents have succeeded in obtaining a large quantity of arms from their friends in Galicia; they are even said—but the story is, we fear, too good to be true—to have got possession of 6,000 muskets, which were being clandestinely forwarded from Russia through the Danubian Principalities, to aid the rebellious subjects of Turkey. Whilst the insurgents have been strengthening themselves in this way, and Langiewicz, according to different accounts, finds himself at the head of from 8,000 to 18,000 men, the Russians at Olkusz, Miechow, and Wolbrom have been receiving large reinforcements. A great battle is apparently imminent. Langiewicz was, at the latest advices, posted at Dzialosice, in the immediate neighbourhood of Miechow, the Russian head-quarters, and not many hours could elapse without an engagement.

Every day brings some fresh tale of Russian brutality. The Russian officers have lost all power over their men, and in vain attempt to protect the lives and property of unoffending persons. The ravages of this war, and when it may, cannot be repaired in a generation.

The report of the committee of the French Senate upon the Polish petitions proposes to leave the question to the wisdom of the Emperor, and pass to the order of the day. The reporter, M. Larabit, after describing the success of the insurrection, and stigmatising the conduct of the Russian Government, points out that the petitions which call for war, tends to nothing else than a French crusade on behalf of Poland, wishes in which the Senate cannot unite. "England," he observes, and with justice, if the language of the Government organs can be taken to represent England, "appears to wish by excitement, more or less sincere, to drive us into a war in which her Government would not follow us." The explanations which the minister "without portfolio" made to the committee, satisfied it that the whole question had from the very first secured the attention of the Government, which had shown a very active and sincere sympathy with Poland. In presence, therefore, of the negotiations which have been opened, and in the conviction that the Emperor's Government will do all that is just, possible, and politic for Poland, a reference of the petitions to the ministers is, the reporter concludes, neither necessary nor justified. The debate upon this report commenced on Tuesday. MM. Bonjean and Poniowski—the latter, naturally enough—opposed the conclusion of the committee, and the former talked about remodelling the map of Europe. M. de la Guéronnière, a much more important person, supported the committee.

The diplomatic documents which have been laid before the Senate fully justify the conclusions of M. Larabit. The French Government has shown itself extremely anxious to do something for the cause of Poland. It feels, however, the immense difficulties that stand in the way of any effective interposition. The Prussian Convention seemed to offer it an opportunity of speaking frankly and usefully. The language used by the British Ministers and communications from Vienna, led it to believe that England and Austria, both regarding the convention as an act which transformed a local disturbance into a European and international question, and both disapproving very strongly of it, would be willing to join in common representation at Berlin, and it consequently made a proposal to that effect to both those Courts. Both declined. The French Minister then addressed, on the 17th of February to Baron Talleyrand, the Imperial Ambassador at Berlin, a despatch—one of those now published—in which he criticises very severely the conduct of the Prussian Government. He points out that neutrality was the obvious interest of Prussia—the greater the reserve she had shown the more she would have succeeded in circumscribing and neutralising the influence of the struggle upon Posen, whilst the effects of the arrangement are to create real dangers where none existed. "By interfering," he says, "the Cabinet of Berlin accepted the responsibility of the measures of repression adopted by Russia, and invited the separate members of the Polish nation to oppose their union to that of their Governments, to attempt, in a word, a national insurrection; and whilst it gratuitously threw itself into grave embarrassments, it created a situation which, from this day, will be a cause of inquietude, and may become a source of complication for the Cabinets."

On the following day, M. Drouyn de Lhuys addressed a despatch to the Duke de Montebello, at St. Petersburg, not very precise in its terms, and not distinctly asking anything of, or suggesting anything to, the Czar. It refers to the power which the Polish question has of exciting the sympathy of all classes of the French people, hints at the danger that the pressure of public feeling may become irresistible, and refers to some conversations with the Baron de Budberg, in which the French minister, doubtless, gave some indication of what measures would, in his opinion, satisfy the French feeling.

The last document of the series is a circular, dated 1st of March, to the French agents abroad, in which M. Drouyn de Lhuys recapitulates the steps which he has taken in the question, and intimates that France is desirous of acting in conjunction with the other Powers.

Some excitement has been created in Paris by a statement in the Constitutionnel, that the camp of Chalons would assemble between the 20th and 31st March, or two months earlier than usual. The Moniteur, however, immediately denied the accuracy of the announcement. Rumours of a similar character are still floating about Paris.

The Cologne Gazette and La France affirm that Earl Russell, although refusing to act in concert with France, has addressed a despatch to all the Powers, signatories of the Treaty of Vienna, stating that the present condition of Poland demands diplomatic intervention, to require from Russia the full and entire execution of the first article of the final Act of the Treaty of Vienna of June, 1815. According to one account his Lordship goes even further, and asks for the Poles everything that the Czar Alexander at any time promised the n. Alexander, it is known, was very liberal in these promises, and undoubtedly led the Poles to expect a great deal more than the treaty secured them. The statement that some despatch, calling for common action, has been sent by Earl Russell, seems to be authentic enough. In a few days the Cologne Gazette will, probably, publish a German translation, and a month afterwards Earl Russell will think fit to acquaint the British public with what he has been doing in its name.

The Staats Anzeiger, the official journal of Prussia, declares that England is the only one of the great Powers which has adopted the form of a despatch to express its objection, to the Convention. The statement may be accepted as a proof that the English Government did send a despatch to Berlin on the subject. The despatch of M. Drouyn de Lhuys to Baron Talleyrand, which we have elsewhere described, shows that the Staats Anzeiger was either very ignorant or very impudent in describing the English as the only despatch objecting to the Convention.

The Committee of the Prussian House of Deputies upon Military Reorganization is engaged in discussing some amendments proposed to the project of the Government by Herr von Forckenbeck in the name of the liberal fractions. The result of the amendments, which establish a provisional system until a general law can be framed, would be to secure the two years' term of actual service, and to render the army a more popular body. At the same time, the proposers and some other military authorities affirm that they would give the King a much more effective army. The Government is not disposed to accept these amendments. It will continue to let the King have precisely the army he pleases, by disregarding the Constitution, and governing without a budget as long as possible.

Signor Minghetti has lost no time in availing himself of the authority given him by the Italian Parliament to raise a loan. The larger portion has been taken by the Rothschilds, but three millions sterling are offered for public subscription in London, and the same sum in Paris. The price at which the loan is nominally issued is 71, but the allowances bring it down to about 69. The Italian Government only asks for 500 million livres now, retaining the power to ask for the other 200 million at any time it may deem fit. No doubt Signor Minghetti has done the best he could, but we should think that the conviction that another loan will be thrust upon the market in a short time is calculated to keep Italian stocks at even a lower price than that to which the enormous and rapid increase of national indebtedness must naturally drive them.

King Victor Emmanuel has reduced the sentences upon the soldiers compromised in the last Garibaldian rising to twenty years of travaux forcés. They were condemned for life. In a little time another act of the same royal clemency will, we should hope, annul the sentences altogether. The poor fellows, no doubt, committed a grievous offence, but they had the very best grounds for believing that they were acting in accordance with the real wishes of the Sovereign. And after a full and complete amnesty to the leader in the movement, it is not fair to enforce all the rigour of the law against his followers.

Sicily is far from quiet yet. A conspiracy, of which the Minister of the Interior gives this singular description, that it was partly of a Bourbon and partly of a Mazzinian character, has been discovered in Palermo, and numerous arrests have been made in consequence. The names of the victims—for a man thrust into the infamous prisons of Palermo must be deemed a victim, however great his offence—seem to show that the Mazzinian element was the leading one: the editors of the Unità Politica and the Aspromonte—titles with a meaning in them—are amongst the prisoners. Palermo is, according to the official report, which those who like can believe, "perfectly quiet."

The Greek National Assembly has appointed a committee to confer with the Ministers upon the question of electing a king. We hope something may result from these conferences, but there seems little chance of it. The Greeks must wait for Earl Russell's nominee, and Earl Russell, as the debate in the House of Commons has shown, is at his wits' ends to find one, and yet will not allow the Greeks to look out for one for themselves. In some parts of the country the people are so tired of an interregnum which amounts to complete anarchy, that they are even crying for Otho back.

Prince Couza has added another to the many griefs of the Moldo-Wallachian Assembly. He has responded to their address—in which, amongst other reproaches directed against his Government, they complained that the Chamber had been dissolved five times in the last four years—by a message which, after scolding them quite as heartily as they had chided him, he dissolved the Assembly.

PARLIAMENTARY NOTES.

THURSDAY, MARCH 12.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

The adjourned debate on the second reading of the Great Eastern Railway Bill, proposing an extension through the city, and the occupation of Finsbury Circus by the terminal station, was resumed by the Earl of Shaftesbury. He moved that the Bill should be read that day six months. — Lord Granville moved the adjournment of the debate for a fortnight, which was agreed to.

THURSDAY, MARCH 12.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

In answer to General Buckley, Sir George Grey said that the Government had not yet considered the propriety of amalgamating the City and Metropolitan police.

In answer to Mr. Stanley, the President of the Poor Law Board stated the guardians had power to raise money for the emigration of paupers.

In reply to Mr. Hennessy, Sir George Grey stated that he had that evening laid upon the table of the House the note of the Russian Ambassador, communicating the desire of the Grand Duke Constantine, Governor-general of Poland, that some officers of our Metropolitan police force should be sent to Poland. He had to add that he would also produce a report of the police officers who had, in consequence of that application, been sent to that country, so that all the facts of the case would become known to the public.

Mr. Lindsay moved, on the order for going into Committee of Supply, that it is not expedient at the present time to build wooden ships to be covered with iron-plates. Government intends to build five such ships. Mr. Lindsay's arguments went to show that it would be better to build ships entirely of iron. He argued that good iron was to be had at a fair price, and that though iron ships did get foul, they were easily cleaned. They could be made perfectly invulnerable, and they were far stronger than wooden vessels. Experience showed, too, that there was no greater danger from splinters in iron than in wooden ships. As a shipowner, not a ship-builder, he vindicated the conduct of the contractors against the imputations cast upon them by the Admiralty. Lord Clarence Paget showed that we were building fewer iron ships than France. It was absolutely necessary to use wood in iron ships, in order to resist shot. A very great difference of opinion existed as to the comparative effectiveness of iron and wooden frames for armour-plated ships. He explained the difficulty between the contractors and the Government, arising out of the uncertainty of official requirements. At present, it was impossible to tell what form of iron-plated ships would be best. He knew, however, that wooden ships plated with armour would be useful, and as they could be built much more quickly and cheaply than iron ships, Government intended to build some while waiting to see what was the best form in which permanently to construct our Navy. — Lord Palmerston said it appeared to him that the hon. member for Sunderland, who sought to reconstruct our Navy, ought to have included in his resolution a proposal to reconstruct the Admiralty likewise. The Government were not by any means indisposed to construct iron-clad ships clad with armour; and the fact was that we had eleven of those ships, of which not less than ten were built in private yards, the Achilles being the only one of the number constructed by the Admiralty officials. There could be no doubt that iron ships were liable to a special disadvantage from the rapidity with which their bottoms became fouled, and from their consequent loss of speed; and that disadvantage must operate more extensively in the case of men of war than of merchant vessels, inasmuch as men of war were often detained at distant stations, where it was impossible they could undergo a cleansing. The adoption of that resolution would tie up the hands of the Government, and would turn the House into a committee on shipping—a position for which they were necessarily unfitted. He hoped, therefore, that in that matter they would leave to the Government the discretion that properly belonged to them. — Mr. Bouverie said that the Admiralty did not possess the means of constructing armour-clad iron ships; and such vessels could only be built by private contractors. But it would, he thought, be most unwise to leave the country entirely at the mercy of private individuals in a matter of that importance. The House then divided, and the resolution was negatived by 164 votes to 81. Some other business was then transacted, and the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, MARCH 13.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

The Lords sat for a short time, and read a second time the Bill for the Registration of Births and Deaths in Ireland, sent up from the House of Commons; but no discussion of any interest took place.—Some formal business was transacted, and the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, MARCH 13.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

On the order for going into Committee of Supply, Sir De Lacy Evans brought under the consideration of the House the expediency of amalgamating the Metropolitan and City of London police establishments. The hon. and gallant member said it was well known that the Royal procession on Saturday last had been seriously and dangerously interrupted in the City, and that on the night of the illuminations eight persons at least had been crushed to death in the same part of the metropolis; while along all the other portions of the line the procession had passed on freely, and not a single life had been lost during the illuminations. These facts, he thought, afforded a special reason for effecting that amalgamation of the two police establishments, which was equally called for by general considerations of public expediency.—The Lord Mayor said that the failure of the police arrangements on Saturday had arisen out of a series of extraordinary conjunctures. In the first place, the City commissioner of police had died only a week before the great popular demonstration of Saturday. Then, again, the whole pressure of that demonstration had been thrown upon the City police. And, further, an additional source of confusion had been created by the passage of van loads of the metropolitan police along the great City thoroughfares in the course of the morning. It had been stated that an offer of assistance had for that occasion been made by the chief commissioner of the metropolitan police to the City authorities; but there was no truth in that rumour; and he had to add that the only aid they had received from the military authorities consisted in the presence of a number of men of the mounted artillery, who, in consequence of the large loose trappings worn by their horses were necessarily ill-fitted for such a service. The Volunteers, too, had contributed by their movements to complicate the difficulty. The City authorities had given orders that the Volunteers should form mere ornamental portions of the spectacle, and that they should take no part in keeping the line of the procession; and the fact was that they had only stood in the way throughout the day. He submitted to the House that circumstances of this exceptional character would not justify them in deciding that the citizens of London should be deprived of the control they had hitherto exercised over their own police. He had heard some of her Majesty's judges state—and they were unexceptional authorities upon such a point—that the City police contrasted very favourably with the corresponding metropolitan force by their steadiness, activity, and reliability. The City authorities, however, felt that there were circumstances in the scene of Saturday last which called for careful inquiry, and that inquiry was at present being prosecuted. With regard to the great loss of life which had most unhappily taken place at the illuminations, he should express his belief that no police arrangements could have prevented that lamentable calamity.—Lord A. Paget said that as he had been in attendance upon the Royal party on Saturday, he wished to offer a few observations to the House in reference to the progress of the procession. He had to state, in the first place, that nothing could be more admirable than the conduct of the people upon that occasion—he would not call them the mob, for they were not a mob; they had done all they could to facilitate the advance of the carriages, and he had not heard a single angry word from any of them. But a scene of great confusion had prevailed along the whole line of the procession in the City, and more particularly in the neighbourhood of the Mansion House. The fact was, that the police had been so few in numbers at that point that they had been completely overwhelmed, and there was no doubt that "a very tremendous squash" had been the result. Some of the crowd had got up on the Royal carriage, and others had been driven between the leaders and the wheelers. But the moment the procession arrived at the other side of Temple Bar, he had felt like an Arctic navigator who, after having been tossed among the icebergs, at length saw clear water ahead. He had told the Lord Mayor in the course of the morning that he was sure his Lordship could easily receive from the Horse Guards or the heads of the metropolitan police any assistance for maintaining the line of procession which he might require; but that statement had not been made by him in any official capacity.—After a few words from Colonel F. French and Mr. Ayrton, Sir G. Grey said there could be no doubt that the Royal procession on Saturday, which had passed readily through all the other portions of the metropolis, had met with a serious obstruction in the City. He believed that the City police was sufficient for its ordinary duties, but that it was not sufficiently numerous to meet such a pressure as that which it had to encounter on Saturday last. He thought it would be wrong for him to say at once that there should be an amalgamation of the City and the metropolitan police establishments. But he felt persuaded that there should be such an alteration of the existing law upon that subject as would enable the City authorities to supply a sufficient force for extraordinary occasions. With regard to the loss of life which had taken place at the illuminations, he had to state that he did not think any persons in authority were to blame for that unhappy occurrence. He had further to inform the House that her Majesty felt the deepest regret for that calamity; and that she had commanded him to convey the expression of her earnest sympathy to the families of the sufferers.—

Colonel Sykes asked a question concerning the dismissal of an English officer in the Chinese service.—Mr. Stirling said that the French press had spoken very severely of Earl Russell's conduct in regard to the offer of an asylum to the Pope, and had denied the truth of the noble Lord's statements. He wished for a precise explanation of the facts.—Mr. H. Seymour called attention to the collisions that have taken place in Japan, and complained of the inexperience of our representatives there.—Mr. Layard explained the accident referred to by Colonel Sykes. He vindicated the conduct of our representatives in Japan, observing that, as diplomatic relations with that country had only existed for a short time, they were necessarily without loyal experience. He said that it was impossible to produce correspondence relating to private conversations between Mr. Odo Russell and the Pope. But the substance of the report of Mr. Odo Russell was set forth in the despatch of Earl Russell of the 29th of January, which had been laid before the House.—Sir G. Bowyer said that the Pope in his conversation with Mr. Odo Russell had alluded in a mere casual way to the possibility of his seeking a refuge on British territory. It was evident that too much importance had been attached to that statement.—Mr. Layard said that the relations of Mr. Odo Russell with the authorities at Rome had again become as satisfactory as they had been at any previous period.—Mr. H. Russell said that, as the brother of Mr. Odo Russell, he wished to take that opportunity of observing that the position of an English agent at Rome was one of a very peculiar and difficult description, inasmuch as he represented a policy directly opposed to that of France, which exercised an overruling influence in that city. In his opinion the best course for this country to pursue would be to have as little as possible to do with the Pope. The House then went into Committee of Supply, and some time was spent in the discussion of the Army Estimates. On the proposed vote of £5,709,733 for general staff and regimental pay, allowances, and charges, Lord R. Cecil referred to the French "blue book" just published, which contains the accounts of the expenditure of the French army, and showed from those accounts that if our War Office were to practise the same economy as the corresponding department in France, it would be possible, without diminishing the pay or allowances of the men, to effect a reduction of £3,000,000 in our military estimates. Sir G. C. Lewis denied the correctness of this statement, and the fairness of the comparison. The vote was passed, as were several others. The House resumed, transacted some formal business, and adjourned at ten minutes past 12.

MONDAY, MARCH 16.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

The Bill to continue the Act of last session for the relief of the distressed Unions in Lancashire, and a Bill to prevent the sale or exportation of salmon during the season when salmon fishing is forbidden, was read a second time. No discussion of any interest took place, and the sitting scarcely lasted half-an-hour.

MONDAY, MARCH 16.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Mr. Baillie Cochrane—the orders of the day being suspended his favour—called attention to the affairs of Greece.—Mr. Gregory followed. He thought that Prince Alfred would not have been a suitable king for Greece, and that his acceptance of that high office would not have been consistent with English interests. He did not agree with Mr. Cochrane's censures of the policy of the Foreign Office; but he wanted to know why, whenever an unusual diplomatic difficulty occurred, an Elliot was always sent out, if possible, to supersede our regular Minister? He expressed strong sympathy with the Greeks, and condemned the traditional policy pursued by England of upholding the Ottoman empire.—Mr. Monckton Milnes—one of the most eminent of the unofficial members of the Whig party, generally appealed to in party difficulties as a sure supporter of Lord Palmerston—said that he did not doubt the good intentions of the Ministry towards Greece, but that he did not admire the manner in which those intentions had been carried out. It was unfair to Greece to bind her by the protocol excluding the reigning families of the three Powers, and thereby deprive her of many of the most suitable candidates. It was unwise to allow names of other candidates to be mentioned till it was known that they would accept the crown. He thought it most unfortunate that the Greeks were precluded from choosing where they were most likely to find experience, intelligence, and good faith in their future sovereign.—Mr. Layard explained that the English Government could not bind itself to refuse the throne for Prince Alfred, till Russia made a similar engagement as regarded the Duke of Leuchtenberg; otherwise, we should have no diplomatic hold on Russia.—Lord Palmerston said he had been curious to know what could be the ground upon which Mr. Cochrane could have founded an attack upon the Government. There had been personal attacks upon Earl Russell, who could afford to be perfectly indifferent to them. One or two things appeared to have grievously weighed upon the minds of those who took the same view as Mr. Cochrane—first, that the Greeks had exhibited such unanimity in the desire to elect an English Prince, and that they were not informed at once that Prince Alfred could not be their King. But they were told so at the earliest moment. Then it was said that when they were so told, and they went on to elect the Prince, our Minister was instructed not to interfere. But were Mr. Scarlett and Mr. Elliott to have gone about among the electors and told them not to elect the Prince? Had this been done, the interference would have been blamed as indecent. Then it was said the Greeks had been neglected by the British Government; but the Government had lost no time in endeavouring to secure an acceptable candidate for the Crown of Greece; it was for the Greeks themselves to choose; the British Government could only suggest a choice. He was, therefore, at a loss to know in what respect their conduct, which had been frank and straightforward from the beginning, was open to blame. The motion was withdrawn.

TUESDAY, MARCH 17.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

The Peers sat for a short time, but no discussion of any interest took place.

TUESDAY, MARCH 17.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

A Mr. Somes asked leave to introduce a Bill to close public-houses entirely on Sundays.—Sir G. Grey would not oppose the introduction, but reserved to himself the right to resist the second reading.—Mr. Barnes, of Leeds, the ablest advocate of the Dis-senters in the House, supported the motion.—Mr. Roebuck gave notice that, if the second reading were carried, he should move to close all clubs on Sunday.—Leave was given by 141 to 52.

Mr. W. E. Forster moved the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the operation of the Game Laws. The House divided:—Ayes, 157; Noes, 176. So the motion was lost.

Mr. Roebuck moved for returns concerning changes of surname by Royal license. The Solicitor-General supported and confirmed the views of Sir G. Grey. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. Cowper obtained leave to bring in a bill for the embankment of part of the river Thames on the south side thereof, in the parish of St. Mary, Lambeth, and for other purposes.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 18.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Dr. Brady moved the second reading of a Bill to prevent persons suffering under infectious diseases from being taken to the hospitals in cabs.—Several members objected to the Bill. Sir G. Grey said he thought it altogether injudicious.—After some discussion the second reading was postponed to the 27th May. The House adjourned at twenty minutes past one in the afternoon.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, March 18.

The improved tone that characterised our cotton market at the close of our last report, has this week been followed by some excitement and a considerable advance in prices.

On Thursday a fair business was done at very firm rates.

On Friday the market became very strong on receipt of a good Manchester report, and news of a large business going on there at enhanced prices; this on Saturday, together with receipt of Bombay telegrams, reporting an advance of 9d. to 1s. per piece in shirtings, led to considerable excitement, and the sales were run up to 12,000 bales, buyers freely paying an irregular advance of ¼d. to ½d. per lb.

On Monday the excitement continued, and with sales of 15,000 bales, a further advance of ¼d. was established; the trade, however, failed to respond to the extent anticipated, and the bulk of the business was done by speculators and exporters. The demand on Tuesday was again large, at very firm prices, and the sales resulted in 10,000 bales.

To-day, however, the demand has again fallen off; 6,000 bales only have been sold, and at the close sellers show more disposition to meet the market. We quote Middling Bowdles 21½d., Middling Orleans 22d., Fair Sawginned Dharwar 18½d., Fair Broach 17½d., and Fair Dhollerah 17½d.

The chief item of interest in the American news is the great decline in the price of gold, which in two days had fallen 15 per cent., owing to action in Congress. At Charleston the defences were still being increased, and an immediate attack seemed improbable. The most important war news will now come from Vicksburg, where a desperate struggle was hourly impending; there were rumours of a Federal victory at latest dates, and also of a disastrous Federal defeat.

MANCHESTER, Tuesday, March 17.

For the first time since September last, we have to report a very large business as having been done in this market, both in yarn and cloth, owing to letters from India advising a large amount of sales at advancing prices, showing a considerable profit, and to the receipt of further telegrams from Calcutta, dated 26th, and Bombay dated the 27th ult., reporting an excited market at a further advance of from 6d. to 12d. per piece on shirtings during the fortnight, also to the general belief here that the struggle in America will continue for some long time to come.

The demand for Mule yarns suitable for India has been very great, and notwithstanding that the stocks of Nos. 40, 50, and 60 in bundle, were large, they have been pretty generally cleared off at an advance of fully 1d. per lb. on the previous week's quotations.

Cloths of all kinds have partaken of the excitement, but the demand has been chiefly for shirtings, mulls and jaconets, for shipment to India. Shirtings of all weights have been sold at an advance of from 6d. to 1s. per piece, and jaconets from 1½d. to 3d. per piece.

Some considerable business has also been done in Tanjibs and narrow T. cloths, for the Levant.

The German buyers have taken more freely of 16s to 24s and 30s water twist, but as the prices offered were rather low, spinners were very loth to respond to them in the face of excitement in the Liverpool cotton market.

Home trade yarns from 32s to 40s twist and pie-cops have been also in demand, and up to Monday an advance of 1½d. per lb. on the quotations of the previous Friday was obtained. In Bolton spinnings from 60s upwards, there has not been as much business effected as there might have been, owing to the advance required by holders.

To-day our market has been in an excited state, but not much actual business has resulted, the prices asked putting a check on buyers.

CONFEDERATE FINANCES.

REPORT OF THE CONFEDERATE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT C. S. A.

Richmond, January 10th, 1863.

Hon. T. S. Bocock, Speaker of the House of Representatives, C. S. A.

Sir,—I have the honour to submit the following report of the condition of this Department.

The statements for the last year were made up to the 18th of February, 1862, the termination of the Provisional Government. From the commencement of the Permanent Government to the 31st of December, 1862, the receipts and expenditure were as follows:—

RECEIPTS.
Patent Fund	$13,920
Customs	668,566
Miscellaneous	2,291,812
Repayment of disbursing officers	3,839,268
Interest on loans	26,583
Call loan certificates	59,742,796
One hundred million loan	41,338,286
Treasury notes	215,554,885
Interest-bearing notes	113,840,000
War-tax	16,664,513
Loan, 28th February, 1861	1,375,276
Coin received from Bank of Louisiana	2,539,799
	<hr/> $457,855,704

EXPENDITURE.
War Department	341,011,754
Navy Department	29,559,283
Civil, miscellaneous, foreign intercourse, and customs	13,673,376

PUBLIC DEBT.
Interest on public debt (loans)	5,892,989
Payment of Treasury notes, Act of 9th March, 1861—
Principal	545,900
Interest	20,860
	<hr/> 566,761
Redemption of 6 per cent. certificates	11,516,400
Redemption of Treasury notes called in for cancellation and reimbursement of principal, under Act of May 16th, 1861	23,751,172
	<hr/> $416,971,735

Brought forward	$416,971,735
Add balance against the Treasury on 18th of February, 1862	26,439,572
	<hr/> $443,411,307
Amount of receipts	457,855,704
Deduct amount of expenditure	443,411,307
	<hr/> Balance $14,444,397

This balance consists in part of the coin on hand, received from the bank of Louisiana, and the remainder in interest-bearing Treasury notes.

The appropriations made by Congress, and not yet drawn from the Treasury, are as follows:—

Civil and miscellaneous	$10,925,049
War Department	57,865,879
Customs	896,612
Navy Department	12,692,373
	<hr/> Amount $81,879,913

The estimates for the support of the Government to the 1st of July, the end of the fiscal year, are as follows:—

Legislative	$231,600
Executive (salary of President, &c.)	13,471
Treasury Department	29,929,697
War	242,977,067
Navy	16,948,870
State	150,253
Department of Justice	172,632
Post-office Department	60,123
Miscellaneous	10,000
	<hr/> $290,493,713

In order to ascertain the amount to be raised by Congress, we must add:—

1. The estimates	290,493,713
2. Undrawn appropriations	81,879,913
	<hr/> $372,373,626
And deduct the balance in the Treasury of	14,444,397
	<hr/> Leaving amount to be raised $357,929,229

The debt of the Government at the same date was as follows:—

BONDS AND STOCKS.
Under Act of February 28, 1861	14,987,000
Under Act of May 16, 1861	6,414,800
Under Act of August 19, 1861	67,584,100
Deposit certificates under Act Dec. 24, 1861:—
Issued	89,005,370
Redeemed	12,516,400
	<hr/> 66,488,970
	<hr/> $145,476,870

TREASURY NOTES.
8.63 notes	992,000
Two years' notes	10,919,025
General currency	272,022,467
7.36 notes	120,480,000
$1 and $2 notes	6,216,200
	<hr/> $556,106,562

In the above statement is contained a large amount of bonds and interest-bearing notes, which are on hand in the various depositories not yet issued. It is important to bear this in mind in estimating the effect of the Act of the last session upon funding Treasury notes. The loans in which such notes are funded, are those mentioned in the schedule as loans of May 16 and August 19. The amount of these loans as reported at the last meeting of Congress was on the 1st of August, $41,577,250.

By the statement now reported, the total amount of these bonds is	$73,999,400
From which should be deducted amount on hand not yet disposed of, say	8,000,000
	<hr/> 65,999,400

And in order to ascertain the amount of Treasury notes funded, there must be deducted for the bonds issued for produce, say

	<hr/> $58,999,400
Deduct amount reported 1st August	41,577,250
	<hr/> Balance $17,422,150

This balance shows the amount of Treasury notes funded in five months, the average being about three and a half millions per month.

During the same period the interest-bearing Treasury notes have increased from	$22,799,900

To	120,480,000
	<hr/> Increase $97,680,100
From which deduct notes on hand	11,004,600
	<hr/> Real increase $86,675,500

This large increase of interest-bearing notes affords satisfactory evidence that the issue of them was a judicious measure; and for any ordinary war the bonds and interest notes, amounting together to a monthly sale of twenty and a half millions, would have sustained the Government without any resort to paper currency. But the estimates call for more than twice the amounts furnished by these resources; and we are compelled to resort to the Treasury notes to supply the deficiency. It becomes, then, a most important inquiry whether the issue of such notes can be continued, and if it can, then to what extent?

In a former report it was shown that the circulation of the Confederate States before the war might be estimated at 150 millions of dollars. In the existing state of things, it is probable that a larger amount of currency is required. In time of peace, money passes rapidly from hand to hand, and the same money, in a single day, will discharge many obligations. A large portion, too, of the operations of business are performed by bills of exchange and bank checks. In the present stagnation of commerce and intercourse, larger amounts of ready money are kept on hand by each individual, and the Confederate Treasury notes and call certificates are used as a substitute for bills and drafts to a considerable extent. If this view be just, we may venture to add as much as 50 per cent. to the usual amounts of currency, and this would raise the sum total at which it might stand, to 150 millions. The difference between this sum and the actual circulation will show the redundancy. The actual circulation embraces not only Treasury notes but bank notes and State emissions of Treasury notes. In ordinary times coin would also form a part; but, at present, not only the coin but a large portion of the bank notes have been withdrawn from circulation.

The issue of Treasury notes on the last day of December amounted to $299,149,692, exclusive of interest-bearing notes. By adding to this a sufficient amount to cover the State Treasury notes and the bank notes in circulation, we can arrive at the sum total of the currency. Twenty millions added to the Treasury notes would probably represent the whole.

It is this aggregate which must be kept in view when we deal with the currency as a measure of values. It is the whole mass as it is accepted by the community in exchange for its various commodities, which by its proportional relations to those commodities determines their prices. By a law as invariable as any law of physical nature, these prices rise or fall with the actual volume of the whole currency. Neither skill nor power can vary the result. It is, in fact, a relation subsisting between two numbers, the one representing the total values of property, and the other the total circulating medium. The nature of that medium cannot change it. It would exist with a currency of gold with as much certainty as with one of paper, if the gold were kept within the country by restraints equal to those which retain the paper.

Assuming, then, that entire confidence exists in our currency, the mere fact that its actual volume had been increased threefold would lead us to expect a corresponding increase in prices. Such increase, although eventually certain, does not usually appear at the same moment with the expansion. Like the moon's attraction upon the ocean, the time of high water is postponed for a certain period beyond the moment at which the influence has been exerted, and the length of the interval is affected by exceptional causes. But although there may be delay, the event is certain. Prices will reach the height adjusted by the scale of issues, and they can only be restored to their usual condition by a return to the normal standard of currency. In other words, the only remedy for an inflated currency is a reduction of the circulating medium. Is this reduction practicable?

Before answering this question it is important we should be fully assured of the excessive issue of paper currency. If the country were open to foreign intercourse, the difference in value between coin and paper money would at once afford a test. But in the present condition of trade, coin cannot be imported, and gold and silver have become articles of commerce like iron and lead. They cannot, therefore, take their usual place as absolute measures of value.

Difficulties, somewhat of the same kind, attended other tests, such as bills of exchange, real estate, or commodities in general use, and of which there is no scarcity. Ordinarily, the average price of wheat, grain and other like articles of prime necessity would furnish a guide. But the want of transportation causes a fluctuation of demand and supply from day to day, and thus deranges prices. Making all due allowances for fluctuation, we find that the present prices of such articles range at nearly three times the usual peace prices. Notwithstanding the interruption of commerce, we find also, that the foreign exchanges, and even coin, stand at nearly the same rate. Reasons of a different character, but of equal force, apply to real estate and prevent its price from being a proper guide. The general increase, however, in its nominal value confirms the conclusions deduced from the other tests. These facts unite in establishing, beyond doubt, both the actual redundancy of the currency and its probable rate of excess.

The remedy which is required, in order to be effective, must, therefore, withdraw two-thirds of the entire volume of the currency.

The measures already adopted by Congress were intended to act in this direction. The Treasury notes were all made fundable originally in 8 per cent. securities, and it was supposed that the holders of notes would prefer investing them in bonds, rather than hold them when depreciated. To stimulate investments, the holders have been notified by the act of last session that after the 22nd of April they can no longer invest in 8 per cent. securities. These measures, although judicious and well-defined, are overpowered by the necessity which compels the Government to increase its issues. Notwithstanding the large and daily investments in bonds the currency continues rapidly to grow in quantity. This increase causes a daily advance in prices, and the necessities of the Government compel it to purchase at these prices. The payment of enhanced prices again compels a further increase in these issues, and an ascending series of action and reaction is thus established between prices and issues, which, if not arrested, must result in consequences disastrous to the best interests of the country.

These effects are hastened by the injurious operation of the excess of currency upon the bonds of the Government. These bonds are offered as absorbents for the Treasury notes, and the high rate of interest which they bear is the inducement to take them. In our present circumstances this interest must be paid in Treasury notes. By depreciating these notes the interest suffers equal depreciation, and an 8 per cent. bond becomes, in effect, a 4 or 3 per cent., according to the sale of issues of Treasury notes. The inducement to take the bonds is thus destroyed, and the bonds themselves cease to afford relief to the currency. They offer still less inducement to any foreign purchaser, because he is informed by the rate of exchange that his interest will be paid in a currency which must be exchanged for his own at the rate of three dollars for one. It is plain, therefore, that the change required is a prompt reduction of the currency to its normal condition. The question recurs, is this practicable?

At the last session of Congress an effort was made to attain this result by the proposal for a loan of one-fifth of all gross income, to be paid in Treasury notes in exchange for bonds at an early period, and would thus have checked the advance of prices. It is the misfortune of every such failure that it leaves the evils increasing at a double ratio; and subsequent remedies must be so much the more stringent. All the causes of excess continue in full operation. Prices increase, the Government is compelled to purchase, and the purchases must be paid by new issues. Each new operation aggravates the disease, and hesitation or delay is ruinous.

The conditions, then, which any sufficient remedy must fulfil, are, first, prompt, and secondly, effective reduction. To be effective, the currency must be reduced at least to 150 millions, already shown to be its extreme limit; and this reduction must be so prompt as to take effect before prices can undergo further increase.

To meet these conditions, I would respectfully propose that after the lapse of a reasonable time, the issues of Treasury notes, bearing date prior to the 1st of December, 1862, shall cease to be currency. This can be done with the least possible injury by following up the action of Congress at the last session, and fixing a period of limitation for funding these notes.

As the law now stands, these notes are receivable for Government dues; and the holder is entitled to fund them in 8 per cent. securities until the 22nd of April next, after which date he can fund in 7 per cent. I propose simply to fix a period of limitation for the exercise of this last-mentioned privilege, by enacting, that after the 1st of July next the privilege of funding these notes shall cease. Six months have already been allowed for investment in 8 per cent. securities, according to the contract on the face of the note. Two months more will be allowed for investment in 7 per cent., and if after so long a notice the holders do not choose to avail themselves of their privilege, the good faith of the Government will stand clear of imputation.

But it is essential to good faith that ample means should be provided by the Government to secure and pay the principal and interest of the securities in which the holders are required to invest. This can only be effected by an ample and permanent tax. Such a tax is the corner stone of the whole fabric. Without it, the scheme has no foundation, and can secure neither public confidence nor success. The proper extent of this tax will hereafter be considered. It is sufficient for the present to affirm that it must, at least, pay the interest on the entire public debt.

To give completeness to the plan, it would seem proper to provide measures for any future redundancy. We are happily relieved from this necessity by the patriotic proposal of several of the States to guarantee the whole or a large portion of the war debt of this Government. If all the States can be induced promptly to adopt this measure, means will thereby be furnished to absorb any excess of the new issue over the proper amount of currency. The guarantee of the States will enable this Government to reduce the interest of its bonds to 6 per cent., and if the States can be prevailed upon to extend the guarantee so as to cover the whole war debt, or at least four or five hundred millions thereof, the saving in interest will be so great as to enable the Government, in due time, to extinguish the whole principal of its debt. Upon a debt of 500 millions, this saving will be just ten millions. The ability to apply this amount to the principal instead of the interest affords such obvious advantages as to ensure the favourable consideration of both Congress and of the States.

An analysis of the scheme proposed will reduce it to three essential features:—

1.—A limitation upon the privilege of funding the notes issued prior to 1st of December.

2.—A war tax.

3.—A guarantee by the States.

1.—In considering the first of these features, the first inquiry which suggests itself is, what will be the effect of this limitation? Will it arrest the circulation of the notes, and lessen the volume of currency?

Its first effect will certainly be to add another stimulant to investment in bonds. It was unfortunate that the act of the last session postponed the change of interest for six months. The delay has deprived the remedy of much of its efficacy, and good faith requires that at least sixty days should be allowed for its operation. Otherwise, I would have proposed to limit the funding privilege to the 1st of May, instead of the 1st of July. The effect of the stimulant is thus retarded. Still, the fact that there is a period of limitation will induce holders to come in before it expires. Those who desire to secure 8 per cent. securities will come in before the 22nd of April, or hold up until near that day the notes which secure that right, and all who can will come in before the 1st of July, to save the final exclusion. It is probable, therefore, that throughout the entire period an amount will be withdrawn sufficient to check any rapid advance in the total amount of circulation.

But when the final date of limitation approaches, the notes will not pass readily from hand to hand; and the result will be that they are thrown out of ordinary circulation and relieve the currency to that extent. The comparatively small amount then left in the hands of individuals will cease to have a purchasing power. They will pass only by special contract, and their chief value will consist in their being receivable for Government dues. If at this point the Government will collect a tax sufficient to absorb the whole remnant, the relief afforded to the community and the currency will be made complete.

Hitherto the policy of the Government has sought to absorb the circulation by inducements alone. Bonds at a high rate of interest have been offered; but the inducement has been abated by the depreciation of the currency in which the interest is paid. It is proposed now to supply the deficiency by a small portion of constraint. We see on every side of us indications of the abundance of money. Large sums are everywhere held on deposit; but the holders propose for themselves more profitable investments than public securities. The ability to keep unemployed these sums, and to hold them for an indefinite time, proves that no serious damage will be suffered by requiring their conversion into bonds. The large amount of money which is shown by the war tax returns to be invested at interest in private hands confirms the belief that there is no want of capital among our people. It does not seem to be a rash conclusion, therefore, that at least three-fourths of the currency outstanding on the 1st of December may be funded without substantial damage to private interests. If the remaining fourth could be absorbed by a tax, the solution of the problem would then be complete. The people are fully prepared for the payment of a high tax. It may not be practicable to place it at so high a rate as to absorb one-fourth of the entire currency to be called in, but it may approach so nearly as to leave unabsorbed only that portion which will remain outstanding, in spite of all efforts to call it in.

I will not venture to assert that grave objection may not be made to this scheme. Such objections will be found in the way of every plan. They are necessary results of the proportions of the war which is waged against us, and the enormous sums of money required to carry it on. But it appears to me that, upon due examination, these objections, if not entirely obviated, will be found to be counterbalanced by equivalent advantages.

The first and most obvious objection to the scheme is, that it is an infringement of the contract. The notes have been accepted upon the promise of the Government that they may be invested in interest-bearing public securities, and that promise is not fulfilled after the 1st of July next.

It may be answered that Congress has already settled this principle by the Act of last session, which reduced the interest from 8 to 7 per cent. A still better answer will be found in the reasons which led to that Act, and which make necessary the one now proposed. A limitation of time for the performance of contracts has never been considered an infringement where sufficient opportunity is given to claim performance. Justice is satisfied by giving to the party full opportunity to receive the benefit of his contract. Upon this principle rests every change in statutes of limitation. Examples of the same principle are afforded in private matters, by the laws of partnership, and for the administration of assets. In public matters, the history of every nation affords like precedents, which will probably find support in the laws of every State in our Confederacy.

The modification of the contract is substantially for the benefit of both parties. The object in view is to increase the value of the whole remaining currency. This object it effects by increasing the purchasing power of each note in proportion to the reduction of the whole. Assuming this reduction to be two-thirds, it follows that every holder of only one-third, in proportion of the new issues will have the same value in money left, after he shall have invested the other two-thirds in bonds. In other words, he will make a clear gain of those two-thirds. If he shall have in his possession none of the new issues, he will, nevertheless, gain in the reduced price of every article of consumption.

2.—Next, it will be objected, that after the lapse of the period of limitation, the value of the note as money is taken away. It is true that the note will lose its function as money; but its intrinsic value is unimpaired. It is still receivable for public dues, and it still has the faith and property of the Confederate States pledged for its payment. It will even have a modified circulation. A great public exigency has arisen which compels a change, and all that the Government can do is to make the change with as little injury to private rights as possible. This it endeavours to do by avoiding any direct interference with the contract, and by giving to the holder ample opportunity to reap all its advantages. The time for the enjoyment of these advantages was no part of the contract, and every holder was bound to know that such an incident has always been considered within the control of the law-making power.

3.—It will be urged that the calling in the circulation as proposed will cause too large and sudden a contraction. An examination of the probable state of the currency at the date of limitation will show this objection to be unsound. The new circulation, to be issued after the 1st of December, will on the 1st of July probably be upwards of two hundred millions. It will be issued gradually, and will fill up the channels left by the funding of the old issues, and so far from producing contraction, the new issues will probably be in excess at too early a date. The danger at all times to this kind of currency is in that direction.

4.—A fourth objection will be found in the probable effect on the price of bonds. The large amount of currency turned into bonds will cause the supply to outrun the demand, and the usual consequences of such a condition of the market will follow. It cannot be denied that the price of bonds will probably fall. But this fall will in truth be merely nominal, and will find a full compensation in the increased value of the currency for which they are sold, and in which the interest will be paid. Those classes of the community which sell bonds from necessity or for the means of living, will probably gain more in the reduced market prices of the articles which they purchase than they will lose in the reduced market value of the bonds which they sell. Those who hold the bonds on speculation would gain or lose according to their ability to hold them; while all those who have taken them as investment will escape injury by simply holding them according to their original purpose. The contraction of the currency will increase the value of the interest paid them during the war; and at the end of it they will have a security which will command a price which will amply repay their confidence.

The most conclusive answer, however, to this objection is to be found in the fact that whatever may be the amount of depreciation on the bonds, it cannot exceed the depreciation in the value of the currency. If the Government must issue an obligation in the shape of currency to pay $21 for a barrel of flour, which in a normal condition of the currency could be purchased with seven, it is actually selling its paper at one-third of its face. At the same time, by excessive issues, it is disturbing all other values, and all the commercial relations of society. The depreciation in the bonds could never reach this high rate; neither would it affect the prices of commodities or commercial relations. If, then, we are reduced to a choice between evils, the reduced value in the bonds is manifestly the less.

II.—We now come to the consideration of the next great feature in the scheme, namely, the war tax. What shall be the subjects of that tax, and what amount should it raise?

The subjects upon which a tax may be levied are many, and the expediency of each involves questions which it is not proposed at present to discuss. It seems to me that a tax upon property and income is so much to be preferred to stamp duties, excise, licenses, and other like taxes which call for a machinery vexatious in its character and expensive in its operation, that there will be little hesitation on the part of Congress in its acceptance. The direct tax heretofore levied has set in operation all the machinery necessary to levy another; and an income tax could be collected by the same means.

It seems to me that both these forms of tax should be adopted. To lay a sufficient tax upon property alone would require too large an increase in the rate of last year. Such an increase would operate with peculiar hardship upon property producing no income. On the other hand, a tax upon income is so easily evaded, that of itself it would furnish an insecure resource. It is proper, however, that incomes should be taxed; otherwise the whole profits of speculation and trade, together with those resulting from skill and labour, would escape contribution. I propose, therefore, that a tax be imposed upon property, and upon the gross amount of incomes of every kind, excepting those below some minimum to be adjusted by Congress.

The next inquiry is as to the rates of these taxes, to adjust which it must first be ascertained what amount it is necessary to raise. It has already been shown that up to the 1st of July next the Treasury notes in circulation will exceed $500,000,000

Deduct the circulation proposed to be left,	150,000,000
Remaining funded	$350,000,000
The annual interest on this sum at 8 per cent. is	$28,000,000
To this must be added the interest upon about 120 millions of 7.30 notes	8,760,000
And upon 60 millions of 6 per cent. certificates	3,600,000
Also the interest upon 8 per cent. bonds and stock, say about 100 millions	8,000,000
	$48,360,000

This amount shows the lowest figures which should be raised by the tax. The soundest considerations of policy would add as largely to this sum as the people of our country can bear. If the tax be made payable in all kinds of Treasury notes, it would absorb so much of the first issues, and by reducing the amount to be funded, would abate the force of the objections to the scheme. If sixty millions of notes could be thus called in, the benefits resulting would fully counterbalance every possible hardship. The currency would promptly recover its value, the bonds would become an object of investment instead of being thrown on the market, and a sure and steady system of finance would be established.

A tax of 1 per cent. on property, if it could be made as productive as last year's, would raise twice the amount of the last war tax, say forty millions. But inasmuch as portions of the States are in the hands of the enemy, it would be proper to make a deduction of probably one-tenth, which would leave the amount at only thirty-six millions.

This sum would be subject to still further abatement, so long as the decision of the Confederate Court of South Carolina as to the power of Congress to tax State bonds remains unreversed. The very large amount of money invested in this form was included in the war tax act of the last year, and the tax thereon was paid everywhere, except by those who raised the question in South Carolina. For the ensuing year the case would be different. If the same tax were laid by Congress, it is probable that the holders of State bonds would claim exemption under this decision, and Congress itself might be unwilling to re-enact, in the same form, a law which had been declared unconstitutional by the co-ordinate branch of the Government, until that decision is reversed. The question is of such magnitude and involves such great interests that an appeal was taken. But this appeal cannot be decided until a Supreme Court shall be organized. It may be worthy, therefore, of the consideration of Congress, whether the question should not be raised in another form, by taxing the income of the bonds in the hands of the citizens. The taxing power over income in the hands of the citizens for consumption may be distinguished from that over State bonds, specifically as property. In my view both are constitutional, and the public interests demand that every proper effort should be made to ensure consideration of the question in all its aspects. In either case, however, the tax would probably prove unproductive, until the question shall be finally decided. It is necessary, therefore, to estimate for an abatement on the tax of last year. Assuming one hundred millions as the probable amount invested in State securities, a tax of one per cent. would amount to one million of dollars, and so much must, therefore, be abated from the estimate.

In estimating the rate of a tax on incomes, the only basis to which I can refer is the value of the entire property in the eleven Confederate States. It may be assumed that the net income of this property is measured by the average rate of legal interest of the money which represents its value. If the tax were laid upon net income, and that income were faithfully returned, it could, in this way, be estimated with some degree of accuracy. But the devices are so many by which a return of net income can be evaded, as to make such returns unreliable. A resort to gross income is, therefore, more expedient. The difference between the two must be at least 25 per cent.; but, under existing circumstances, and for the purpose of an estimate, it would be prudent to disregard the difference, and assume that the returns of gross income will be about equal to the average rate of legal interest. It is believed that even the proceeds of skill, speculation, and labour, which may be returned where no capital is involved, will not materially vary the result.

The estimate, formerly made to Congress, of the value of all the property in the eleven Confederate States in which taxes have been collected, was 4,632 millions. If we leave out the old numbers in those figures, on account of such property as is now beyond the reach of taxation, and for other contingencies, we have, in round numbers, 4,000 millions. The average of interest in the Confederate States may be set down at 7 per cent., which would make the total income equal to, say 280 millions. A tax of 10 per cent. on this sum would produce, in the gross, about 28 millions, and this, added to the property tax of 35 millions, would raise a sum total of 63 millions of dollars, or, in round numbers, 60 millions, after deducting expenses and contingencies.

It will probably be insisted that there is no occasion for the imposition of so heavy a tax; and many will contend that it is sufficient that the Government pay the interest alone of the public debt. I ask leave, most earnestly, to dissent from this doctrine, and to urge upon Congress a continuance of the policy already adopted by this Government, of making portions of the public debt payable every six months after the probable termination of the war. The sinking funds devised by Mr. Pitt, and the great statesmen of his times, have proved deficient, not in principle, but in administration. The principle upon which they rest is the annual raising of an amount beyond the interest for the purpose of eventually discharging the principal. The punctual investment of these surplus sums at compound interest by the mere operation of numbers, would be certain to discharge the debt in a given time. The failure of this plan, in its effects upon the public debt of England, arose from defects in its administration. As the invested fund increased in amount, it offered constant temptation to the Government to make use of it, and the party in power often preferred inventing pretexts to seize upon it, or to court public favour by taking off unpopular taxes required for its increase rather than continue or augment those taxes. Besides, the neglect to make punctual investments as the interest accrued had a constant tendency to reduce compound interest to simple; and thus it was found impossible, in a long course of years, to preserve the fund inviolate, or to maintain the constant supply from taxes, which the plan demanded.

These defects are believed to be remedied by the plan upon which the 100 million loan of this Government has been issued. It resembles the sinking fund plan in requiring an annual surplus of taxes beyond the amount of interest on the public debt. But it differs from it, in applying this surplus to the immediate redemption of principal. The machinery of a fund is dispensed with, together with all its attendant officials. The best practical investment is made by paying off so much of the public debt; and the temptations and waste incident to a fund are avoided. The full benefit of a sinking fund is thus secured without its disadvantages. All that is required is the original adjustment of the payments of principal through an entire series of years, and the steady determination of Congress to raise annually a fixed sum sufficient to make these payments, in addition to the yearly interest. The number of years in which the debt will be paid, will depend upon the amount of this fixed sum. In proportion to its excess over the annual interest, will be the shortness of the period. The first payments of principal will be comparatively small. But each will diminish the interest of the succeeding year, and will thereby set free a larger sum annually to be applied to pay the remaining principal, until the debt be finally discharged.

The act of Congress of the 12th April, 1862, departed from this plan, and made the next issue of bonds payable in thirty years subject to redemption at any time after the expiration of ten years. The whole subject necessarily comes up for consideration in adjusting the tax now to be laid by Congress.

The fifteen million loan carries an interest of 8 per cent.; it is payable in ten years, but may be redeemed at any time after the 1st September, 1866. The one hundred million loan is also an 8 per cent. loan, and is made payable in instalments which fall due every six months in eighteen years, from 1st January, 1864. The first instalment of principal of $1,288,700 is payable 1st January, 1864; the second, of $1,340,200, is payable 1st July, 1864. The third loan is under the Act of April, 1862; it is also an 8 per cent. payable as above stated, at the pleasure of the Government, at from ten to thirty years.

If Congress should approve the application of the plan of the 100 million loan to the whole debt of the Government, then a change should be made in the loan of April, 1862. No bonds have yet been issued under that act, and the matter is yet within the control of Congress. A modification of the law must be made at any rate to meet the reduction of interest required on notes issued subsequent to 1st December. If the scheme of finance hereinafter proposed, in relation to the debt guaranteed by the States shall find favour with Congress, a further modification of the loan of 12th April, 1862, should be made by reducing the period for redemption from ten years to five. This change will enable the proceeds of the sale of the 6 per cent. bonds guaranteed by the States, to be applied in discharge of the 1 per cent. at the end of five years in case they cannot be purchased in the market sooner.

III. We come now to the third feature of the scheme, namely, the guarantee of the States.

The State of Virginia led the way, and proposed that Congress should devise a plan for a loan to be guaranteed by the States. Congress did not seem to take any action on the subject at its last session. It was probably deemed best that the proposal should come from the States an offer of their guarantee is certainly more beneficial to the credit of the Government than a request for aid. The delay has given the opportunity to the States to make the offer. The State of Alabama has offered a guarantee of her quota of the whole war debt upon certain conditions. The State of South Carolina has offered to guarantee a quota of 200 millions upon certain other conditions. A copy of the action of their respective Legislatures is herewith submitted.

The varying action of these two States evinces the importance of settling a definitive plan by Congress. It is probable that every State will cordially respond to such plan, and sustain the credit of this Government.

The great advantages to be derived from this guarantee have already been somewhat developed. It is only necessary now to give prominence to two of them:—First, the opportunity which it affords of converting an eight per cent. into a six per cent. debt; and, secondly, the premium which can be realized on the sale of the bonds. The former will enable the Government to establish a loan on the principle already explained, and the latter will place in its hands ample means to call in the redundancy of the Treasury notes after the 1st of July next, and to sustain the credit of its 8 per cent. securities, or to purchase them.

Assuming that the States may be induced to extend their guarantee to 500 millions, I propose to adjust the debt upon the plan of the 100 million loan so as to ensure its discharge within a given period; the length of this period depends upon the sum which Congress will devote to the annual payments. The commencement of the period or the date at which the first payment is to be made is, of course, within the control of Congress, and involves the same inquiry as to the amount now to be raised by taxes. A postponement of this first payment of principal would seem to allow a diminution of the tax. But it must be observed that some considerable time must elapse before the guarantee of the States can be had; and further time must then be consumed in carrying the plan into execution and in procuring returns of the sales. During all this period the 8 per cent. and 7.30 notes are outstanding, and will absorb nearly as much more money as will afterwards be required to meet the first annual payments on the principal. Besides this, it cannot be too strongly urged that the present is the appropriate moment at which to commence a proper system of taxes. The patriotism of the country is now fully aroused. The duty of contributing largely to the support of the Government is generally recognized. The large amount of money in circulation will make the payment easy, and the payment itself will aid the tax-payer by reducing prices to their proper condition.

Before leaving the subject, I would respectfully submit that there is another plan for arranging the debt in instalments, which would produce the same results. It is by issuing all the bonds in the usual form payable at the same date, and attaching to them a condition that the Secretary of the Treasury shall annually or semi-annually, by lot, designate a certain portion to be paid off. If these annual payments were arranged on the same principle which governs the 100 million loan, and were made equally obligatory upon the Government, the result would be the same.

A reference to a few details will conclude all I have to say on this subject:—

With my last report was submitted a report from the war tax office, to which I request your attention, particularly to the observations in relation to a uniform tax on slaves. It is proper, also, to make provision for a more equal assessment of property in each State. A commission of a certain number of the tax collectors from the various portions of each State should be appointed to meet and adjust the rate at which the various kinds of property should be assessed.

It seems to me, also, that the entire machinery of assessors provided by the last act can be dispensed with by charging the duties of the assessors on the district collectors, and increasing their salaries. Exceptions may be made in case of large cities. This defect in salaries attached to the entire arrangement of the last act. It is not a wise policy to confide large money arrangements to officers who are badly paid. The patriotism of the officers induced them, during the last year, to accept the offices with the small salaries allowed. But it would be neither wise nor just to ask a repetition of the sacrifice.

The issuing of Treasury notes and the transfer of them to the various depositories, with the arrangements at those depositories for their receipt, custody, and disposal, have grown into some of the most important functions of this Department. The engraving, printing, and preparing the notes involve great responsibilities and still greater expense, and I must again urge upon Congress the expediency of creating for this branch a separate bureau. The necessities of the times compelled a transfer of the printing establishments to Columbia. It seemed a better policy to encourage private competition and enterprise, rather than undertake to carry on mechanical work by the Government. The engraving and printing, together with the manufacture of paper, have all been done by contract. But the handling of the notes after they are printed, and the trimming, numbering, and signing them, require a large number of clerks. I have been obliged greatly to increase the number under the authority of the Act of March 7, 1861, and the whole number is now 262; of whom 139 are ladies. I ventured upon the employment of the latter, under the belief that they would be found diligent and efficient, and that Congress would approve the relief which was thereby extended to a large portion of the most loyal, suffering, and deserving of our countrywomen. In arranging their duties, I reduced the time and work required below the rate required of the men, and made a proportionate reduction of salary. The plan has been found to work well. When it is considered that this very large branch of the business of the Treasury is without an appropriate head, and must be superintended in all its details as matters now stand by the Secretary himself, it will, I trust, be deemed reasonable to establish a separate bureau for its administration. I am bound by a sense of public duty again to say that it would conduce more to the public interest to dispense with most of this agency, and have the signatures to the notes engraved and printed. Experience proves that any signature is readily imitated—that the signatures of the same writers vary so much as to afford no adequate guide, and that, where so many signers are employed, it is impossible to inform the community either as to their names or signatures. The written signatures, therefore, furnish no better security than the engraved.

The issue and deposit of Treasury notes, and the very large disbursements now made for the war, have changed the entire character of the treasuries and depositories. Those at Richmond, Charleston, Montgomery, and Jackson, have become large banks, and the number of clerks and the salaries of both officers and clerks are wholly inadequate. The Assistant Treasurer at Charleston has a salary of $2,500, and the clerks at each office are limited to $1,200. The teller in a bank receives as much for his salary as is now paid to the Assistant Treasurer at Charleston. That officer has, for some time, desired to resign, and for two months I have been seeking, without success, a proper successor. I have also been unable to procure competent clerks at the salaries prescribed, and have been obliged to add to the sum. Congress may judge of the importance of these officers when they are informed that five or six millions of dollars are frequently in their hands on deposit. These officers, moreover, are made responsible for the acts of the clerks under them, a liability which, under present circumstances, no responsible party is willing to take. Unless these difficulties are corrected, it will be difficult to retain the present incumbents, and almost impossible to procure proper successors.

The collection of the produce loan, together with the purchase of produce under the Act of 21st of April, 1862, has been prosecuted with vigour. The total amount of subscriptions to the loan, valued in money, is about twenty-five millions of dollars; of which $7,631,044 have been collected at an expense of one-third of 1 per cent. The purchases of cotton thus far reported by the agents amount to 69,597 bales, costing $1,474,400. These purchases, at the present moment, have probably reached 250,000 bales, including those of which reports are on the way. In order to dispose of the cotton, two forms of certificate have been devised. By one, the specific parcel of cotton is identified and disposed of. By the other, the Government obligates itself to deliver certain quantities at certain points, at a fixed price. By the advice of our ministers abroad, some of the latter certificates, covering about 30,000 bales of cotton, have been placed as an experiment in the foreign markets; but sufficient time has not elapsed to hear from them. The details of this branch of the Department are set forth in the report of the clerk in charge, to which your attention is invited. The important and responsible duties intrusted to this clerk, render it proper that his office should be placed on a level with other branches in the Department. I would therefore respectfully recommend that the office be raised to the grade of a chief clerkship.

The collated returns of the war tax have not been completely made in all the States. The report of the chief clerk in charge of this Bureau, is so full and distinct upon the several points to which attention is due, that I cannot do better than refer you to a copy thereof, which is herewith presented. The question that has arisen between the Governor of Tennessee and the Department, is a mere question of estimate, but as it involves a large sum the Secretary would respectfully ask the direction of Congress as to some proper mode of adjusting the difference. The liberal manner in which the State has acted under the circumstances, may induce Congress to adopt an estimate which the Secretary would not feel himself empowered to accept.

The suspension of the collection in several parts of other States is also submitted specifically to the attention of Congress, in order that further instructions may be given. In relation to the State of South Carolina, it should be remarked that the Governor has directed the tax to be collected by the State tax collectors, wherever practicable, and the amount to be paid over to the Confederate Government.

The legislation which will be required to carry into effect the several matters recommended in this report, is the following:—

- 1.—An act limiting the period for funding the Treasury notes, bearing date prior to the 1st of December, 1862.
- 2.—Authority to issue a sufficient amount of Treasury notes, to pay the appropriations required for the support of the Government to the 1st of July next.
- 3.—Authority to issue bonds and stock sufficient to fund the notes already issued, entitled to be funded at 8 per cent.; and those hereafter to be funded at 7 per cent.
- 4.—A call upon the States to guarantee the war debt, upon a plan to issue 6 per cent. bonds, payable in instalments, in twenty-five years, upon the plan of the one hundred million loan.
- 5.—A modification of the loan act of April, 1862, by reducing the time to five years, within which the Government may redeem the bonds.
- 6.—A war tax upon property and income.
- 7.—The appropriation act.
- 8.—The organization of a Bureau in charge of the issue of Treasury notes.
- 9.—Increase of the salaries of the Assistant-Treasurers and Depositories, and their Clerks.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

C. G. MEMMINGER,
Secretary of the Treasury.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

Our friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed; that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any date, will be useful and acceptable presents.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives, or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognized at this office.

Our subscribers in the South will have their paper supplied through HENRY HOTZE, Esq., the Confederate States' Commercial Agent at London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

Subscription, 26s. per annum—post paid, 30s., payable in advance. All communications on business to be addressed, and Post-Office Orders made payable to, J. B. HOPKINS, 13, Boulevard-street, Fleet-street, London, E.C.

Agency at Liverpool: WM. KNOX, Secretary Southern Club, 55, Brown's-buildings.

Agency for the Continent: G. FOWLER, 279, Rue St. Honore, Paris.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, MARCH 19, 1863.

The Romance of War.

There has been recently published in this country a clever little pamphlet, on the model of Archbishop Whately's "Historic Doubts," which treats the American War as a myth, invented by the Tories in their hatred of the Democratic institutions of the United States. The arguments of the writer are drawn mainly from political considerations, from the various and contradictory changes in the feelings and views of the Northern leaders, from the Constitution itself, from the language of all the principal American authorities, from the tone and temper of the American people; and he has made out his case very fairly. Two thousand years hence, when the New Zealander stands amidst the ruins of London, if by chance a copy of this pamphlet comes into his hands, he may possibly Niebuhrize the history of the New World, and prove to the satisfaction of admiring students that the accredited accounts of the Secession and war in America in 1861, 62, and 63 are pure fiction, and that the names of Jefferson Davis, and Lee, and "Stonewall" Jackson, McClellan, and Lincoln, and Butler, represent only imaginary personages, invested with the most marked characteristics of American society at that period. But if, stimulated by his first discovery, he carries his researches further, and investigates the history of the war, he will find still more convincing evidence of the truth of his theory. No amount of testimony will induce a belief in the blunders and disasters of Northern armies and their commanders, or persuade the highly intelligent public of that future age that the millions of men who are now paraded on paper in the North, and those magnificent fleets which are being constantly launched from Northern dockyards, as realities. Seriously, there is something so incredible in the accounts of the struggle as they now reach us, that the historians of the war will have a most difficult task to fulfil; and when we reflect how many different versions are extant of the battle of Waterloo, and how hard it is to bring home positive and conclusive testimony to a debated event even of the last century, we may almost imagine our remote posterity reading of the sacking of Southern cities and the spoiling of Southern homes, as we do of the feast of the Lapithæ, or the rape of the Sabines. Take the memorable incident which has immortalised Pennsylvania, the regiments of three-months'-men with their bands and commanding officers at their head, marching off home amid the roar and smoke of battle, rising up over the plain three miles in their rear. Who will believe it? Take the news brought by the last mail, it is equally suggestive of extravagance and fiction. Only a month or two ago there was a great army of 170,000 men on the Rappahannock. They fought a battle and were beaten, and lost some 15,000 or 20,000 men. But since the battle that enormous army seems to have melted away. We hear nothing except of its gradual dissolution. The New York papers say there are 27,000 deserters from the rank and file. They do not overstate the number, we may be sure. The New York Herald of a recent date published a list of some fifty officers who had been removed by General Hooker, and another list of resignations equally large. And this is an invading army encamped on an enemy's territory. Can it be true? Quite recently, two great expeditions started Southward, one for Vicksburg, another for Charleston; they arrive at their destination, and nothing more is heard of them. The army of General Foster disappears entirely; the army of Grant and McClellan emulates the labours of the Persians under Xerxes, and boldly sets to work to turn a mighty river from its course. And then dying of exposure and ennui, and marsh malaria, this great army rots quietly away. Take the latest episode of the war, the loss of the Queen of the West and the Indianola. The whole affair reads like the romance of war. Here are the Federals supplying the South with ship after ship, in such a manner that one might almost say the thing was designed. No sooner is the Queen of the West captured, than the Indianola is sent in quest of her, and in her turn becomes a prize to the Confederates; and now the North is seriously alarmed lest the Confederate flotilla, increased by the best ships of the Federal squadron, should make a dash upon New Orleans, and free the Mississippi in a manner not the best calculated to meet the wishes of the North-Western States. The Queen of the West and the Indianola combined all that was newest and strongest in the Northern navy. The one a formidable ram, the other a turreted iron-clad, together they might have cleared the river between Vicksburg and Port Hudson. But with a want of foresight, a disregard of ordinary precautions never surpassed, each of the steamers starts upon its marauding expedition, through a country that has been for months in the enemy's occupation, and, as might be expected, each is taken. Commodore Porter says the Indianola was captured through disobedience to instructions. But no possible instructions could have saved her. It was a comparatively easy matter to run the blockade down the river—a very difficult thing to steam up the Mississippi in the teeth of the Vicksburg batteries. Commodore Porter is alone responsible for the loss of both his ships. Where one steamer effected a passage, twenty could, and to despatch these two gunboats away from the body of the fleet with no possibility of retreat, was simply to make them a present to the Confederates. We are ignorant of the force the latter possess in these waters. The Queen of the West, the Indianola, and the De Soto, they have captured from the North—the City of Vicksburg and the Webb have already been heard of. It is rumoured that there are at Port Hudson two or three powerful iron-clads. With such strength it is by no means impossible that they will look up the flotilla supporting Banks, and that instead of Port Hudson being assailed, the garrison at Baton Rouge, and even New Orleans will be in danger. In the whole history of this contest there has been nothing more surprising than the successful resistance of the South on the waters of the Mississippi; and if now, after all the efforts that have been made by the North-Western States, and after the vaunting of the great deeds to be accomplished by Farragut's and Porter's squadrons, the Southern flotilla, hitherto hemmed in between Vicksburg and Port Hudson, not only defies the North, but actually becomes the assailant, it will have added another marvellous page, perhaps the concluding one, to the chronicle of this extraordinary war.

From the North, from Charleston, from Tennessee, there is no important news. Hooker's troops are "muddled" up on the Rappahannock, and the only rumour worth quoting from head-quarters, is that he has excited some enthusiasm amongst his dispirited host by announcing McClellan's early assumption of the chief command. There are the usual accounts of cavalry raids, but beyond the interest of an occasional skirmish of the pickets, nothing to record. The Federals are evidently nervous about Kentucky, and there is a suspicious absence of information respecting the doings of Longstreet and Morgan and Forster, which accounts for their apprehension. But for the present the military news is eclipsed by the depredations of the Florida. Her last prize is the Jacob Bell, one of the fastest and finest of the American vessels, engaged in the China trade, with a cargo valued at $1,000,000,—which, the New York Herald lugubriously remarks, would have paid $200,000 in custom dues to the Federal Government. The loss of the Jacob Bell has driven the Chamber of Commerce well-nigh frantic, and the indignation of the Yankee ship-owners is excited not against their own naval administration, which permits these outrages on the national flag, but against England; and the passing of the Bill empowering the President to issue letters of marque is the first overt blow issued at this country. This and the Conscription Act are the two warlike measures of the close of the Congress. But long before they can come into operation the fate of Charleston and Vicksburg will be decided. The Congress of 1861 has terminated its labours in the midst of reverses and humiliation such as have never befallen a nation. Its latest acts, its voluntary surrender of every right, consecrated to the American people by the Fathers of the Republic, to the feeble despotism of Mr. Lincoln, hold out but little promise of peace, or even of a cessation of that series of disasters which has cast a blot upon the flag of the United States long years of triumph will not remove.

The Anomaly of the Age.

The history of our age is full of strange anomalies, but the strangest and greatest of them all will appear to the future historian to be the attitude which the neutral Powers of the earth have for two years observed towards the Government of the Confederate States of America. A Government which it would have been deemed the sublimest consummation of European statesmanship to have created in the interest of civilization and the world's peace—a Government which was indispensable to readjust the balance of power lost in the Western hemisphere and seriously threatened in the Eastern—this Government, when most unexpectedly, and without effort of European statesmanship, it presents itself in full-grown vigour, still remains, after two years' brilliant existence, ignored and unrecognised. During these two years this Government has riveted upon it the anxious eyes of all civilized Europe. It has waged war upon a scale unprecedented even in this century of Napoleonic wars. It has at this moment a victorious army of nearly half a million men in the field, and it has given lessons in naval warfare to the oldest of maritime nations. It has its representatives in every great capital, its agents in every mart of commerce. It enjoys the obedience of a numerous and devoted population, in a degree which devotion to a cause or country has seldom reached in modern times. It is feared by its enemies, honoured by its friends; and whether on the field of battle or in the haunts of commerce, it commands a confidence which few nations in so short a space have won. At this very moment, when its antagonist, double in numerical strength, and apparently with tenfold resources, is about, in very desperation, to perfect its bankruptcy by prohibiting the exportation of the precious metals—this unrecognised Government supplies its necessities with European loans. Recognised on the Stock Exchange, recognised by common parlance and by public opinion the world over, this Government is unknown and unrecognised, only by the diplomatic ceremonial.

In recording this anomaly, the historian will remark that there is no parallel of a nation occupying so conspicuous a place, and acting so important a part in history under similar circumstances. Other nations have struggled for independence, and have toiled hard and waited long to see that independence recognised; but in the fortunes of none has the civilized world ever before had so unanimous and vast an interest, and yet none has ever before been allowed to struggle so wholly unaided by moral or material support. Perhaps the historian may endeavour to explain this anomaly by a reason equally anomalous. It was not, he may argue, that neutral Powers were deterred by doubts as to the probable issue of the conflict, but, on the contrary, that at an early stage of the conflict, the ability of the new nationality to maintain itself became so manifest, that neutral nations deemed it unnecessary to incur risks or responsibilities for the attainment of an object already secured. Be this or not the true and sufficient reason for the supineness of European Governments, and especially of our own, it is certain that the time is now fast approaching, when this country must decide between a change of policy and the loss of most of the substantial advantages which it might reasonably expect to derive from the independence of the Confederate States. Even if it was wise to have done nothing towards the establishment of that independence, it cannot be wise to forego, in favour of others, our share of its fruit.

The correspondent of the Times, writing from Augusta, the heart of the Southern American States, describing their almost fabulous wealth and commercial resources, says:—

Never has so magnificent a field been thrown open to European commerce as these rich and magnificent provinces which the Federals have so long farmed. Offering with the one hand raw material of priceless value, they are disposed to take with the other every manufacture which European ingenuity and capital can supply, to an extent of which we have as yet but little conception in England. There is abundant evidence that France is already aware, and prepared fully to take advantage of the magnificent opening for trade which is about to be offered to the competition of the world. If England fails to make similar efforts to avail herself of this rich harvest, she will lose an opportunity compared with which the fabled profits which have been more than once anticipated from the extension of commercial facilities with China are poor and contemptible. It cannot but be apparent that the nation which is first to rush in and fill the vacuum, now on the eve of being thrown open, will possess great advantages with a view to the establishment of future trade.

And he adds the significant warning that, "it is impossible that many months can elapse before direct trade between Europe and the South is established."

But Great Britain has even higher and nobler moral interests at stake than these tempting commercial prospects. It concerns her that her voice should be heard and listened to as that of a friend in the counsels of the young nation, when it enters upon its peaceful career of prosperity. Shallow reasoners scoff at what is called moral influence in international politics, yet all history demonstrates that nations, like individuals, are swayed by such influences; that is, by hates and loves, passions and prejudices,—much oftener than by merely calm material consideration. Especially are those passions, whether of likes or dislikes, the strongest which a nation brings out of a great crisis, during which its character is fusible and impressible. It will be difficult for the Southerners, when this fearful war is over, not to remember favours or slights, and they will evince more equanimity of temper than ordinarily belongs to humanity if they do not judge of the conduct of others to them during the crisis according to its effect in prolonging or shortening their present difficulties. The nation that stood coldly by while the strife was raging, and which appears reluctant to acknowledge the victory even when gained, will scarcely be considered as a friend by the successful combatant. If British influence is to prevail, or at least to equilibrium rival influences at Richmond hereafter, it is but common-sense policy to show by unmistakable acts that past British policy has not been actuated by any feeling of malevolence towards the new Government.

The public awaits with impatience the debate in Parliament upon these grave questions, for which Lord Campbell's motion in the House of Lords is to be the signal. This motion, so often postponed, has at length been definitively fixed for Monday the 23rd inst. The reason for the last postponement, as well as of a previous one, is the indisposition of Lord Russell, whose voice, we regret to learn, has for some time been too weak to permit his taking part in debates. Without his presence, the chief object of the proposed motion, that of eliciting a public declaration of the intended policy of the Government from the noble Secretary for Foreign Affairs himself, would, of course, be lost. The delay, however, at this present juncture, is likely to be productive of good rather than evil. It is assumed that the French Government, though ready for action, is, for the moment, too much absorbed with the affairs of Poland not to wish for delay. Meanwhile public opinion and Ministerial policy are ripening apace, and it may fairly be hoped that Earl Russell's declarations on the day of the debate will have a more definite shape and tangible purpose, than they possibly could have had at the date when Lord Campbell's motion was first announced.

Diplomatic Correspondence on American Affairs.

We elsewhere reproduce that part of the American diplomatic correspondence, just presented to Parliament, which has passed between Her Majesty's Government and the representative of the Government of the Confederate States in England. Our readers now have the opportunity of ascertaining for themselves the excellent temper manifested by the Confederate Government under peculiarly trying circumstances, for unavoidably to some extent, but, as we think, to a much greater extent than was necessary or politic, the neutrality of the English Government has been vastly in favour of the North.

Mr. Mason's letters on recognition will perhaps be the most interesting, but his correspondence on the blockade will excite the most surprise. Immediately after the recognition of the Confederate States as a belligerent power, England and France requested the Confederate Government to accede to the terms of the Convention of Paris, and the request was promptly complied with. Under the old law of blockade, as set forth in the treaty between Great Britain and Russia in 1801, it was expressly stated that the blockade of a port was legal if the ships of the blockading power were sufficiently near to cause "an evident danger in entering." The text of the Convention of Paris says,—“Blockades, in order to be binding, must be effective, that is to say, maintained by a force sufficient really to prevent access to the coast of the enemy.” More explicit language could not have been employed. Not only is the former stipulation omitted, but it is expressly declared that the blockading force must be sufficient “really to prevent access to the coast of the enemy.” Formerly a blockade was effective if the chances were twenty or fifty to one against a vessel getting in or out of port; but according to the Paris Convention, a vessel must have no chance of getting in or out of the blockaded port; or, admitting that stress of weather might now and then drive off the blockading squadron, it was not, of course, contemplated that under the new construction of the law the blockade of Charleston should be deemed effective, when in four months no less than sixty-nine vessels were entered and cleared at that port. Even under the old construction of the law, we believe that such lax guardianship would have been sufficient to invalidate a blockade. On the 15th February, 1862, Lord Russell wrote to Lord Lyons, that it was the opinion of her Majesty's Government, that it was sufficient for the blockading force to create an evident danger of entering or leaving a blockaded port. The case does not admit of argument. It is evident that Lord Russell has thus introduced a law of blockade, not only unsanctioned by, but expressly opposed to, the emphatic declaration of the Convention of Paris; and the Confederate Government was justified in firmly protesting against such a palpable violation of the treaty, to which, at the request of England and France, it had yielded its assent. Mr. Mason points out very clearly the evil result of the recognition of a paper blockade. The Federal Government, though unable to seal Charleston, Savannah, and other Southern ports, affects to blockade a coast line of 2,500 miles, and so prevents, not by force, but by proclamation, commerce between the Confederate States and neutral nations. Besides the large ports, there are in the South a number of smaller towns accessible from the sea, and commerce might be carried on from these points, if neutral Powers insisted upon the Federal Government efficiently blockading them, or else treating them as open ports. The result of a fair observance of the Convention at Paris, would be to replenish our cotton market, and to open up a mart for our cotton manufactures. If the English Government had been firm in this particular, Lancashire would have been saved from destitution, and our staple industry from a depression that may result in its ruin. The want of American cotton does not prove the efficiency of the blockade, but arises from the Federal cruisers being allowed to capture neutral vessels on the high seas. The English people have suffered as much, perhaps even more, than the Confederates by this unfair and inexpedient infractions of a solemn compact.

With regard to the law appertaining to the raising of blockades, we suppose that there will be no misconception; for on February 10, 1863, a few days before the news reached this country of the naval engagement at Charleston, and that the brilliant exploits at Galveston had raised the blockade of that port, Lord Russell very emphatically and plainly declared what was the law in a despatch which he addressed to Mr. Mason. His Lordship says, “The driving off a blockading force by a superior force does break a blockade, which must be renewed de novo, in the usual form, to be binding upon neutrals.” We trust his Lordship will remember that it is not alone the duty of a Government to expound the law, but to enforce the observance thereof.

We need not animadvert on Mr. Mason's well-considered arguments for the recognition of the Confederate States. He demands it as a right, and not as a favour; he confesses his belief that withholding recognition prolongs the war; but he does not ask that neutral Powers shall take any steps following recognition to put an end to the war. The Confederate States seek neither aid nor intervention. They are content with the neutrality of foreign Powers, notwithstanding its unequal operation. Recognition would not deprive the North of its military chances of success, if it had any; and it would not be so hotly opposed by the Lincolnites, were it not for the consciousness that such a step being taken by foreign Powers would open the eyes of the people of the United States to the hopelessness of the struggle in which they are engaged.

The batch of correspondence marked No. 1, discloses an amount of shuffling on the part of the Federal Government, for which we were hardly prepared, even by Mr. Seward's late mendacious despatch in answer to the French proposal of mediation. Mr. Seward had promised on behalf of his Government, that as soon as a Southern port was in its possession, Europe should no longer languish for the want of cotton, or at all events, the United States Government would do what it could to alleviate the cotton famine. When Mr. Seward was reminded of these pledges, he excused himself on the ground that the Confederates burnt their cotton at the approach of the Federal forces. Lord Russell smartly rebuked him for this bungling excuse. In a despatch to Lord Lyons, his Lordship observes that it was unreasonable to make this a matter of blame to the Confederates, “for they could not be expected to leave such articles in warehouses to become the prize of war, and to be sold for the profit of the Federal Government, which would apply the proceeds to the purchase of arms to be used against the South.” It was then proposed by Lord Russell that each planter who chose to sell his cotton should be allowed to receive the price for it, irrespective of any political considerations. Mr. Seward declined giving an answer until he had ascertained the quantity of cotton ready for market, the quantity planted, and the disposition of the planters, though what these things had to do with the question we cannot conceive, and we are not astonished that Lord Russell should designate the conduct of Mr. Seward as being far from satisfactory. The English Foreign Secretary, in a despatch to Mr. Stuart—who was then Acting Chargé d'Affaires in the absence of Lord Lyons—dated July 16, 1862, observes: "Mr. Seward always held out the expectation that when the Southern ports were taken by the Federals, and the authority of the United States restored in those ports, cotton would be forthcoming, to be purchased for the use of Europe. New Orleans and other Southern ports have been taken, and the United States' authority restored therein, but the cotton is not forthcoming. The remedy should not have been delayed, nor the interests of neutrals treated with so little regard." This remonstrance had no effect, and as the Federal Government could neither seize the cotton of the planters nor trick them out of it, no cotton was forthcoming. On the 23rd of October last, Lord Russell wrote: "It is not to be supposed that the planters will give away their cotton: and they cannot sell it without receiving something in exchange which will increase their means, to whatever object those means may be applied." We should think the most credulous partisan of the North must be convinced that the Federals, and not the Confederates, have starved Lancashire. It is, indeed, absurd to suppose that the Confederates would object to change their cotton for gold.

There are several items in this correspondence worthy of a passing notice, not that they throw any new light on the state of affairs, but rather that they indicate how well our Government has been kept advised as to the probable issue of the contest, and the conduct of the Federal Government. On July 21, 1862, Mr. Stuart wrote to the Foreign Office that, "Amongst the means relied upon for weakening the South is included a servile war;" and to this Lord Russell promptly replied, "The prospect of a servile war will only make other nations more desirous to see an end of this desolating and destructive conflict." Is it not reasonable to suppose that, since a servile war has been proclaimed, "other nations" should feel called upon to take some steps to put an end to the conflict?

Despatch No. 21, from Mr. Stuart, is very explicit as to the object of issuing letters of marque. The English Chargé d'Affaires urged upon Mr. Seward "the danger of disputes which would probably ensue" if such a course were persevered in; and Mr. Seward was gracious enough to say, that if the friendly act of seizing the Oreto at Nassau were followed by similar acts, the measure would be unnecessary—that is, if the British navy would come to the aid of the Federal navy the British commercial marine should not be molested by Federal privateers. We have not thought it proper to help the Federal navy against the South, and the consequence is that letters of marque are to be issued. The insolence of Mr. Seward in threatening this country with pains and penalties, if we did not obey his wishes, is supremely ridiculous, though we much regret it should be tolerated. Nothing encourages bullying so much as submitting to small insults.

The report of Mr. Anderson, a member of the English Legation at Washington, dated the 1st of October, 1862, with regard to the state of feeling and condition in the Western States, which he had recently visited, will, no doubt, disgust Mr. Seward. Mr. Anderson writes: "Having heard much in the Eastern States of the unanimity which was said to prevail in the West with regard to the energetic prosecution of the war and the policy of emancipation, I was somewhat surprised to find that this unanimity was very far from existing." With respect to emancipation, Mr. Anderson says: "Nowhere in the Abolition States could I find that the freedom of the slave was connected in men's minds with the idea of the amelioration of his condition, nor did the question even seem to have been seriously agitated, what was to be done with the mass of emancipated negroes. I found that there was only one point upon which opinion seemed to be unanimous, which was, that no general immigration of negroes into the free States could be permitted; they must be freed; they must be kept at a distance; but, with those two conditions satisfied, there seemed to be little disposition to pursue the question any further." Mr. Anderson, after recording the atrocities of the Federal soldiers, says:

"It appears to me from all this, but one conclusion can be drawn. The Democratic party in the North is fighting for subjugation; the South has clearly seen that if she fails, nothing but utter ruin awaits every man. * * * I heard it often argued, (privately, for men would not dare to express such sentiments openly) that if the war was prolonged and embittered, and the end seemed hopeless, the Western States would begin to flag, would separate themselves from the extreme party, and be inclined to make overtures towards those with whom they had common interests." Mr. Anderson was a shrewd and observant traveller.

The correspondence about the Alabama is very long, and not particularly instructive. Mr. Adams is at much trouble to prove facts which are not denied, and pours in documents and depositions ad nauseam. Everybody knows that the Alabama was built in this country, and that she has done splendid service to the Government under whose flag she fights. Mr. Adams complains of the building and equipment of the Alabama as a breach of neutrality, and calls upon the English Government to aid and abet the Federal spies in preventing any like breaches so far as the Confederates are concerned. Lord Russell reminds him that Her Majesty's Government "are unable to go beyond the law, municipal and international;" and, again, that Her Majesty's Government "cannot go beyond the letter of the existing law." In answer to Mr. Adams's impudent threat of demanding compensation for the damage done by the Alabama, Lord Russell observes,—

If it be sought to make Her Majesty's Government responsible to that of the United States, because arms and munitions of war have left this country on account of the Confederate Government, that Confederate Government, as the other belligerent, may very well maintain that it has a just cause of complaint against the British Government, because the United States' arsenals have been replenished from British sources.

Nor would it be possible to deny that, in defiance of the Queen's Proclamation, many subjects of Her Majesty, owing allegiance to her Crown, have enlisted in the armies of the United States. Of this fact you cannot be ignorant.

Her Majesty's Government, therefore, have just grounds of complaint against both of the belligerent parties, but most especially against the Government of the United States, for having systematically, and in disregard of that comity of nations which it was their duty to observe, induced subjects of her Majesty to violate those orders which, in conformity with her neutral position, she has enjoined all her subjects to obey.

Mr. Adams replies with clumsy simplicity: "I beg to call your Lordship's attention to the fact that it is not the mere purchase or exportation of arms and warlike stores by the agents of the insurgents in America of which I have ever complained." What amazing kindness! Provided we will do all in our power to prevent the Confederates getting arms into the South, they may buy as many as they like. It would be awkward to stop the trade, because the United States want arms and warlike stores; so Mr. Adams does not complain. Just now, thanks to the splendid equipments of the beaten Northern armies, the South does not want arms. If Mr. Mason should inform Lord Russell that he does not complain of the agents of the Northern insurgents buying ships here, but he objects to them buying arms and warlike stores, his protest would be quite as just and reasonable as Mr. Adams's. The Queen of the West and the Indianola, lately captured from the Federals, are covered, we believe, with English iron. Does Mr. Adams hold the English Government responsible for the damage these rams may do to Northern ships? Let the North send a sufficient number of well-built vessels of war to the South, and the Confederates will not have occasion to offend Mr. Adams, by obtaining their ships directly from English shipbuilders.

Must we Lose our Cotton Trade?

"The fact, however, of a population living upon a charitable fund cannot endure, except as a temporary expedient during a short crisis. The time is coming when, if the trade does not return, this congestion of population must be dispersed and drawn off to other industries or to other lands."

Such were the concluding words of a leader on the Cotton Famine published in the Times of Saturday last. Of the thousands who read them, but few persons probably appreciated the gravity of the stern fact, so frankly admitted and so plainly unannounced by our contemporary. When this country was agitated by the fear of invasion—a precautionary fear not unworthy of a great nation conscious of its responsibilities—Lord Overstone was examined by a Committee as to the effect that would be produced on our commerce by the landing of an enemy. His Lordship was too shrewd and practical to attempt to set forth the probable issue of an unprecedented event, but he contented himself with saying, in answer to his querists, that the consequences of an invasion would be most disastrous to the community; and no one, we presume, will dispute the correctness of his conclusion. Yet an invasion is an evil less to be dreaded than the loss of our cotton trade. The first would be a blow to be averted at any cost, yet a blow that would not permanently cripple us, much less be mortal. An enemy might get the command of the channel so as to land his forces, but he could not hope to keep the command of the channel; and if he ventured on more than an incursion, he would know that his troops would have to pay with their lives for their rash adventure. But the loss of our cotton trade would be lasting. We do not assert that the Anglo-Saxon race would be ruined, and that it would not find other fields for its energy and labour; but that, so far as this country is concerned, the loss of the cotton industry would be irreparable. Let us glance at the magnitude of our cotton trade, and we shall then perceive how far our prosperity is dependent on it.

In 1860 our imports were:

Exports of foreign produce	43,538,000
Exports of domestic produce	135,842,000
Total imports and exports	£344,116,000

How much of this stupendous trade is directly connected with cotton? In 1860 our imports of cotton were:

	£44,615,000
Exports of the raw material	15,981,000
Exports of cotton manufactures	51,959,000
Total of cotton trade	£112,553,000

One-third of our vast trade is directly in cotton. Indirectly, how much depends on it cannot be stated with the like accuracy, but it will surely be a moderate estimate to assume that, associated with our cotton trade is 20 per cent. of the value of the rest of our trade, and, consequently, that half of our entire business is due to cotton. To compare small with great things, cotton is to the nation what tea is to the grocer—it is the leading article involving a trade in sugar.

The profit on our cotton trade cannot, of course, be calculated, but we are in a position to show the margin for profit. In 1859—we are now dealing with the estimated real, and not the stated official value—the quantity of cotton imported into this country was 1,399,938,752 lbs., and the value thereof £35,753,880 sterling. By looking to the total of imports and exports we have given above, and where we take the official, and consequently higher value of the imports, it will be seen that our export of cotton and cotton manufactures was £23,325,000 in excess of our cotton imports. This balance is not an arithmetical gauge of profit, for it does not tell us what was the cost of the industry that so increased the value of the raw material, but it discloses an ample margin for profit. But this is not all. The consumption of cotton in England is estimated at nearly 11 lbs. per head of the entire population; so that we used at home about one-fourth of our imports of 1860—or raw cotton to the value of about £9,000,000 sterling. This is even better evidence of profit than the excess of exports. But we need not dwell on this part of the subject, since no one denies the profitability of our cotton trade. It is the most remunerative, as well as the largest branch of our commerce, and its loss would be manifestly a terrible calamity. Is there any reason for apprehending such an unparalleled disaster?

Supposing the stream of benevolence was to flow on for years, it is not the less true that a population could not be kept on charity for that time without becoming so demoralized as to be ruined for all industrial pursuits, and a burden and a danger to the State. Not from any fault of the good people of Lancashire, for the like cause would produce the like effects on any class of the community. We do not, however, regard the present clamour against the mode of relief as a sign of demoralization. The operatives are pauperised not by their own act, nor by its pleasing God to cut off the harvest upon which their industry depends, but because it suits the policy of their Government to respect the claim of the United States to treat the Confederate States as a rebellious territory—for if the Southern Confederacy were recognised as a nation as well as a belligerent, we should obtain cotton, for then no paltry quibble would be permitted to render inoperative the Convention of Paris, to which the Confederate Government has given its adhesion. It is not only the inefficient blockade of the Southern coast, but the blockade of the sea, in contravention of the Convention of Paris, that keeps the home market bare of American cotton. Under such circumstances the operatives have a right to relief; and because the burden is delegated by the Government to the benevolent public, it does not follow that the relief should be received by the operatives as paupers receive alms. But feeding the operatives is the least of the difficulties. Mr. Cobden thinks it would be cheaper to keep them on turtle and champagne than to irritate the fanatics of New England; but has he reflected that keeping them in idleness in any way for any length of time is ruinous? Is there then any prospect of the revival of the trade? Not so long as the war continues on the present footing. The bubble scheme of replacing the American supply is exploded, but it may be desirable to point out again the connection between America and our cotton trade. The following table of the cotton imported into this country in 1860 is taken from Mr. Capper's work on "The Port and Trade of London:"—

Thus America sent us four-fifths of the quantity and six-sevenths of the value. It is evident that, under the most favourable circumstances—even if the Confederate States had not a monopoly of climate—very many years must elapse before there would be any chance of the American supply being replaced. But it will not be so after any number of years. The reason America has supplied four-fifths of our cotton is, that it could do so at a price which defied competition; and if the price of cotton is enhanced, so as to make it worth the while of other countries to abandon their present products for cotton, the demand will fall off. The large consumption of cotton, and consequent greatness of our cotton manufacture, is due to the cheapness of the raw material; and if that becomes dear, the demand will diminish, and our manufacture will be dwarfed. The present prices check our trade, and will continue to do so. The only chance of a revival is obtaining the supply from America, by the cessation or modification of hostilities, and that we may be able to replenish the exhausted stocks in the Southern Confederacy. The orders from the South would keep our mills going for many months, even at the present high prices. If this is not to be, our operatives must find employment in other trades, though we know of none that are not fully supplied with labour. Or we must send our bees abroad to labour in and to enrich other countries. The smart Yankee knows this, and is determined to carry on hostilities until the cotton industry of England is broken up. That result will be quite as good, so he thinks, as the enforcement of the Morrill Tariff.

These facts call for grave consideration. They are not to be disposed of by a suggestion of "Historians," that we write to prop up the Liverpool cotton market. They are not to be disposed of by any amount of special pleading against the right of recognising the independence of a nation that is openly acknowledged on every mart in Europe, and, indeed, practically, by every European Government. It is no reply to allege we are writing in the interest of the Confederacy. We admit the South has a vast interest in the prosperity of the English cotton trade. We think, though on this point many eminent Southern politicians differ from us, that it will be well for the South if her industry is mainly directed to the production of cotton. But the Southern lands will yield their increase, though they are not planted with cotton, while the cotton operatives of England, if driven forth by the continued depression of trade, will be utterly lost to the country. We suppose, however, that few will gainsay the importance of our staple industry and the danger that threatens it. Why, then, do we submit so patiently to this affliction? That a purposeless war may go on. Because some of our publicists think that according to the law of nations, so long as the North keeps large bodies of men in the South, not to fight but to rot, it is not lawful to recognise the South. So that the North, under pretence of freeing the negroes, may enlist a few thousands of them to be slaughtered, and if by any means they can accomplish it, cause here and there a servile massacre in the South. Because New England wishes the monopoly of Southern and Western trade, and to exclude European manufactures. We do not wonder that the Yankee is complacent about his smartness, and that he thinks the nations of Europe are in their dotage. New England will not conquer the South, but she will be able to gratify her malignant hatred of this country, and to boast that she destroyed the staple industry of England, by duping our Government with loud bragging and vain threatenings.

THE DISRUPTION OF THE DEMOCRATS.

For the second and last time in the history of the United States, the election of a President fell, in 1825, into the hands of the House of Representatives. Voting by States, their choice fell on John Quincy Adams, son of the second President, and father of the present Minister to England. Perhaps, had the old party distinctions lasted, Mr. Adams would have ranked himself among the Federalists. As it was, he was counted as a Democrat; and the vote given in his favour by Henry Clay, which was subsequently arraigned as a breach of faith, could hardly be considered as an act of party treason. On the whole, the choice was probably a good one; for Adams was, at least, as worthy of the Presidency as any of his immediate successors. The principal event of his Administration was the revision of the tariff in 1828, on which occasion the Southern and Northern States were more distinctly and directly brought into conflict than had happened before, except upon the Missouri Compromise. The extravagance of the duties imposed four years before had led, as a matter of course, to various fraudulent practices; and the object of the revision was rather to render the Customs regulations more stringent and more effective than to raise the rate of the imposts. But the object was still the same—to tax American consumers not for the sake of revenue, but for the benefit of American traders and manufacturers. And the operation of such a measure had become more clearly unjust than ever. We are not now concerned with the economical objections to a protective system. After a careful study of the arguments on either side, we might possibly understand that, in a homogeneous nation, there are plausible reasons why wise and even clear-sighted patriots may be willing to encourage nascent manufactures at a present loss to the community for the sake of a greater ultimate benefit. But the United States were not in a position to do this equitably or safely; for it had now become obvious to all that a protective tariff meant merely the protection of Northern at the expense of Southern industry—the impoverishment of half the Union for the enrichment of the other half. It may be worth while to indicate, once for all, how this came to be the case.

The South, producing chiefly for exportation, required no protection, and could not be benefited by it. In the first place, its system of labour gave it a natural protection against the few rivals it could ever find. Slavery had enabled it to combine, in a tropical climate, the supervision, the energy, and the capital of a superior race with the efficiency of manual industry of which, within the tropics, that race is incapable. It was protected in the markets of the world against India; for India, though she had an abundant supply of cheap labour, had not the advantage of having that labour directed by Anglo-Saxon skill and vigour, and utilised by the capital of a civilized and mercantile people. It was exposed to competition with the West Indies; but that competition hardly affected any produce save that of Louisiana; and after 1833, it ceased to exist. Again, depending on foreign markets, the South could derive no benefit from domestic protection; while such protection was sure to hamper her trade both by provoking retaliatory measures, and by increasing the expense of production and transport. It was not, therefore, that the North would not have granted protective duties on Southern produce, but that the South did not want them. Indeed, in a region of such abundant fertility as the United States, with millions of acres of rich land uncultivated, and half the surface of the country untilled, agriculture could gain nothing by protection, for it had nothing to fear by foreign competition. It was, therefore, only manufacturers that needed encouragement, and it was only for manufacturers that protection was asked.

Now the circumstances of the South were such as almost to forbid the growth of manufactures. The habits and character of the people forbade their aggregation into vast towns and overgrown villages, as in the North. They were scattered over a wider extent of country, and preferred a country life. Again, labour was too valuable to be wasted on manufactures. Every hand that was available was wanted for other employment. There was a constantly-increasing demand for the products of Southern agriculture—a demand increasing much faster than the supply. The only manufactures of the Southern States, therefore, with few exceptions, were carried on at home; the women and girls spinning and weaving the clothing of the household. Manufactures of this kind need no protection, for their cost is hardly appreciable. They do not divert labour from other tasks; they merely occupy time which would otherwise be unemployed. The condition of the Northern, especially of the North-eastern, States was very different. In New England agriculture had begun to languish; it has since decayed not only there, but actually in New York. The soil there has been exhausted more rapidly than in the South, and for precisely the same reason—it did not pay to preserve it. It was more profitable to work it to the uttermost, and, on its failure, to seek new land elsewhere. The Yankee, moreover, is less attached to his home, whether by ties of affection or of convenience, than the planter of the older Southern States. Therefore, the agricultural interest was waning to the North-East; and the encouragement given to manufactures by a long series of protective enactments had fostered there a new interest, which depended on protection, and lived at the expense of the consumers of manufactured goods. Accordingly, we find that in 1828 the New England States were in favour of protection; Daniel Webster declaring that "this has now become the established policy of the nation; the Eastern States have adapted themselves thereto; and it harmonizes with their best interests that it should be maintained." On the other hand, South Carolina took the lead in vehement opposition; and a petition to her Legislature complained, in language very forcible, but substantially just, that, "We exist as a member of the Union merely as an object of taxation. The Northern and Middle States are to be enriched by the plunder of the South. The citizens of South Carolina will be condemned to work as the tributaries of the Northern and Middle sections of the Union. It is so now; and it is triumphantly determined to extend the system indefinitely." At present this opposition did not go further than words; and the tariff bill passed both Houses of Congress by small majorities, and was accepted by the President.

But during the next few years, party and sectional antagonism was much embittered by personal disputes. The election of 1828-9 was almost a personal feud between General Jackson on the one hand, and Messrs. Adams and Clay on the other. It resulted in the triumph of the former; a man of violent and imperious temper, of uncertain political principles, and incapable of keeping on good terms with the ablest of those who surrounded him. He was already on the worst terms with Henry Clay, a man superior to him in every quality which makes men liked by their associates, or trusted by the best of their countrymen. He had not been long in office before he contrived to quarrel bitterly with John C. Calhoun, the Vice-President; than whom no man had more authority with the Southern Democrats, and who was the only American of that day, except Adams and Clay, who would have been accepted as an equal by the statesmen of Europe. These personal quarrels embittered the debates of Congress, and contributed not a little to that exasperation of feeling which, in 1832, actually seemed to endanger the existence of the Union. In that year a new modification of the tariff took place, exceedingly hostile to the interests and the wishes of the South. The State of South Carolina, always foremost in any affray, acted on this occasion with even more than her usual impetuosity. She passed laws nullifying the tariff; and when General Jackson threatened coercion, she took measures for armed resistance. The quarrel was finally appeased by the interposition of the State of Virginia, and the passage of a compromise tariff drawn up by Henry Clay—always a decided Protectionist; but discerning men could hardly fail to see in the collision of 1832 an omen of that disruption which nothing but the most anxious efforts of all the foremost statesmen of all parties, and the moderation of the majority of the Southern States, could have availed to postpone till 1860.

It must be admitted that, though General Jackson showed a lamentable want of discretion in the insolence of his tone and the extravagance of his menaces, he had a better cause, and acted with much more regard to law and to his oath of office than did his successor. He did not take upon himself to proclaim a civil war; nor did he make himself ridiculous by affecting to "read the Riot Act" to Sovereign States. He asked authority from Congress for the measures he deemed it necessary to adopt; it was left for Abraham Lincoln, in violation alike of the spirit and of the letter of the Constitution, to make war of his own mere motion and on his own responsibility. And it can hardly be contended that nullification was legally defensible. A Sovereign State has a right to secede from a Confederacy; but being a member thereof, and reaping the advantages of that position, she is bound to abide strictly by the Federal Constitution. The constitutionality of the Tariff was a question for the Supreme Court, and not for a State Legislature. To justify the action of South Carolina in 1832 would be to excuse the breach of faith committed by those Northern States which, for so many years, persistently "nullified" that important article of the Federal compact which provides for the rendition of fugitive slaves.

General Jackson's administration is notorious in the history of the United States for several acts of high-handed authority, grateful at the time to large numbers of the people, but of disastrous effect as precedents for usurpation on the part of the Executive, and as lessons of contempt for Congress and the Constitution. He used his veto with indiscriminate readiness to stop all measures of which he disapproved. He contrived to destroy the Bank of the United States, first by putting his veto on the renewal of its charter, and secondly by withdrawing from its custody, in despite of his Ministers and of Congress, the deposits lodged therein on account of the Government. We do not propose to discuss the intrinsic wisdom of any of these steps; but it is impossible not to characterise them as unwarrantable assertions of an individual will against the deliberate authority of the Legislature. The destruction of the Bank brought down on the President a direct vote of censure in the Senate, to which he objected as unconstitutional, and which was afterwards expunged from the Senatorial journals on the motion of Colonel Benton, of Missouri. Under his successor, the duty of taking charge of the receipts and expenditure of the Government was delegated to an official board called the Sub-treasury. But the worst and most unconstitutional portion of President Jackson's conduct was the introduction of the system of wholesale removals from office, of which we have already spoken at length; a practice which first ruined the public service of the United States, and then degraded the Presidential elections into little better than a mere scramble for places. It is worthy of remark that, in the Constitutional Convention, this practice was condemned beforehand as one which no President would dream of adopting, and which, if adopted, would justly subject him to impeachment.

Popular as General Jackson undoubtedly was with the masses, he constantly met with indignant opposition from Congress, and especially from the Senate; and he was, as has been said, at variance with all, or almost all, the leading statesmen of the time. That he contrived to overcome their antagonism, to secure at last an uncontrolled ascendancy, to retire in triumph and to nominate his successor, must be attributed chiefly to the circumstances which rendered it impossible to unite the various sections, hostile to his person or his policy, into a single Opposition party. Mr. Clay had the confidence of the largest section, known first as National Republicans, and afterwards as Whigs—a party, indeed, which may be said to have consisted of his own personal adherents. But it was impossible for his followers to act heartily with those of Calhoun; for the latter was the representative of a Free-trade policy, and had carried his adherence to that policy to the verge of civil war, while Clay was a staunch advocate of a protective tariff. Another and very absurd dissension divided the Opposition. The disappearance of a person who had promised to publish a book revealing the secrets of the Freemasons, gave rise to a wild outcry against the Masonic order; and a party was actually founded which had no other principle, bond of union, or rallying cry than hostility to Masonry. As Henry Clay was a Mason, it was impossible for this party to unite with the National Republicans; and amid this division of its opponents, the party of General Jackson was able to do much as it pleased. It carried its candidate for the Presidency, in 1837, by a vast majority in the electoral colleges; General Jackson's second election having hardly met with an effective opposition.

During the Presidency of General Jackson a bill was passed providing for the distribution of a portion of the revenues arising from the sale of public lands among the States. It received the President's veto. A subsequent measure, providing for the deposit with the States of the surplus then in the Treasury, supported both by Clay and Calhoun, was carried by large majorities, and received the reluctant sanction of General Jackson.

His departure from office left the Government of the United States to be disputed among several factions, all defined rather by personal predilections than by political principles. But, out of the chaos, the Whig party was beginning to form itself, and assume the place of the disbanded Federalists; the Democrats reclosed their broken ranks, and resolutely maintained their hold on the good things of office.

OVERHAULING A BRITISH SHIP IN DANISH WATERS.

ST. THOMAS, February 23, 1863.

Sir,—On last Friday morning, the 20th instant, while in sight of the Island of St. Thomas, and within less than two miles of Dog Island, which is one of the smaller islands adjoining St. Thomas, and probably a little over two miles from the Frenchman's Cap, an island opposite the harbour, the steamer Peterhoff, of and from London to Matamoros, on which vessel I am a passenger, was overhauled by the U.S. war steamer, Alabama. We were steaming for the harbour at the rate of about seven knots, with the English flag and a signal for a pilot up, when the Alabama hove in sight steaming directly across our path. Soon after she caught sight of us she fired two shots across our bow, when the captain of the Peterhoff dipped his signal, and reduced the speed to one half, still keeping on his course. While the Alabama was approaching us we watched her very closely with our glasses, and could see that she had all her guns manned and kept her bow-chaser, a large Parrott gun, trained on us continually as our relative positions were changed by the approach of the Alabama to us. When she was within about half a mile, or less, from us, we stopped our engines, and she did the same, and lowered a boat, which came alongside of us. The boat contained six men and an officer, and the latter came on board to examine our papers, which seemed to be satisfactory, as he left us very soon and returned to his ship. While the officer was on board, his ship lay about a quarter of a mile from us, showing her broadside and bow-chasers, all manned and trained on us. The Alabama had left this port but a short time before overhauling us, and we were so near her that the shots which she fired were heard at this place. When we got in and the occurrence came to be known, there was quite an excitement here about the infringement of "Danish waters;" but I don't think anything will be done by the authorities, as the Yankees are at present very good customers of this place, and have one or more men-of-war always in the harbour. When we arrived we found the Vanderbilt in the harbour coaling; the ship Shepherd Knapp, an old merchantman, changed to a man-of-war in the harbour, and, as I mentioned before, the Alabama had just left. On the same night the Vanderbilt went out, it was said, in search of the Florida—which had burned a large East India ship near here a few days previously—but, as is here generally believed, to keep out of her way if possible. The Vanderbilt was at Port Royal, Jamaica, while the Alabama was in that port repairing damages after sinking the Hatteras off Galveston. The officers of the Vanderbilt report that they saw the Alabama in the harbour, but did not go in themselves, because they would not have been allowed to stay there longer than twenty-four hours, and that time was too short for them to take in enough coal. They did not say, however, whether they wanted the coal to fight the Alabama with, or to run away from her, so they came here and took coal.

DIPLOMATIC CORRESPONDENCE

BETWEEN EARL RUSSELL & THE HON. J. M. MASON.

PRESENTED TO BOTH HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT.

No. 1, is from Mr. Mason, inclosing a list of twenty-eight vessels which arrived at Havannah and Matanzas from Confederate ports during the months of January and February, 1862.

No. 2, is Lord Russell's acknowledgment of the receipt of this despatch.

No. 3.

MR. MASON TO EARL RUSSELL.—(Received July 7.)

54, Devonshire Street, Portland Place,
London, July 7, 1862.

My Lord,—I am instructed by a recent despatch from the Secretary of State of the Confederate States of America, to bring to the attention of your Lordship, what would seem to be an addition engrafted by her Majesty's Government on the principle of the law of blockade, as established by the Convention of Paris in 1856, and accepted by the Confederate States of America, at the invitation of her Majesty's Government.

In the instructions to me the text of the Convention of Paris is quoted in the following words:—

"Blockades, in order to be binding, must be effective, that is to say, maintained by a force sufficient really to prevent access to the coast of the enemy."

And the despatch of the Secretary of State then proceeds:

"The Confederate States, after being recognised as a belligerent Power by the Governments of France and Great Britain, were informally requested by both those Powers to accede to this declaration, as being a correct exposition of international law. Thus invited, this Government yielded its assent."

"Great then was the surprise of the President, at finding in the published correspondence before alluded to" (referring to the papers laid before Parliament, touching the American blockade), "the following expressions of Earl Russell in his letter to Lord Lyons of the 15th of February last.

"Her Majesty's Government, however, are of opinion that assuming that the blockade was duly notified, and also that a number of ships is stationed, and remains at the entrance of a port sufficient, really, to prevent access to it, or to create an evident danger of entering or leaving it; and that the ships do not voluntarily permit egress or ingress, the fact that various ships may have successfully escaped through it (as in the particular instance referred to) will not of itself prevent the blockade from being an effectual one by international law."

"You will perceive that the words in italics are an addition to the definition of the Treaty of Paris of 1856."

"If such be the interpretation placed by Great Britain on the Treaty of 1856, it is but just that this Government should be so officially informed. Certain it is that this Government did not, nor could it anticipate, that the very doctrine in relation to blockade formerly maintained by Great Britain, and which all Europe supposed to be abandoned by the Treaty of 1856, would again be asserted by that Government."

"The language of her Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs may not have been intended to bear the construction now attributed to it, but it is evidently susceptible of this interpretation, and we cannot be too cautious in guarding our rights in a matter which must in the future, as well as the present, so deeply involve the interests of the Confederacy."

As a warrant for the assertion in the despatch of the Secretary, that the superadded words promulgated a doctrine in relation to blockade, formerly maintained by Great Britain, I am referred by him to the text of the Treaty between Great Britain and Russia in 1801, as follows:—

"That in order to determine what characterizes a blockaded port, that denomination is given only where there is, by the disposition of the Power which attacks it with ships stationary or sufficiently near, an evident danger in entering."—Article 111, Section 4.

The force and effect of these superadded words, it must be plain to your Lordship, has materially and most prejudicially affected, and must continue so to affect, during the existing war, the interests of the Confederate States; nor could this be better shown than by the illustration adopted in the letter referred to, from your Lordship to Lord Lyons, that:

"The fact that various ships may have escaped through it

(the blockade) will not, of itself, prevent the blockade from being an effectual one by international law."

It may be readily admitted that the fact that various ships entering or leaving a port have successfully escaped a blockading squadron, does not show that there may not have been an evident danger in so entering or leaving it; but it certainly does show that the blockade was not, in the language of the Treaty of Paris, "maintained by a force sufficient, really, to prevent access to the coast of the enemy."

I have, therefore, the honour to request, for the information of my Government, that your Lordship will be good enough to enable me to solve the doubt entertained by the President of the Confederate States as to the construction placed by the Government of her Majesty on the text of the Convention of Paris, as accepted by the Government of the Confederate States in the terms hereinbefore cited, that is to say, whether a blockade is to be considered effective when maintained at an enemy's port by a force sufficient to create an "evident danger of entering or leaving it; and not alone, where sufficient, "really to prevent access."

On the subject of the alleged blockade, I have received from the Department of State of the Confederate States, and am instructed to lay before your Lordship, as her Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, the accompanying lists of vessels entered and cleared at the port of Charleston, South Carolina, in the months of November and December, 1861, and of January, February, and March, 1862; at the port of Savannah, Georgia, for the months of October, November, and December, 1861; at Galveston, Texas, for the months of December, 1861, and January and February, 1862; at New Orleans, Louisiana, for the months of November and December, 1861, and February, 1862; at Pensicola, Florida, for the months of December, 1861, and January and February, 1862; at Apalachicola, Florida, for the months of December, 1861, and January, 1862; and at Port Lavaca, Texas, in January, 1862.

The doctrines of international law certainly are, that war does not put an end to commerce between a belligerent and neutrals, except at ports and places actually blockaded; and yet in the strange and anomalous pretensions of the United States, apparently acquiesced in by neutral Powers, all commerce between neutrals and the Confederate States is prohibited along an entire coast-line of some 2,500 miles. Armed vessels cruise along the coast, and capture all neutrals that fall in their way, on the allegation that the entire coast is under blockade. The Confederate States, as is known, have never been commercial, their carrying trade being almost entirely in the hands of other nations. Were it otherwise, little effect would be produced upon their commerce by this misnamed blockade. As it is, the few ships and other vessels armed by them have, from the beginning of the war, been actively and profitably employed in carrying their products to foreign ports, and in bringing back supplies. Not one in ten, in the large number of voyages so made, it is believed, has been captured; and had that respect been exacted for neutral rights which the law of nations provides, commerce between Europe and the Confederate States would have been, comparatively, but little interrupted. And in this view, I am instructed to inquire, whether it may not be practicable to require of the blockading Power to specify, from time to time, the ports claimed to be actually blockaded. Besides the larger ports (few in number in the Confederate States) there are numbers of smaller towns, accessible from the sea, where commerce continues to be carried on with foreign nations in the few vessels possessed by Confederate owners, and were blockaded ports designated these latter would at once be open to the commerce of the world in anything not contraband. How far this would be advantageous to neutral Powers it remains for them to determine. The article of cotton alone taken from such ports which are not, and have not been blockaded, but commerce with which is intercepted by armed cruisers, occasionally passing along the coast, would go far to supply the pressing demand of European manufacturers.

In this connection I am instructed emphatically to disclaim any policy in the Confederate States' Government to prohibit or discourage the export of cotton. It has been the policy of the enemy to propagate such belief, and perhaps, to some extent, it may have obtained credence in Europe. On the contrary, I am instructed to assure her Majesty's Government that if Europe is without American cotton, it is because Europe has not thought it proper to send her ships to America for cotton. Were the blockading Power required strictly to designate the ports and places blockaded, and to maintain the same by adequate force from those other ports thus clearly ascertained to be open to trade, any amount of cotton required would be freely offered in exchange for the manufactures of Europe. There is no lack of this great article of export in the interior of the Southern States. It has not been brought to the seaboard because there was little demand for exportation, and it would otherwise be subject to depredation by the enemy. Wherever they approach, it is destroyed by fire, to prevent its falling into their hands; but let the blockaded ports be designated, as required by public law, and it will freely flow to the coast at other points thereby opened to the trade of the world.

There is one subject further in connection with this alleged blockade to which I am directed to call the attention of her Majesty's Government. It is, that vessels of war of the United States are stationed off the mouth of the Rio Grande, with orders not to permit shipments of cotton to be made from the Mexican port of Matamoros. It is claimed that cotton taken from the Confederate States to Matamoros is lawful subject of capture. In proof of this I have the honour to transmit herewith a copy of an extract of a letter from J. A. Quintero, the commercial agent of the Confederate States at Matamoros, to the Secretary of State of the Confederate States.

I need not say to your Lordship that although a maritime blockade may, in some sense, be frustrated by the carriage of merchandise, through the medium of interior communication, from a blockaded to a neutral port, when shipped from the latter it is no breach of blockade; yet this is now done at the mouth of the Rio Grande, a river forming the boundary between Mexico and the Confederate States of Texas.

I am, &c.,

MR. MASON TO EARL RUSSELL.—(Received July 17.)

54, Devonshire-street, Portland-place, London, July 17, 1862.

My Lord,—In late proceedings of Parliament, and in reply to inquiries made in each House, as to the intention of her Majesty's Government to tender offices of mediation to the contending Powers in North America, it was replied, in substance, by Lord Palmerston and your Lordship, that her Majesty's Government had no such intention at present, because although this Government would be ever ready to offer such mediation, whenever it might be considered that such interposition would be of avail, it was believed by the Government that, in the present inflamed or irritated temper of the belligerents, any such offer might be misinterpreted, and might have an effect contrary to what was intended.

I will not undertake, of course, to express any opinion of the correctness of this view so far as it may apply to the Government or people of the United States; but as the terms would seem to have been applied equally to the Government or people of the Confederate States of America, I feel warranted in the declaration, that whilst it is the unalterable purpose of that Government and people to maintain the independence they have achieved, whilst under no circumstances or contingencies will they ever again come under a common Government with those now constituting the United States; and although they do not in any form invite such interposition, yet they can see nothing in their position which could make either offensive or irritating a tender of such offices on the part of Her Majesty's Government, as might lead to a termination of the war, a war hopelessly carried on against them, and which is attended by a wanton waste of human life, at which humanity shudders. On the contrary, I can entertain no doubt that such offer would be received by the Government of the Confederate States of America, with that high consideration and respect due to the benign purpose in which it would have its origin.

EARL RUSSELL TO MR. MASON.

Foreign Office, July 24th, 1862.

Sir,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 17th instant, respecting the intention expressed by Her Majesty's Government to refrain from any present offer of mediation between the contending parties in North America, and I have to state to you, in reply, that, in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, any proposal to the United States to recognise the Southern Confederacy would irritate the United States, and any proposal to the Confederate States to return to the Union would irritate the Confederates.

This was the meaning of my declarations in Parliament upon the subject.

MR. MASON TO EARL RUSSELL.—(Received July 24.)

54, Devonshire Street, Portland Place, London.

July, 24, 1862.

My Lord,—In the interview I had the honour to have with your Lordship in February last, I laid before your Lordship, under instructions from the Government of the Confederate States, the views entertained by that Government, leading to the belief that it was, of right, entitled to be recognised as a separate and independent Power, and to be received as an equal in the great family of nations.

I then represented to your Lordship that the dissolution of the Union of the States of North America, by the withdrawal therefrom of certain of the Confederates, was not to be considered as a revolution, in the ordinary acceptation of that term; far less was it to be considered as an act of insurrection or rebellion; that it was, both in form and in fact, but the termination of a Confederacy which, during a long course of years, had violated the terms of the Federal compact by the exercise of unwarranted powers, oppressive and degrading to the minority section. That the seceding parties had so withdrawn as organized political communities, and had formed a new Confederacy, comprising then, as now, thirteen separate and sovereign States, embracing an area of 870,610 square miles, and with a population of 12,000,000. This new Confederacy has now been in complete and successful operation, as a Government, for a period of nearly eighteen months; has proved itself capable of successful defence against every attempt to subdue or destroy it; and in a war, conducted by its late Confederates, on a scale to tax their utmost power, has presented everywhere a united people, determined at every cost to maintain the independence they had affirmed.

Since that interview more than five months have elapsed, and during that period events have but the more fully confirmed the views I then had the honour to present to your Lordship. The resources, strength, and power in the Confederate States developed by those events, I think, authorise me to assume, as the judgment of the intelligence of all Europe, that the separation of the States of North America is final; that under no possible circumstances can the late Federal Union be restored; that the new Confederacy has evinced both the capacity and the determination to maintain its independence, and, therefore, with other Powers the question of recognising that independence is simply a question of time.

The Confederate States ask no aid from, nor intervention by, foreign Powers. They are entirely content that the strict neutrality which has been proclaimed between the belligerents shall be adhered to, however unequally it may operate, because of fortuitous circumstances, upon them.

But if the principles and the morals of the public law be, when a nation has established before the world both its capacity and its ability to maintain the Government it has ordained, that a duty devolves on other nations to recognise such fact, then I submit that the Government of the Confederate States of America, having sustained itself, unimpaired, through trials greater than most nations have been called to endure, and far greater than any it has yet to meet, has furnished to the world a sufficient proof of stability, strength, and resources, to entitle it to a place amongst the independent nations of the earth.

I have, &c.

MR. MASON TO EARL RUSSELL.—(Received August 1.)

54, Devonshire-street, Portland-place, August 1, 1862.

My Lord,—In the interview I had the honour to propose in my late note, I had intended briefly to submit the following views, which I thought might not be without weight, in the consideration to be given by her Majesty's Government to the request for recognition of the Confederate States, submitted in my letter of the 24th July ultimo. I ask leave now to present them as supplemental to that letter.

If it be true, as there assumed, that in the settled judgment of England the separation of the States is final, then the failure of so great a Power to recognise the fact in a formal manner, imparts an opposite belief, and must operate as an incentive to the United States to protract the contest.

In a war, such as that pending in America, where a party in possession of the Government is striving to subdue those, who for reasons sufficient to themselves, have withdrawn from it, the contest will be carried on in the heat of blood, and of popular excitement long after its object has become hopeless in the eyes of disinterested parties.

The Government itself may feel that its power is inadequate to bring back the recusant States, and yet be unable at once to control the fierce elements which surround it whilst the war rages. Such, it is confidently believed, is the actual condition of affairs in America.

It is impossible in the experience of eighteen months of no ordinary trial—in the small results attained—and in the manifest exhaustion of its resources, that any hope remains with the Government of the United States either of bringing about a restoration of the dissevered Union, or of subjugating those who have renounced it. And yet the failure of foreign Powers formally to recognise this actual condition of things, disables those in authority from conceding that fact at home.

Again, it is known that there is a large and increasing sentiment in the United States in accordance with these views, a sentiment which has its origin in the hard teachings of the war as it has progressed.

It was believed (or so confidently affirmed) that there was a large party in the Southern States devoted to the Union, whose presence and power would be manifested there as soon as the public force of the United States was present to sustain it. I need not say how fully the experience of the war has dispelled this delusion.

Again, it was believed, and confidently relied on, that in the social structure of the Southern States there was a large population of the dominant race indifferent, if not hostile, to the basis on which that social structure rests, in which they were not interested, and who would be found the allies of those whose mission was supposed to be in some way to break it up; but the same experience has shown that the whole population of the South is united, as one people, in arms to resist the invader.

Nothing remains then on which to rest any hope of conquest but a reliance on the superior numbers and the supposed greater resources of the Northern States. I think the results of the last (or pending) campaign has proved how idle such expectations were, against the advantages of a people fighting at home, and bringing into a common stock of resistance, as a free will offering, all that they possessed, whether of blood or treasure. A spectacle now historically before the world.

It is in human experience that there must be those in the United States who cannot shut their eyes to such facts, and yet, in the despotic power now assumed there by the Government, to give expression to any doubt would be to court the hospitalities of the dungeon.

One word from the Government of her Majesty would encourage those people to speak, and the civilized world would respond to the truths they would utter, "that for whatever purpose the war was begun, it was continued now only in a vindictive and unreasoning spirit, shocking alike to humanity and civilization." That potent word would simply be to announce a fact, which a frenzied mind could only dispute, that the Southern States, now in a separate Confederacy, had established before the world its competency to maintain the Government of its adoption, and its determination to abide by it.

To withhold it would not only seem in derogation of truth, but would be to encourage the continuance of a war, hopeless in its object, ruinous alike to the parties engaged in it, and to the prosperity and welfare of Europe.

EARL RUSSELL TO MR. MASON.

Foreign Office, August 2, 1862.

Sir,—I have had the honour to receive your letters of the 24th of July and 1st inst., in which you repeat the considerations which, in the opinion of the Government of the so-called Confederate States, entitle that Government to be recognised of right as a separate and independent Power, and to be received as an equal in the great family of nations.

In again urging these views you represent, as before, that the withdrawal of certain of the Confederates from the Union of the States of North America is not to be considered as a revolution, in the ordinary acceptation of that term, far less an act of insurrection or rebellion, but as the termination of a Confederacy which had, during a long course of years, violated the terms of the Federal compact.

I beg leave to say in the outset that upon this question of a right of withdrawal, as upon that of the previous conduct of the United States, her Majesty's Government have never presumed to form a judgment. The interpretation of the Constitution of the United States, and the character of the proceedings of the President and Congress of the United States under that Constitution, must be determined, in the opinion of her Majesty's Government, by the States and people in North America who inherited, and have till recently upheld that Constitution. Her Majesty's Government decline altogether the responsibility of assuming to be judges in such a controversy.

You state that the Confederacy has a population of 12,000,000; that it has proved itself for eighteen months capable of successful defence against every attempt to subdue or destroy it; that in the judgment of the intelligence of all Europe the separation is final; and that under no possible circumstances can the late Federal Union be restored.

On the other hand, the Secretary of State of the United States has affirmed, in an official despatch, that a large portion of the once disaffected population has been restored to the Union, and now evinces its loyalty and firm adherence to the Government, that the white population now in insurrection is under 5,000,000, and that the Southern Confederacy owes its main strength to hope of assistance from Europe.

In the face of the fluctuating events of the war; the alternations of victory and defeat; the capture of New Orleans; the advance of the Federals to Corinth, to Memphis, and the banks of the Mississippi as far as Vicksburg, contrasted, on the other hand, with the failure of the attack on Charleston, and the retreat from before Richmond; placed too, between allegations so contradictory on the part of the contending Powers;—her Majesty's Government are still determined to wait.

In order to be entitled to a place among the independent nations of the earth, a State ought to have not only strength and resources for a time, but afford promise of stability and permanence. Should the Confederate States of America win that place among nations, it might be right for other nations justly to acknowledge an independence achieved by victory, and maintained by a successful resistance to all attempts to overthrow it. That time, however, has not, in the judgment of her Majesty's Government, yet arrived. Her Majesty's Government, therefore, can only hope that a peaceful termination of the present bloody and destructive contest may not be distant.

I am, &c.

MR. MASON TO EARL RUSSELL.—(Received January 3.)
24, Upper Seymour Street, Portman Square,
January , 1863.

My Lord,—In a communication which I had the honour to address to your Lordship, dated on the 7th July ultimo, I said:—

"I am instructed by a recent despatch from the Secretary of State of the Confederate States of America to bring to the attention of your Lordship what would seem to be an addition engrafted by her Majesty's Government on the principle of the law of blockade, as established by the Convention of Paris in 1856, and accepted by the Confederate States of America at the invitation of her Majesty's Government."

The "addition" to the principle of blockade referred to, is stated in my communication to have appeared in a letter from your Lordship to Lord Lyons, on the 15th of February preceding, then recently laid before Parliament.

I stated further in that communication, quoting from the instructions of the President,—

"If such be the interpretation placed by Great Britain on the Treaty of 1856, it is but just that this Government should be so officially informed."

And after pointing out the force and effect ascribed by the President to this modification of the principle of blockade, to the prejudice of the interests of the Confederate States, my communication to your Lordship proceeded as follows:—

"I have therefore the honour to request, for the information of my Government, that your Lordship will be good enough to solve the doubt entertained by the President of the Confederate States as to the construction placed by the Government of her Majesty on the text of the Convention of Paris, as accepted by the Government of the Confederate States in the terms hereinbefore cited, that is to say, whether a blockade is to be considered as effective when maintained at an enemy's port by a force sufficient to create an evident danger of entering or leaving it," and not alone where sufficient "really to prevent access."

To that communication I was honoured only by a reply from the Honourable A. H. Layard, dated at the Foreign Office on the 10th of July, informing me that he was directed by your Lordship to acknowledge its receipt; nor have I since been honoured by any communication from your Lordship furnishing an answer to the specific and important inquiry thus made under instructions from my Government.

On the 4th of August following I transmitted to the Secretary of State of the Confederate States a copy of my communication to your Lordship of the 7th of July, together with a copy of the reply of Mr. Layard; and asked for further instructions made necessary by the silence of the Foreign Office, in regard to the inquiries thus submitted.

I have now, within a few days past, received a despatch from the Secretary of State in reply to mine of the 4th of August, the tenor of which I am directed to communicate to your Lordship.

I am instructed to say that, from the papers thus submitted, it would appear to the President that the Government of her Majesty, after having invited the Government of the Confederate States to concur in the adoption of certain principles of international law, and after having obtained its assent assumed in official despatches to derogate from the principles thus adopted, to the prejudice of the interests and rights of the Confederacy; and that upon being approached, in respectful and temperate terms, with a request for explanation on a matter of such deep concern to the Confederation, that Cabinet refuses a reply.

That her Majesty's Government can have no just ground for refusing the explanation asked, because of the absence of the recognition of the independence of the Confederate States by the other nations of the world. It was not in the character of a recognised independent nation, but in that of a recognised belligerent, that the two leading Powers of Western Europe approached the Government of those States with a proposition for the adoption of certain principles of public law, at rules which shall govern the mutual relations between the people of the Confederacy as belligerents, and the nations of Europe as neutrals, during the pending war.

Two of these rules were for the special benefit of Great Britain as one of those neutral Powers. It was agreed that her flag should cover enemy's goods, and that her goods should be safe under the enemy's flag. The former of these two rules conceded to her, as a neutral, rights which she had sternly refused when herself a belligerent, with a single temporary waiver thereof in her late war with Russia. To these stipulations in her favour, the Government of the Confederate States will adhere with scrupulous fidelity. On the part of her Majesty's Government, it was agreed that no blockade should be considered binding unless "maintained by a force sufficient really to prevent access to the coast of the enemy;" and yet on the first occasion which arose for the application of this, the only stipulation that could be of practical benefit to the Confederate States during the war, her Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in an official despatch published to the world, appends a qualification which in effect destroys its whole value, and when appealed to for an explanation of this apparent breach of an existing solemn agreement between the neutral and the belligerent declines an answer.

In view of these facts, I am instructed by the President to address your Lordship, as her Majesty's Secretary for Foreign Affairs, this formal protest on the part of the Government of the Confederate States against the apparent (if not executed) purpose of her Majesty's Government to change or modify, to the prejudice of the Confederacy, the doctrine in relation to blockade to which the faith of her Majesty's Government is, by that of the Confederate States, considered to be pledged.

I am further instructed to say, that the President abstains from the present from taking any further action than by his protest thus presented; and to accompany it by the expression of his regret that such painful impressions should be produced on his mind, by so unexpected a result from the first agreement or understanding between the Government of the Confederate States and that of her Majesty.

EARL RUSSELL TO MR. MASON.

Foreign Office, February 10, 1863.

Sir,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 7th of January, referring to the letter which you addressed to me on the 7th of July last, respecting the interpretation placed by her Majesty's Government on the Declaration with regard to blockades appended to the Treaty of Paris.

I have, in the first place, to assure you that her Majesty's Government would much regret if you should feel that any want of respect was intended by the circumstance of a mere acknowledgment of your letter having hitherto been addressed to you.

With regard to the question contained in it, I have to say that her Majesty's Government see no reason to qualify the language employed in my despatch to Lord Lyons, of the 15th of February last. It appears to her Majesty's Government to be sufficiently clear that the Declaration of Paris could not be intended to mean that a port must be so blockaded as really to prevent access in all winds, and independently of whether the communication might be carried on in a dark night, or by means of small low steamers or coasting craft creeping along the shore; in short, that it was necessary that communication with a port under blockade should be utterly and absolutely impossible under any circumstances.

In further illustration of this remark, I may say there is no doubt that a blockade would be in legal existence although a sudden storm or change of wind occasionally blew off the blockading squadron. This is a change to which, in the nature of things, every blockade is liable. Such an accident does not suspend, much less break, a blockade. Whereas, on the contrary, the driving off a blockading force by a superior force does break a blockade, which must be renewed de novo, in the usual form, to be binding upon neutrals.

The Declaration of Paris was, in truth, directed against what were once termed "paper blockades;" that is, blockades not sustained by a notoriously inadequate naval force, such as the occasional appearance of a man of war in the offing, or the like.

The adequacy of the force to maintain the blockade must indeed always, to a certain extent, be one of fact and evidence; but it does not appear that in any of the numerous cases brought before the Prize Courts in America, the inadequacy of the force has been urged by those who would have been most interested in urging it against the legality of the seizure.

The interpretation, therefore, placed by her Majesty's Government on the Declaration of Paris was, that a blockade, in order to be respected by neutrals, must be practically effective. At the time I wrote my despatch to Lord Lyons, her Majesty's Government were of opinion that the blockade of the Southern ports could not be otherwise than so regarded; and, certainly, the manner in which it has since been enforced, gives to neutral Governments no excuse for asserting that the blockade has not been efficiently maintained.

It is proper to add that the same view of the meaning and effect of the Article of the Declaration of Paris on the subject of blockades, which is above explained, was taken by the Representative of the United States at the Court of St. James's (Mr. Dallas), during the communications which passed between the two Governments some years before the present war, with a view to the accession of the United States to that Declaration.

MR. MASON TO EARL RUSSELL.—(Received February 16.)
24, Upper Seymour Street, Portman Square,
February 16th, 1863.

My Lord,—I deem it incumbent on me to ask the attention of Her Majesty's Government to recent intelligence received here, in regard to the blockade at Galveston, in the State of Texas, and at Charleston, in the State of South Carolina.

First, as respects Galveston, it appears that the blockading squadron of the United States was driven off from that port and harbour, by a superior Confederate force, on the 1st day of January last; one ship of that squadron was captured, the flagship destroyed, and the rest escaped, making their way, it is said, to some point of the Southern coast occupied by the United States' forces. Whatever blockade of the port of Galveston, therefore, may have previously existed, I submit, was effectually raised and destroyed by the superior forces of the party blockaded.

Again, as respects the port of Charleston; through the ordinary channels of intelligence, we have information, uncontradicted, that the alleged blockade of that port was, in like manner, raised and destroyed, by a superior Confederate force, at a very early hour on the 31st of January ultimo; two ships of the blockading squadron having been sunk, a third escaped disabled, and what remained of the squadron afloat was entirely driven off the coast.

I have the honour to submit, therefore, that any alleged pre-existing blockade of the ports aforesaid, was terminated at Galveston the 1st day of January last, and at Charleston on the 31st of the same month; a principle clearly stated in a letter I have had the honour to receive from your Lordship, dated on the 10th instant, in the following words:—"The driving off a blockading force, by a superior force, does break a blockade, which must be renewed de novo, in the usual form, to be binding upon neutrals;"—a principle uniformly admitted by all text-writers on public law, and established by decisions of Courts of Admiralty.

I am aware that official information of either of these events may not yet have reached the Government of her Majesty, but the consequences attending the removal of the blockade (whether to be renewed or not) are so important to the commercial interests involved, that I could lose no time in asking that such measures may be taken by her Majesty's Government, in relation thereto, as will best tend to the resumption of a commercial intercourse so long placed under restraint.

I avail myself of this occasion to acknowledge the receipt of your Lordship's letter of the 10th of February instant, to which I shall have the honour of sending a reply in the course of a day or two; and am, &c.

No. 16.

MR. MASON TO EARL RUSSELL.—(Received February 18.)
24, Upper Seymour Street, Portman Square,
London, February 18, 1863.

My Lord,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 10th of February instant, in answer to mine of the 3rd of January last, but referring more especially to inquiries which I had the honour to address to your Lordship, under the instruction of the Secretary of State of the Confederate States of America, on the 7th of July last, concerning the interpretation placed by her Majesty's Government on the declaration of the principle of blockade agreed to in the Convention of Paris.

I shall, as early as practicable, communicate the letter of your Lordship to the Government at Richmond, but will anticipate here the satisfaction with which the President will receive the assurance of your Lordship that no want of respect was intended by a mere acknowledgment, without other reply, to the inquiries contained in my letter of July.

In regard to so much of the letter of your Lordship as relates to the interpretation placed by the Government of her Majesty on that part of the Declaration of Paris which prescribes the law of blockade, I am constrained to say that I am well assured the President cannot find in it a source of like satisfaction. It is considered by him that the terms used in that Convention are too precise and definite to admit of being qualified—or, perhaps, it may be more appropriate to say revoked—by the super-additions thereto contained in your Lordship's exposition of them.

The terms of that Convention are, that the blockading force must be sufficient really to prevent access to the coast. No exception is made in regard to dark nights, favourable winds, the size or model of vessels successfully evading it, or the character of the coast or waters blockaded; and yet it would seem from your Lordship's letter that all these are to be taken into consideration, on a question whether the blockade is or is not to be respected.

It is declared in that letter that—

"It appears to her Majesty's Government to be sufficiently clear that the Declaration of Paris could not have been intended to mean that a port must be so blockaded in all winds, and independently of whether the communication might be carried on of a dark night, or by means of small low steamers, or coasting craft, creeping along the shore."

As a general rule, the ports and harbours of the Confederate States are obstructed by bars, which do not admit the passage of large vessels. What might be considered a "small" or a "low" steamer, coming in from sea to the port of New York, would, at one of those Southern ports, be rated a vessel of very fair size when referred to the ordinary stage of water on its bar; yet I look in vain in the terms of the Convention referred to, for any authority to expound them in subordination to the depth of water, or the size or mould of vessels finding ready and comparatively safe access to the harbour.

In acceding to the terms of that Treaty, great advantages are yielded to a maritime neutral, with like immunities to a maritime belligerent. The property of the neutral is safe under the flag of the belligerent, and the property of the belligerent equally as safe under the flag of the neutral. The only equivalent to the belligerent, not maritime, but dependent on other nations as carriers, is this strictly-defined principle of the law of blockade, which the Confederate States presumed was extended to them, when, at the request of Her Majesty's Government, they became parties to those stipulations of the Convention of Paris of 1856. It results that, after yielding full equivalents, the stipulation in regard to the blockade, reserved as the only one beneficial to them, would seem illusory.

In regard to the character of this blockade, to which your Lordship again adverts in the remark that the manner in which it has been enforced gives neutral Governments no excuse for asserting that it has not been efficiently maintained, although I have not been instructed to make any further representations to her Majesty's Government on that subject since its decision to treat it as effective, I cannot refrain from adding, that for many months past the frequent arrival and departure of vessels (most of them steamers) from several of those ports have been matters of notoriety. A single steamer has evaded the blockade successfully, and most generally from Charleston, more than thirty times. And within a few days past it has been brought to my knowledge that two steamers arrived in January last, and within ten days of each other, at Wilmington (North Carolina) from ports in Europe, one of 400 and the other of 500 tons burthen, both of which have since sailed from Wilmington, and arrived with their cargoes at foreign ports. I cite these only as the latest authenticated instances. And as another remarkable fact, it is officially reported by the Collector at Charleston, that the revenue accruing at that port from duties on imported merchandise during the past year, under the blockade, was more than double the receipts of any one year previous to the separation of the States; and this although the duties under the Confederate Government are much lower than those exacted by the United States.

As regards other portions of your Lordship's letter, I may freely admit, as it is there stated, that a blockade would be in legal existence although a sudden storm or change of wind might occasionally blow off the blockading squadron. Yet, with entire respect, I do not see how such principle affects the question of the efficiency of such blockade whilst the squadron is on the coast. And again, whilst I am not informed whether or no a defence resting on the inadequacy of the blockading force has been urged in cases of capture before the Prize Courts in America, I can well see how futile such defence would be when presented on behalf of a neutral ship, whose Government had not only not objected to, but had admitted, the sufficiency of the blockade.

Sir,—With reference to my letter of the 16th instant acknowledging the receipt of your letter of that day, calling attention to the accounts which had reached this country tending to show that the blockading of the ports of Galveston and Charleston had been put an end to by the action of the Confederate naval forces, I have the honour now to state to you that the information which her Majesty's Government have derived from your letter and from the public journals on this subject is not sufficiently accurate to admit of their forming an opinion, and they will accordingly, by the first opportunity, instruct Lord Lyons to report fully on the matter.

Sir,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your further letter of the 18th instant on the subject of the interpretation placed by her Majesty's Government on the declaration of the principle of blockade made in 1856 by the Conference at Paris.

I have already, in my previous letters, fully explained to you the views of Her Majesty's Government on this matter; and I have nothing further to add in reply to your last letter, except to observe that I have not intended to state that any number of vessels of a certain build or tonnage might be left at liberty freely to enter a blockaded port without violating the blockade, but that the occasional escape of small vessels on dark nights, or under other particular circumstances, from the vigilance of a competent blockading fleet, did not evince that laxity in the belligerent which enured, according to international law, to the raising of a blockade.

Foreign Correspondence.

PARIS, March 17.

The past week has been an odd jumble of war panics, bourse canards, masquerading, election gossip, court festivities, and influenza. The misgivings of the public that we may be slowly but surely drifting towards a war, has been rather strengthened than otherwise by the publication of sundry despatches in the Moniteur about Poland. The most important of those despatches is that of M. Drouyn de Lhuys to the French Ambassador at St. Petersburg, in which his Excellency states, as clearly as a diplomatist can, that, though professedly unwilling to go to war on behalf of Poland, France may be compelled to do so by the "pressure of public opinion."

It is unquestionably true that the feeling in favour of the Poles is unanimous; all the papers write on the subject with great vigour; but as for going to war, I believe that the middle classes generally would rather see Poland at the bottom of the Atlantic, than assent to another crusade on behalf of "nationalities."

Theodore Hooke used to sneer at what he called the "right of the Poles to stick up for themselves," sacrificing truth to smartness. It must be conceded that the atrocities of the Russian rule have made it unendurable. At all events, France and Europe wish to obtain for the Poles, that they should no longer be exposed to the knout, to wholesale transportation to Siberia, to murder, rapine, and all the abuses of misgovernment, by which their barbarous conquerors strive to establish their rule over their more civilized victims. It is premature to say that this may not yet be effected by diplomacy; and whether France will go to war in spite of Europe to enforce the wishes of Europe, is too complicated a question to offer an opinion upon at its present stage. All that is necessary for the present, is to take note that M. Drouyn de Lhuys has represented it as a possibility, and that the Senate commences a debate on the subject this day, in the course of which the views of the Government will probably be fully stated by M. Billault.

Concerning the elections, the representatives of the Bourgeoisie, whom the London weekly organ of rabid democracy stigmatizes as "Orleanists," have determined no longer to hold aloof, and boldly to descend into the electoral arena, and take the oath imposed on all candidates of "fidelity to the Emperor and obedience to the Constitution." Their resolution seems to have thrown the Constitutionnel, Pays, Nation, and other semi-official prints into convulsions. These papers openly charge men like the Duke de Broglie, Guizot, Thiers, Montalembert, with meditating deliberate perjury, and dwell with an emphasis, which is not without piquancy, on the enormity of breaking a political oath. Considering that both the Emperor and M. de Persigny have invited this movement by pronouncing the constitution capable of improvement, and appealing to all men of enlightenment and good faith to aid in the task of reform, the impertinence of these small scribblers is not worthy a moment's serious attention. So far as Orleanism is concerned, its interests would be better served by the present regime being made more stringent. Every liberal concession that the Emperor may grant, whatever additional guarantee may be given to the freedom of the subject, every sacrifice of arbitrary power by the Government consolidates the dynasty, and deals a deadly blow against les anciens parties.

The little Prince Imperial has just completed his seventh year, and there have been great rejoicings at the Tuileries in consequence. A certain number of small boys are attached to every regiment in the service, attired in uniform and regularly drilled. They are mostly orphans—the sons of old soldiers fallen in action, or of non-commissioned officers, or officers in the regiment themselves. A couple of battalions of these young soldiers were mustered in the court-yard of the Tuileries, armed with miniature muskets, provided with miniature knapsacks, and looking for all the world like a Lilliputian army. They went through the manual exercise, marching, &c., and acquitted themselves to perfection. The little Prince did duty as sergeant, and appeared to understand his duty perfectly well. From the ease with which he discharged, loaded, and primed his musket, it is evident that every pains have been taken to "teach his young idea how to shoot." Last night the Prince and all his youthful comrades went to the Cirque to see a military pantomime, purporting to represent the Battle of Marengo, and had a rich treat of gunpowder, dancing and cakes after the play.

You will have heard with regret of the accident to Miss Slidell. Your readers will be happy to learn that all danger is considered at an end.

The English here are in a state of intense disgust at the apathy of the Embassy in taking no steps to celebrate the marriage of the Prince of Wales. The Ambassador was absent it is true, but he left a chargé d'affaires behind him, and a very little expense would have prevented the English colony in Paris cutting such a very sorry figure by the side of their countrymen in every second-rate continental town.

THE CONFEDERATE LOAN.

THE prospectus was issued on Wednesday afternoon, for the Seven per cent. Loan of the Confederate States. The total amount to be distributed in London, Liverpool, Paris, Amsterdam, and Frankfort is £3,000,000, and the price is fixed at 90. The dividends are to be paid in sterling on the 1st of March and 1st of September, and the principal, unless the bonds are given up in exchange for cotton, is to be paid off in sterling at par in twenty years by half-yearly drawings, commencing in March next year. The holders of the bonds may at any time, on sixty days' notice, have them exchanged for cotton, at the rate of 6d. per lb., which is equal to about 5½d., allowing for the fact of the £100 bond having been issued at 90, in instalments extending to the 15th of October, with 7 per cent. discount for prepayment. If the cotton be demanded while war still prevails, it will be delivered in the interior within ten miles of a railway, or stream navigable to the ocean, and the parties must take the risk of getting it through the blockade. If it be not demanded until peace shall have been established, it will be delivered free of all charges at the ports of Charleston, Savannah, Mobile, or New Orleans. The contractors for the loan are Messrs. Emile Erlanger and Co., of Paris, and the several agents are Messrs. J. H. Schröder and Co., London; Messrs. Fraser, Trenholm, and Co., Liverpool; Messrs. B. H. Schröder and Co., Amsterdam; and Mr. Raphael Erlanger, Frankfort. Transactions immediately took place at 2½ to 3 premium.

PROGRESS OF DESPOTISM IN THE NORTH.

The week will be a memorable one in the annals of America. It has sealed the doom of the liberties of the North, unless there shall occur in due time a counter-revolution to restore a Constitutional Government. Three extreme measures have been passed which were intended to make Mr. Lincoln dictator, and have accomplished their purpose. By the first he is authorized to suspend the operation of the law of Habeas corpus whenever he shall deem fit, expedient, or necessary. He or his secretaries may cause to be imprisoned and kept in prison, without trial, for an indefinite length of time, any person, high or low, in any of the States of the Union. He may order a military force to seize the Governor of New York or Connecticut, or any other sovereign commonwealth. He may arrest and hold in Forts La Fayette, Warren, or McHenry, the members of any Legislature whose proceedings he may adjudge to be treasonable or dangerous. He may seize a judge upon the judgment-seat, and carry him off to prison, as his secretaries did Judge Carmichael, of Maryland, and hold him there as a common malefactor, without specifying the offence committed. He may silence any tongue, or pen, or printing press in the country, and no judge or jury shall question the legality of his act. It is true that the Secretary of State and the Secretary of War "are directed to furnish to the judges, as soon as may be practicable, the names of the persons arrested, that they may be presented to the grand jury for indictment;" but the President and his secretaries are alone to decide on the "practicability" of such a step; and, if they are of opinion that it is unwise or unsafe to liberate or bring to trial any such prisoners during the two remaining years of the Presidential term, there is nothing in the act of Congress to compel them to make an earlier decision. This proviso, therefore, counts for nothing. And in order that the President may have the power to carry this gigantic tyranny into effect, and become de facto the strongest despot in the world, Congress has passed a Conscription Act, which calls out, at the discretion of the President, as to numbers, the whole able-bodied male population of the country between the ages of eighteen and forty-five. The first call of 600,000 men is to be made, with what success will not be known until after the 10th of July, when the Act comes into operation. The Democratic party was powerless to defeat the measure. It was so obviously necessary that the Government should have the means of recruiting its fast-disappearing armies, which, in two months, will be reduced to one-half of their actual strength by the expiry of the term of service of the two years and nine months volunteers, that any real opposition would have been considered factions. The Democrats, therefore, made up their minds to accept the measure and propose two important, though not essential, amendments. The framer of the Bill had, in a parenthetical proviso, given power to the Provost-Marshal to arrest "all persons suspected of treasonable practices." In order that there might be no mistake, Messrs. Vallandigham, Vocees, Cox, and other Democrats, supported the omission of the words and the restriction of the powers of the Provost-Marshal to the conscripts to be enrolled under the Act. After a spirited debate, in which the galleries for the first time during the session applauded a Democratic speaker for asserting the liberties of his country against the encroachments of irresponsible military power, the amendment was carried. Another amendment, to insert the word "white" before the words "male able-bodied citizens" was rejected; so that under the New Conscrip Law the negroes will be liable to serve side by side with the white race in the future armies of the Republic. Should this lead to difficulty the President has the remedy in his own hands, and has simply to order the enrolment officers not to call upon the negroes for military duty, to obviate the danger of mutiny among the whites that might otherwise result. There needed but one other measure to complete the charmed circle of Imperialism, and that was provided by the Currency and Banking Acts of Mr. Secretary Chase, which, after a series of amendments and reconsideration in both Houses, and a Committee of Conference of the two, have been finally passed. In one way or the other, by loan, and by the issue of greenbacks, the Government is authorised to issue about $1,100,000,000, a sum that, before the rise in gold, would have represented about £220,000,000 sterling; but that, with gold at 72 per cent. premium, only represents about £137,000,000. Mr. Chase has also carried his favourite projects of taxing the existing banks upon their circulation, and of introducing a uniform Federal currency of greenbacks that are not to be taxed. These are stupendous measures. The three form a perfect unity, solid, substantial, and artistically dovetailed one into the other. Were Mr. Lincoln a man of genius, a great soldier, an astute and far-seeing diplomatist, or an ambitious and designing intriguer, having the will to make himself King, Emperor, Czar, hereditary President, Lord Protector, or anything else, they would afford him the means of putting a speedy and ignominious end to the Republic. But these powers have not been given to him for such purposes. The Republican party know their man, and think that they can trust him. Neither have they been conferred upon him in order that he may more effectually carry on the war for the subjugation of the South. He is no more the man for that purpose than he is the man of whom to make an Emperor. In this respect, too, the Republicans know him, and have taken the measure of his capacity. The restoration of the Union is felt to be impossible, not only by the President, but by every prominent man in public life. Both the Union and the Constitution upon which it was founded are defunct. The Southern Congress destroyed the Union; the Northern Congress has destroyed the Constitution. The revolution has completed its first cycle. North and South are two for evermore, and are as incapable for the future of being united under one government as England and France or Ireland and Italy. These stringent measures have a more logical foundation than any baseless hope of the re-annexation of the South. They are intended for the subjugation and the consolidation of the North. The danger has long been appreciated in all its magnitude by the reason as well as by the instinct of the Northern people, and the process of disintegration would not stop with Southern independence, but would extend to the North and West, and if the principles of Secession were once admitted for any part of the late Union, it could not be successfully resisted for any other. Hence the President has been invested with these extraordinary powers in order that he may nip in the bud any attempt on the part of the Western or Middle States either to throw in their fortunes with those of the South, or to set up for themselves. It is not the South that troubles the sleep of the magnates of Washington, but the West. The symptoms are in the highest degree alarming. The President's own State of Illinois is a hotbed of disaffection. Indiana is no better. Ohio is dissatisfied. Missouri is only held down by the sword. In fact, there is imminent danger throughout the whole of the more fertile regions of the West of an organised outbreak against the Government of Washington. To confront that danger, and not to meet the armies of Mr. Jefferson Davis, is the real object of the Conscription Act and its kindred and correlative measures. In this intention the Government is right to defend itself. It has been constantly said that the life of the nation was at stake in its contest with the South. If the North is ever to become a nation—one in purpose, in interest, in sympathy, and in destiny—now is the time to prevent the centrifugal action of the discordant and dissentient States, and a dissolution of the whole body politic. The North passionately desires to live as a nation. On this point there can be no mistake. The people are not ordinarily very serious or very earnest about anything, but the veneration for the flag amounts to a fanaticism, and their ambition to be the greatest naval and military Power in the world is so huge as to deprive them, when under its influence, of all the reason that usually governs their actions. Under this paramount impulse it tolerates the extreme powers that are vested in the President, and that it would not have vested in an abler and more ambitious man, and blinds itself to the danger—palpable to every calm observer—that the liberties which it so patiently and hopefully resigns may never again be recovered without a series of violent convulsions—anarchies, despotisms—that are awful to imagine as the destiny of a race so intelligent and so worthy of freedom.—Times' New York Correspondent.

A STRANGE CAREER.—A few days since, the death was announced of Mr. John Gully, at the age of eighty years. The deceased gentleman commenced life as a butcher, but soon turned his attention to pugilism, and gained some reputation in the ring, which, fifty years ago, was esteemed somewhat higher than it is at present. After beating several of the best men of his day, and bearing a vast amount of punishment with exemplary fortitude, he refused any further fictitious encounters, and became a book-maker and horse-trainer. His success, induced by his shrewdness, and, above all, by his honourable dealing, enabled him to invest largely in valuable horse-flesh, and to purchase a small estate. Then came the strangest phase of all. The ex-butcher, pugilist, horse-trainer, and betting man, became a member of the British House of Commons, and though it is no compliment to him to say he did not disgrace his antecedents, which were certainly none of the most hopeful for a legislator, it is much to his credit that in an assembly of gentlemen he had many friends and no enemies. Upon retiring from parliamentary life, he devoted his time to the care of his property, but to the last taking an interest in sporting matters. He was a remarkable instance of how strong common sense and sterling honesty will, in this aristocratic country, enable a man to rise to an independent position from the lowest ranks of life.

AN EX-CONVICT AT ST. JAMES'S.—Accidents will happen, notwithstanding the most precise regulations. At the late levee held by the Prince of Wales on behalf of her Majesty, a Mr. Samuel Tillet, who had taken an active part in the Australian department of the International Exhibition of 1862, was presented by the Duke of Wellington. A few days afterwards the presentation was cancelled by an announcement in the London Gazette. Mr. Tillet, it transpired, was about ten years ago convicted of fraud and swindling, and sentenced to seven years' penal servitude by Chief Baron Pollock. He was released on a ticket-of-leave before he had completed his term of imprisonment. That he should have been able to get presented at Court is hardly so surprising, as that for the sake of that honour he should incur the almost certain risk of exposure.

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

AMERICA.

Not only are the Federals determined to whip the South, and the nations of Europe, but they intend to whip creation itself. The New York Herald of March 11, in the edition specially prepared for this benighted continent, favours its readers with an illustration of "The Great Union River," that is to be formed by the genius of Yankeedom. The magnificent enterprise is announced with a tremendous flourish of sensation headings. What can be more imposing than such declarations as "Xerxes, Cyrus, Julius Cæsar, Hannibal; Alexander, and Napoleon, to be outdone!"—"The natural course of great rivers to be changed!"—"The Father of Waters to be set aside, and another river—the great Union river—opened to the Gulf of Mexico!" Let us be thankful the Federals have not determined to submerge Great Britain in the Atlantic, or to suspend the law of gravity. The Great Union River is nearly as exciting as the nuptials of Tom Thumb, and it may answer the purpose of keeping people from thinking of the difficulties that threaten every moment to engulf them in national ruin. The most curious phase in this scheme is that the North triumphs as though it were accomplished. After the sensation headings we have quoted, the New York Herald gives some details of the enterprise. It exultingly exclaims, "Napoleon, in his maxims, recommends the using of streams as a means of either offence or defence, but there is no record of his turning a river for hundreds of miles from its natural bed." At present, however, the fame of Napoleon is not eclipsed, for until now even the little ditch which was to leave Vicksburg high and dry, is a failure.

We have this week more than the usual supply of war rumours. Three several stories have been told about General Van Dorn. There is an irrepressible feeling of uneasiness caused by that General's victory at Springfield on the 5th of March. As we suggested in our last number, the Confederate triumph was complete. Three Federal regiments were cut to pieces or captured, only the cavalry escaped, and the artillery and stores fell into the hands of the victors. To quiet the public mind, it was reported that General Van Dorn's forces had retreated South; then that a battle was imminent at Spring Hill; and lastly that the Confederates had been defeated with heavy loss. It is evident that the Federal authorities know nothing of the movements of General Van Dorn since the 5th, or, for reasons of their own, keep their knowledge a secret.

There is a rumour that a battle has been fought on the Yazoo River, in which the Federals captured seven thousand Confederates, together with Yazoo City and some Confederate transports. The New York press credits this report, because it is pleasant to do so, and we are not in a position to deny it. Then there is a rumour that the Confederates have captured Forts Donelson and Henry, but the New York press does not generally credit it because it is unpleasant to do so, and we are not in a position to affirm it. There is a further rumour that an engagement was progressing at Port Hudson, and this was admitted to be doubtful because the result was not indicated. Perhaps these rumours, though that about the Yazoo expedition is pertinaciously repeated in every telegram, may be nearly as devoid of foundation as that which notified the destruction of the Florida, and in reference to which we are now told, "The wreck seen off Havannah was not that of the Florida, as supposed." It may seem curious that such a mistake could arise, since it would be easy to tell whether the wrecked ship was or was not the Florida; but the mystery is explained in the Havannah correspondence of the Northern associated press. The captain of the American schooner Ocean Herald, who saw the wreck, also described something to the windward of her, and fearing the Confederates, did not approach her. So, as the captain was afraid to use his eyes, he had recourse to his imagination.

But we have a few war facts as well as war rumours. On the 3rd inst., the Federal fleet bombarded Fort M'Alister, and the attack lasted twenty hours, when the Federals retired. The result of the engagement, according to the Yankee accounts, is gratifying to both the belligerents—the Confederate fort was not taken, and the Federals were not hurt. The Federal vessels were struck several times, "but not injured," yet the game is considered so unpleasant or so hopeless that the attack is not to be renewed. Why do Federal Monitors retreat before they are hurt? In the case of the Montauk the turret was injured, and possibly some such explanation may hereafter be given of the withdrawal from before Fort M'Alister.

On the 9th inst., the Confederate cavalry passed the Federal lines, appeared at Fairfax Court House, and captured General Stoughton, his guard, baggage and 110 horses. Amongst the booty was the Federal order book, and from this the Confederates learnt the counter-sign, and so repassed the Federal outposts at Centreville without opposition. When the Confederates were at a safe distance, Federal cavalry were sent in pursuit. On the 11th General Hooker was at Washington, holding a conference with the Cabinet; and no doubt the above incident afforded President Lincoln an admirable opportunity for telling funny anecdotes, and cracking west county jokes. It is provocative of mirth for the Confederates to capture a Federal general within his lines, and to use the Federal countersign to carry him off.

As a compensation for this affair, the indefatigable Northern reporters assert that expeditions from the Army of the Potomac "have visited all the ferries on the Rappahannock, eighty miles below the Federal lines, broken up numerous smuggling nests, and captured a quantity of contraband stores." This kind of amateur police work just now suits the Army of the Potomac better than fighting the Confederates.

It is also reported by the New York papers that on the 7th the Federal cavalry attacked the Confederates at Unionville, ten miles from Murfreesboro, Tennessee, capturing their camp equipage and a number of prisoners.

The condition of the Federal army before Vicksburg is nearly as forlorn as that of the Army of the Potomac. It is reduced, if not demoralized, by sickness. An official report states that nearly every tent is an hospital, that on the 26th of February there were 12,000 sick, of whom numbers were dying daily, and that there were not more than 20,000 men fit for duty. Every day disease was spreading, and the rate of mortality increasing. What else could have been expected from encamping an army on swampy ground? The Federals, besides putting aside the Mississippi and changing the course of great rivers, should change the climate of the South, so as to make it more salubrious to Northern soldiers.

The Federal Commodore Porter has done something at last. He has not captured a fortified town, or gained a naval victory, but he has issued a proclamation. He notifies that all parties caught firing upon unarmed vessels, burning cotton, or levying contributions, shall be hanged. But the Southerners will continue to burn their cotton whenever there is a chance of its falling into the hands of the Northern invader. Commodore Porter is not quite so dashing as Mr. Lincoln in his threats, for he does not propose to hang "all parties" before they are caught.

It is reported that there has been a great rise in the Cold Water River, from cutting the levels on the Mississippi, and that Federal gunboats were able to pass over it in spite of the obstructions placed in its bed by the Confederates.

The capture of the steamer Peterhoff from London, to Matamoras, off St. Thomas, is announced, and a private letter from St. Thomas gives us some interesting particulars of the affair. Our correspondent says, the Federals have four vessels in port, and that they make use of the harbour as a rendezvous, coming in and going out as they please. They do not care for the Danish authorities, and there is not an English steamer at that station to keep them in order. When the telegraph signals a steamer off the port the Federals go out, overhauled her, and then return. The Peterhoff put in for coal, but before doing so she had been boarded and overhauled. Having coaled, the Peterhoff, at noon, on the 26th of February, put to sea. Our correspondent says, "Just as she left the Vanderbilt steamed after her, boarded her a short distance off, and sent a prize crew on board. Opinions are divided as to what was done to her. Some say that she was sent to Key West or New York, while others maintain that the crew of nineteen men and one officer were put on board to see that she did really go to Matamoras—this last supposition is simply absurd, and my idea is that she is regularly captured. Her voyage is a bond fide legitimate one, there being no intention of running the blockade. There is a report in town derived from good authority, that Admiral Wilkes, finding he had gone too far in the capture of the Peterhoff, has gone to Key West, in Vanderbilt, to release her, either before she gets to Key West, or else on her arrival there. The Vanderbilt has certainly left with Wilkes on board." The Peterhoff had a British mail on board. Comment on this proceeding is needless. The affair is to be submitted to-morrow to Lord Russell. We shall see whether his lordship's "liberal construction" of the law of nations, when the Federals are concerned, will sanction this outrage. On the 9th inst., another British steamer, the Douro, was captured off Cape Fear, by the Federal gunboat Quaker City. It is easier and safer capturing British merchantmen than looking after Confederate cruisers. The British steamer, Queen of the Wave, has run aground at Charleston.

President Davis has set apart, to-morrow, the 27th of March, to be observed in the Confederate States as a day of fasting, humiliation, and prayer. The following is the President's proclamation:—

It is meet that, as people who acknowledge the supremacy of the living God, we should be ever mindful of our dependence on Him, and should remember that to Him alone can we trust our deliverance, that to Him is due the devout thankfulness for signal mercies bestowed on us, and that by prayer alone can we hope to receive continued manifestation of that protecting care which has hitherto shielded us in the midst of trials and dangers. In obedience to this precept we have from time to time been gathered together with prayers and thanksgiving, and He has been graciously pleased to hear our supplications, and to grant abundant exhibitions of His favour to our arms and our people.

Through many conflicts we have now attained a place among nations which commands their respect; and let the enemies who encompass us around and seek our destruction see that the Lord of Hosts has again taught them the lesson of his inspired word, "that the battle is not to the strong," but to whomsoever he willeth to exalt. Again an enemy, with loud boasting of power, of their armed men and mailed ships, threaten us with subjugation, and with evil machinations seek, even in our homes and at our own firesides, to pervert our men servants and our maid servants into accomplices of their wicked designs.

Under these circumstances it is my privilege to invite you once more to meet together and prostrate yourselves in humble supplication to Him who has been our constant and never failing support in the past, and to whose protection and guidance we trust for the future. To this end, I, Jefferson Davis, President of the Confederate States of America, do issue this my proclamation, setting apart Friday the 27th day of March, as a day of fasting, humiliation, and prayer.

I do also invite the people of the said States to repair on that day to their usual places of public worship, there to join in prayer to Almighty God that He will continue his merciful protection over our cause; that He will scatter our enemies and set at naught their evil designs, and that He will graciously restore to our beloved country the blessings of peace and security.

In faith whereof I have hereunto set my hand, at the city of Richmond, on the 27th day of February, in the year of our Lord 1863.

JEFFERSON DAVIS.

By the President—J. P. BENJAMIN, Secretary of State.

President Lincoln has signed the Bill authorising the issue of Letters of Marque, but whether he will act upon it, at least for the present, is not certain. The Republican faction and that wise body the New York Chamber of Commerce requests him to put it in force immediately, whilst not a few urge him not to pursue a course that is likely to involve a foreign war in addition to the one already on hand. Mr. Lincoln is in a critical position. His despotic power over the lives, liberties, and fortunes of the United States is not to be a dead letter. He is forthwith to assert his authority and put forth his strength, and if he fails he is to be punished. Already the New York Herald threatens him with imprisonment. This journal says (March 11th):—

The verdict of the people will be so overwhelming against him, with the repetition this year of anything like the military blunders, disappointments and disasters of last year, that Congress will be compelled to respond to the public judgment of the country. The House of Representatives, from the pressure of public opinion, will be constrained to institute articles of impeachment against him, and the Senate, though controlled by a majority of his own party, will not be able to refuse a trial or to resist a judgment of "inability" on the part of the President "to discharge the powers and duties of his office." In the event of such a judgment, the duties of his office "will devolve upon the Vice President," and Mr. Hamlin has the reputation of a man of great experience in public life, and of more than ordinary administrative ability.

The German Working Men's Association of Chicago protest against the $300 charged in the Conscription Bill, and remind Mr. Lincoln that he was elected by the working men, and he must give wealth no privilege over labour.

Mr. Lincoln has issued a proclamation ordering all soldiers "enlisted or drafted," and now absent from their regiments without leave, to return by the 1st of April. If they do so they are not to be punished, except by loss of pay; if they do not obey the edict they are to be treated as deserters. Some of the drafted deserters cannot very well return to their regiments, because they have never joined them. Mr. Lincoln has not much faith in the efficacy of his order, for he refers to "evil disposed and disloyal persons," who have "enticed and provoked soldiers to desert and absent themselves from their regiments," and he calls upon "patriotic and faithful citizens" to resist "such dangerous and treasonous crimes." This is incidentally a remarkable official confession of Northern disunity.

A private letter from New Orleans, written by a highly respected and well-known gentleman, enables us to give a full account of the Secession Demonstration that lately took place in that city. A cartel steamer was about leaving with 382 exchanged Confederate prisoners. No notice was given to the public through the papers, but the people at large got wind of it, and at least 20,000 persons, mostly ladies, congregated on the Levee to see them off and bid them God speed. It so annoyed the Federal authorities that they ordered out four full companies of cavalry and artillery, with orders to disperse the crowd. A Federal captain got up on a barrel and announced that he would arrest and send to the Custom House the first woman who waved a handkerchief—in an instant at least a thousand handkerchiefs were waving in the air, accompanied with shouts of "God bless the Confederate boys, God bless the Confederate boys." The Yankee officer concluded there was too much unanimity in the crowd to carry out his threat, and got down and walked off. Nothing has occurred since the capture of the city which has been so annoying to the Federals as this affair, and they took a paltry revenge.

Between 300 and 400 ladies with children, and perhaps a dozen gentlemen, had gone on board the Laurie Hill steamer, lying convenient to the cartel steamer, and therefore a good position to see what was going on; both steamers lay in front of Admiral Farragut's flag-ship, which was anchored in the stream. Of course there was a good deal of waving of handkerchiefs on the part of the ladies on the Laurie Hill. This boat had steam up for the purpose of going down the river some fifteen miles to coal, and Admiral Farragut sent word to her captain to start without giving any warning, and she actually did start, taking all the ladies and children with her, and kept them prisoners on board until 12 o'clock the next day, when she returned to the Levee. That the act was premeditated is known from the fact that a file of soldiers, armed, was sent on board a few minutes before the lines were cast off. The anxiety in the city during their absence was immense. Admiral Farragut is bold enough when his enemies are defenceless women and children.

Messrs. Vallandigham and Pendleton, of Ohio, have made addresses to the Democratic Association, in which they advocate a restoration of the Union, but protest that it cannot be restored by war. Mr. Seymour, the Democratic candidate for the governorship of Connecticut, has made a similar declaration.

The property of the Hon. John Slidell, in New Orleans, is to be, or probably by this time has been, confiscated. The local papers thus refer to the matter:—

The first case that has come up in this city regularly under the confiscation act was brought before the provisional court yesterday by Mr. Lamont, the vigilant prosecuting attorney, who filed an information against John Slidell for the seizure of his property, and calling for its confiscation under the act of Congress declaring the property of rebels forfeited to the Government. The information, after setting forth the authority on which it is based, to wit, the acts of Congress, and that John Slidell is at present in rebellion against the Government and in the service of the so-called Confederate States as minister or commissioner to France, proceeds to denounce his property as forfeited and subject to confiscation for the support of the army engaged in putting down the rebellion, and asks for its seizure and sale, after due proceedings, according to law.

The negroes are a source of continued trouble to the North. Officers refuse to command them, soldiers refuse to serve in the same armies, and the Legislatures are called upon to devise measures to keep the black race out of the States. The anti-negro riots at Detroit were serious. A negro charged with an outrage on a white girl was being taken to prison by some soldiers, when the citizens interfered, for the purpose of enacting summary vengeance on the accused. The soldiers defended their prisoner, and a riot ensued. Many—at least ten or fifteen—innocent coloured persons, were murdered; thirty-two negro houses were burnt or otherwise destroyed, and 200 people rendered homeless. Well may the poor negro in the North long to be in Dixie.

We learn from the New York telegrams that resolutions have been introduced into the Confederate Congress to inquire into the expediency of repealing the resolution declaring that a neutral flag covers enemy's goods, with the exception of contraband of war.

Amongst the miscellaneous news is the confirmation of the appointment of Mr. Cassius M. Clay as Minister to Russia, an appointment which is not particularly complimentary to the Imperial friend of the North. A collision between the military and the citizens at Utah is considered imminent. Brigham Young has been arrested under the Polygamy Act, but was released on giving bond to appear for trial. Has it just been discovered that Brigham Young has from fifty to a hundred wives?

The Provost-Marshal of Baltimore not only fears the face of an enemy, but even a likeness thereof. He has forbidden the sale of photographic portraits of distinguished Confederates. He has also ordered the seizure of secession music. Unless his spies are active, or, probably, in spite of their activity, the young ladies of Baltimore are likely to continue to sing secession songs.

General Hunter and the officers of General Forster's command are still at enmity. The chief of General Forster's staff has been ordered North.

In New York the price of gold is subject to violent fluctuations. On the 7th gold was at 52½; on the 10th at 63; on the 13th at 59½; and on the 14th, it is said under the influence of a report that, "Mr. Chase had received an offer from Europe for $100,000,000, 84 per cent. bonds, at a higher rate than par," the price receded to 57½. On the 14th, Mr. Chase was in New York, trying to negotiate a loan for $100,000,000, $50,000,000, in twenty years' bonds, and $50,000,000 in Short bonds.

ENGLAND.

Lancashire still shows an increase of pauperism in some districts, and a decrease in others; the latter predominating. Last week the net diminution in the number of dependants on the rates was about 2,450. There is, however, reason to fear that this does not represent a bona fide diminution of the distress, but rather the dispersal of the sufferers. This is in itself a misfortune. If we are to expect that, on the return of peace, cotton will be forthcoming in adequate quantities to furnish work for all who have hitherto been employed, then the best thing we can do is to provide temporarily for their subsistence; knowing that their value as spinners and weavers in a cotton factory is twice as great as ever will be their value in any other capacity. If on the contrary, we are to expect that for many years to come we shall not have more than two-thirds or three-fourths of an average supply, what we have to do is, in the most efficient, cheap, and satisfactory manner to provide the sufferers with employment and homes elsewhere. If the distress is to be permanent, judiciously-organised emigration is the only possible remedy.

The town of Stalybridge has been the scene of a riot, disgraceful alike to the people and to the magistrates. The Relief Committee had determined to adopt a course very wisely and generally pursued in other towns, and grant alms (at the rate of 3s. a head) in tickets instead of money. They also proposed to pay late, or as the phrase is, to keep a day's money in hand. This intention was communicated to the scholars, chiefly adults, in the different schools established during the distress, and gave rise to wild excitement among the recipients of the public charity. The tickets can only be exchanged for food, fuel, and clothing; they cannot be used to procure drink; and this is the grievance of the multitude, while the few respectable artisans who object to tickets do so on the mistaken ground that a suspicion of their character is implied by the distribution of relief in such a form. The supposed author of the obnoxious proposal was assailed with showers of stones as he passed through the streets in a cab on Friday afternoon; and later in the evening his house was assailed by a mob, which smashed the windows and destroyed a great deal of valuable furniture. The police were helpless, having once come into collision with the rabble, and been severely beaten. The mob were masters of the town for some hours, during which they destroyed some shops, and plundered the stores of clothing kept by the Relief Committee for distribution. The factory girls, especially the Irish, were active in encouraging the work of destruction and robbery; indeed, we suspect that the latter feature in the riot may be held to stamp its authors and ringleaders as Irishmen or professional agitators. An English mob seldom or never steals. The Stalybridge mob, however, continued its depredations till it was checked by the appearance of a troop of the 14th Hussars, summoned from Ashton. These rode through the streets, waving their swords, but doing no harm; and the rabble dispersed before them. An English mob is the most cowardly assemblage in the world. Any individual in it is probably as brave as a citizen of any foreign country; but the mass of ten thousand such individuals will break and fly before fifty dragoons. Conscience makes cowards of them; they know that they are breaking the law and committing an outrage against right, and they are cowed at once by the appearance of a force which, if resisted, would certainly be beaten. A large quantity of stolen clothing was recovered, and the culprits were in many cases arrested, but a good deal was destroyed. About sixty arrests were made; and the next day twenty-nine of the principal culprits were sent to Chester, to take their trial at the next assizes for riot. This we conceive to be a mistake. They will get off too easily, and the effect of their punishment on the people will not be wholesome. All found in possession of stolen goods should have been indicted as robbers, and if convicted should be punished for robbery, the minor offence of riot being merged in this more heinous crime. The accomplices of the committed criminals made attempts to rescue their comrades, and stoned the police; but they were cowed by the presence of the military escort. Some further outrages were committed on Saturday. But in the afternoon of that day a larger body of soldiers arrived, and they kept the mob in terror, and preserved the peace. It is a great pity that the silly tenderness of English authorities prevents the military from effectually checking the outrages of the mob. It would be far better that rioters and plunderers should be shot, than that honest men should be mauled, stoned, and robbed. The consequences of lenity have been visible in the continuance of disorders and in the audacity of the rioters, large numbers of whom have marched to Ashton and other neighbouring towns, endeavouring to excite disturbances there. There is no need to dwell on the wickedness and ingratitude of these proceedings, as directed against the benefactors and fellow-sufferers of the offenders. But in justice to the latter it must be said that in no other country would eighteen months of misery and dependance have been patiently endured by half a million of people, fully aware that it was in the power of their Government to give them work and bread.

A meeting of Polish sympathizers was held at Manchester on Tuesday. The principal speakers were Mr. Hennessy, M.P., and General Count Ladislas Zamoycki. The former expressed himself satisfied with the results of his motion in the House of Commons. Lord Palmerston had refused to declare the policy of the Government, and by doing so had left politicians of all parties free to speak their mind without reference to the views of the Ministry. He contended that by her violation of the treaties of Vienna, Russia had forfeited all claims on Poland, and that this interpretation of the international law, applicable to the case, had been confirmed by Lord Palmerston's own language. He did not think the defeat of Langiewicz fatal to the cause of Poland. That General had only commanded in a district of 1,600 square miles; the whole area of the insurrection was 150,000 square miles. It was the duty of all Englishmen to strengthen the hands of the English Government, and urge it to act in unison with France and Austria on behalf of Poland. On a motion that diplomatic intercourse with Russia should be suspended during the continuance of her present system of tyranny in Poland, Count Zamoycki was called upon to address the meeting. He said that he did not desire for Poland any foreign interference by force of arms. All he wished was that England should send a Queen's Messenger in his official dress to carry the announcement to the National Government, that it was recognised by this country. He enumerated the elements of hostility to Russia among her neighbours on all sides, and expressed his conviction that the action of Europe must follow that of England. All these demonstrations are very well in their way. But unless those who take part in them are prepared to recommend war with Russia, they can hardly hope to make any impression on her Government; and if they do mean war, it is for them to show in what manner going to war with Russia could be made to serve the cause of the Poles. For the one thing we cannot do, is to land an army in a country which has no frontier within two hundred miles of the sea. The meeting, before it separated, adopted a petition to the House of Commons urging that her Majesty should be requested to take such measures as she may think fit to secure to the Poles their national rights. Of course, her Majesty always takes such measures as she—or her Ministry—thinks fit. But we should exceedingly like to know what measures these sympathizers wish that she should take? It would be ten times easier to compel the United States to make peace on Southern terms than to force Russia to make any concessions to the Poles.

Parliament has not been very busy this week. The most important event that has taken place there was the debate on American affairs in the House of Lords, confined to the speech of Lord Campbell, and the reply of Earl Russell, of which we have spoken at length elsewhere. Mr. Hubbard's motion for a revision and re-adjustment of the Income Tax, was not quite so unreasonable as Mr. Gladstone would have us believe. The particular scheme which he advocated may not be practicable; but it is not right that we should go on taxing as income that which is not income, but repayment of capital—as in the case of terminable annuities—or taxing at the same rate the precarious income of the man who lives by labour, and the certain and permanent income of the man who lives on land or invested capital. Nevertheless, as no one is prepared with a feasible plan of income tax reform, nothing could be done; and a House in which not one member in ten approves the income tax in its present shape, decided by a large majority against making any endeavours to improve it.

For the first time since her widowhood, the Queen has consented this day to receive deputations from various corporate bodies, to present loyal addresses of congratulation on the marriage of the Prince of Wales. Her retirement has certainly been a cause of regret to the people at large, and this, her first appearance to her subjects since the death of the Prince Consort, will give general satisfaction. Punch aptly expressed the universal feeling the other day, when, referring to the Queen's language on the occasion of her accession, he said,—

"Nay, let my people see me." Kind
Was she whom then our cheers were greeting.
Now, would that Lady bear in mind
That words like these will bear repeating?

EUROPE.

In his speech in the Senate upon the Polish question, M. Billault, referring to the anxiety which the Emperor has always shown to act with the other great Powers in all important questions, and giving instances of his policy, used these words, which are worthy of particular record: "In the great fratricidal struggle which agitates the New World, you have seen the Emperor aiming at a common agreement amongst all the European Powers, but without ceasing to take account of the susceptibilities of the American people. If he has not hitherto been seconded, he will not the less persist in his attitude; ever desirous of promoting what is good, generous, and liberal."

The diplomatic intervention upon which all the hopes of Poland now hang, makes but little progress. France, whilst waiting the issue of the appeal made by Earl Russell to the Powers-signatories of the Treaty of Vienna, has apparently been sounding Austria, upon whose action everything depends. The Western Powers, mindful of the ill-success of their interference in 1831, are unwilling to make demands which they can only give effect to by threats of war, before which Russia would be scarcely inclined to yield, because she knows how difficult it would be for them to give Poland any real help. It is Austria alone which can exert any effectual pressure upon Russia; and Austria, with all her present genuine liberalism, remembers the tenure by which she holds Galicia; remembers, too, that, grossly as Russia has violated the treaties of 1815, she has broken them herself in a far more flagrant manner. Russia, with the pretence of an insurrection to justify her, has denied the Poles the Constitution promised them, but the character of which was left, as M. Billault observed, entirely to her good pleasure; but Austria, despite the declaration of that treaty, that the City of Cracow should be free, independent, and neutral in perpetuity, has incorporated it in her dominions, and has spent enormous sums in rendering the citadel impregnable. Austria can scarcely, therefore, unite with England and France in demanding from Russia the fulfilment of the stipulations of the treaties of 1815, and without the co-operation of Austria, England and France can hardly, as we have said, exert any effectual pressure upon Russia.

The insurrection in Poland has received a check. The battle which we last week observed was imminent, was being fought at the time our paper appeared. The little army of Langiewicz was defeated and dispersed, the General—holding, it must be presumed, that for the time all was lost in the district which, for the last two months, has been the scene of his exploits—crossed the Vistula with a few companions, in the hope of making his way along the Austrian territory to some province in which the contest might still be sustained. He was, however, recognised, and conducted by a detachment of Austrian Hussars to Tarnow, and thence transferred to the citadel of Cracow. His followers rallied after he had left them, but only to sustain another defeat; and the remains of the one army of which Poland could boast are now fugitives in Galicia, or closely pursued into the woods of Sandomir by the Russian columns. These are all the facts with which we are acquainted. Several versions of the fight, professing to give details, have been already published; but they are irreconcilably contradictory in their account of the how, when, and where. The importance of this defeat has been very differently appreciated. At first it was considered almost equivalent to the suppression of the insurrection; then came a reaction, and the friends of Poland now attempt to make out that it is but an unimportant check. The truth, as usual, lies between these two extremes. It is quite idle to contend that the defeat and dispersal of the one army which had succeeded in making head against considerable bodies of Russian troops, which alone was tolerably equipped, and moreover held a country of immense importance to the insurgents, because admirably situated for obtaining supplies, would not be a very serious loss to the insurgent cause, even if Langiewicz had held no more responsible position than the other patriot chiefs. But the defeat of the dictator, the practical annihilation of his authority, the deprivation to the insurrection of all the skill which he had shown, and the enthusiasm he had known how to create, add greatly to the value of the triumph to the Russian Government. On the other hand, the insurrection is, no doubt, still extending in the other provinces of Congress Poland and in Lithuania. It seems quite certain, although the reports, all of which come from pro-Polish sources, are extremely contradictory; that in the Government of Kalisz, lately the scene of Microslawski's leadership, especially in the vicinity of Konin and Kolo on the Wara, the insurgents are in considerable force. A telegram from Posen announces that two engagements have taken place at Apatnawa, in both of which the Poles were completely victorious. Eighty waggons filled with Russian wounded have been taken to Konin. The same telegram states that a further engagement has occurred at Makorowo, the result of which has not yet transpired. This is probably the engagement referred to in another telegram as having occurred near Konin, in which the Russians sustained serious losses, four officers and sixty privates having been killed, whilst Prince Wittgenstein was wounded and taken prisoner. The capture of the Prince was no very material gain for the insurgents. He does not seem to have been in command, and Princes are as plentiful as blackberries in the Russian army. In the Government of Lublin the town of Kreszow has been taken by the insurgents, under Czechoroski, who seized the Government Treasury. This same band has, however, since sustained several defeats, and most of its numbers have sought a refuge in Galicia. In Volhynia and Podolia the insurrection is said to be extending, and this indefinite statement, which is met by another to the effect that both these provinces are perfectly quiet, receives confirmation from the definite report that the insurgents have seized the Government Treasury at Kremenets. A sure sign that if Lithuania is not in insurrection the Russian Government fears that it soon will be, is supplied by a ukase which abolishes immediately, "for certain local reasons," all relations of an obligatory character existing between the peasantry and the landed proprietors in the governments of Wilna, Grodno, Minsk, and Vitebsk. From May the peasants are to pay their rents to the Government, which will itself pay the proprietors the price of emancipation. The object of this measure is evidently to secure the sympathy of the peasants—it is likely enough to be successful, for the fact now becomes clear, that nowhere have the peasantry taken an active part in the movement. Wherever the insurrection is, however, it will continue for all the defeat of Langiewicz, unless the Russian Government has the wisdom to declare an amnesty, and offer a constitution. The men who have taken up arms will only lay them down with their lives, for death would be better than Siberia. The defeat of the Dictator, however, whilst it is not likely to bring about the speedy restoration of "order," shows that, left to themselves, the Poles have no chance of throwing off the Muscovite yoke. A guerilla fight they may keep up for a long time, but such a fight does not seriously threaten the Russian domination. As soon as they unite together, form an army, and oppose large bodies of Russian troops, they must succumb. No valour can supply the want of muskets and cannon.

The Central Revolutionary Committee of Warsaw has lost no time in resuming the authority which it had placed in the hands of Langiewicz. The worst part of the fate of the Dictator will probably be his enforced inactivity. The Austrian Government will not give him up to Russia, but on the other hand it will not let him resume the contest. He is at present in the citadel of Cracow, but is not treated as a prisoner.

A Russian column is said to have violated the Prussian territory, by making use of a convenient road, part of which passed through Prussia. The report is, however, denied by the organs of the Russian Government. It is also alleged that the Cossacks have upon several occasions crossed the Austrian frontier, but these allegations have also been denied.

Very little intelligence reaches this country from Warsaw. The Russian Government seems to have abandoned the manufacture of bulletins. It carries its reticence so far that, whereas it used formerly to make every encounter with the rebels, whatever its issue, into an important victory, it has now neglected to publish any particulars of the really important successes gained over Langiewicz. Beyond an unimportant telegram received by the Russian Embassy at Paris, which refers only to one of the engagements, nothing has been heard from Russian sources of the greatest triumph Russia has achieved. We are sorry to say that this abstinence does not render the accounts we have much less contradictory. The Polish versions are only to be accepted when they admit defeat. The rout of Langiewicz was at first reported to be a complete victory.

The old bane of the Polish cause, intestine dissension, again made its appearance. Microslawski has published a statement, according to which he was, at the outbreak of the insurrection, invested with the dictatorship by the Central Revolutionary Committee, and accepting the commission repaired at once to the scene of action. Whilst a serious attack of illness compelled him to seek a quiet refuge, Langiewicz outraged the act of the Provisional Government, and assumed the dictatorship. Mieroslawski at once left Poland in a huff, and thinking more about this personal satisfaction than the cause of his country, holds up Langiewicz to odium. It may be quite true that the Revolutionary Committee, in the first instance, invested Mieroslawski with the dictatorship, but it is quite certain that they subsequently invited Langiewicz to assume the post, and that the country recognised him in that character.

There is one innovation upon the old-fashioned system of campaigning introduced in this insurrection which must be extremely agreeable to the generals in command; young and beautiful ladies serve as their aides-de-camps. Miss—we use the word in our ignorance of the Polish title of the lady—Pustowaskow, who has served Langiewicz in that capacity, and acquired a great deal of renown by her heroism, followed the fortunes of her chief, trusted herself to the boat which carried him across the Vistula, with him was carried to Tarnow by the Austrian Hussars, and has been transferred with him to the citadel of Cracow. We hope this “romantic incident,” as the penny-a-liner would call it, may have the legitimate romantic and happy termination.

The debate upon Poland in the French Senate terminated in the adoption of the proposition of the Committee to pass to the order of the day, by 109 votes against 17. The interest and importance of the discussion centre in the speeches of Prince Napoleon and M. Billault, the “talking” Minister. The Prince thoroughly fulfilled all the expectations of the public, he advocated the cause of Poland with singular eloquence and extreme indiscretion. He began by declaring that he had not intended to speak, all the elements of discussion being wanting, but the report of the Committee compelled him to do so. He threw aside the treaty argument altogether. The treaties of 1815, he said, ought never to be mentioned in a French Chamber but with execration. He sketched with great bitterness the proceedings of the Emperor Nicholas and the present Czar—“the best means of defending whom, he said, would be to say nothing about him, for it was impossible to speak of him without blaming him.” He attacked the Marquis Wielopolski very strongly, comparing him to that monster of every Frenchman’s fancy, Sir Hudson Lowe, and he made the Czar directly responsible for all the brutalities of his soldiers. He then proceeded to a general denunciation of Russia. She had made difficulties about recognising the Emperor—he denied that she had rendered France any service since the peace. “I know not whether we ought not to feel more shocked than sympathetic, when after the Crimean war they came to kiss the hand that had smote them.” Nothing, he said, was to be apprehended from England: she was timid. Even in the Crimean war she was dragged into the contest by France. He quoted the opinion of the first Emperor, as given in the “Memorial of St. Helena,” in favour of the reconstitution of Poland, but he said nothing, of course, of the refusal which the Emperor always gave to take any steps for that purpose when he had the power to do so—quoted the opinion of the present Emperor, and declared that if the Senate voted the order of the day, it would declare its approval of the speech of M. Billault to the Corps Legislatif, would call upon the Government to follow a line of conduct which would place it below the Restoration and the Government of July. The order of the day would be a vote against Poland—against the sentiment which carried Napoleon III. to the Presidency and the Empire. Never were circumstances so favourable for putting an end to this formidable question. The Emperor was in the full vigour of his age and genius; his Government enjoyed great prestige abroad and strength at home; it was a favourable moment to undertake a great cause. “I now come to the great objection. We are told, You want war. To that I reply, No; but I do not want peace. I am no advocate for war, but do not weaken the Government by advising peace. Act, then, immediately. In what way? I do not—I cannot know. But act at any rate, the insurrection will last if it is encouraged.”

If the Emperor could have been identified with the speech of his cousin, war would indeed have seemed near. Its purpose was clearly war, and the language applied to the Emperor Alexander was precisely of the character to generate great irritation. M. Billault did not allow such an impression to grow up. He at once, in asking an adjournment, stigmatized the language of the Prince as imprudent and dangerous, and on the following day he made a speech which seemed intended, by its studied moderation and extreme goodwill towards Russia, to remove any possible apprehension that the Prince was the spokesman of the Emperor. He dwelt upon the great difficulties of the question. Men charged with the great interests of policy and humanity could not embrace such formidable questions except with mature deliberation. If the Russian Government gives Poland little, it keeps her oppressed; if it gives her much the Poles use the power they get to reconquer what is wanting to them;—the solution must be sought in studying and reconciling interests, not in violence or hyperboles, but in the conscience of statesmen who say to themselves that there are interests to satisfy, and sufferings to alleviate. All the eloquent protests of France and England had proved vain in 1831 and 1846. On the whole, this policy of many words and very few deeds was no other than a dangerous excitement for the unhappy country—causing irritation to sovereigns and governments, and proving the impotence of those who used it to effect anything. Undoubtedly there is much to write now, but in a different manner. We must examine the different interests, see who will be with us, who against us, who behind us. Russia has acted with great friendliness to France; in the Italian war, at the time of the annexation of Savoy and Nice; again in the recognition of the Italian kingdom. We must not throw, as has been done, bitter words in the face of a friendly sovereign, which the heart does not forget. The task of the Czar, like that of all reformers, is not an easy one; but is it possible that a Government which made the dayspring of liberty appear in its own country, would refuse it to a neighbouring one? We lost no time in acting upon the Cabinet of St. Petersburg; we strove hard to make it feel the dangers, the difficulties, and even the cruelties of the situation. We received friendly replies; we were even told, that even in presence of an armed revolt no concessions would be withdrawn; the word amnesty was even pronounced. The Minister then traced the change which the Emperor had effected in the relations of France to Europe; showed how he had dissipated the distrust and gained the esteem alike of sovereigns and peoples. He had regulated the revolution, separated the wheat from the tares. He has been studious not to act alone. M. Billault then gave some instances. To do nothing apart, to avoid reviving old jealousies, to make reason and convictions prevail, such is the policy of the Empire; and its results are that France is powerful, loved by nearly all, and feared by those who love her not. Should that policy be abandoned to revive against us the Holy Alliance? The Polish question is a European one, which interests other nations as much as it does us. In seeking to group them around us, shall we not have a better chance of avoiding either a great conflict or an abortive effort? England is at present taking an initiative. In this question, upon the groundwork of which we are unanimous, there are two ways of proceeding, one line of conduct, ardent, energetic, and imprudent—wounding right and left, taking account of no interests or obstacles, caring little for the absence of support, and compromising the common cause; the other policy, firm, sagacious, prudent, seeking to profit by all opportunities, provoking no conflicts, neglecting no chances, advancing with a sure step towards a solution. You have to choose between the two. The object of the proposition of the Committee is not to sacrifice Poland, but to remedy her position by a prudent, efficacious policy. By the order of the day you show your sympathy with Poland, and at the same time show your absolute confidence in the intentions of the Empire.

This admirable speech seems to have greatly nettled Prince Napoleon, and his irritation betrayed him into a remark which was entirely unworthy of his position. As he was concluding, M. Billault replied to the Prince’s declaration, that the order of the day was opposed to the feeling which placed the Emperor on the throne. “What,” he said, “was that feeling? France was weary of anarchy and revolutionary changes, she was weary of a régime under which her glory, her prosperity, her memories, her religious traditions, were all going down as into an abyss.” Here the Prince interrupted, “That is the reason you voted against Napoleon. You voted against General Cavaignac.” M. Billault could only reply, “I did vote against the President, but during the last ten years I have served him with honour and fidelity.” Perhaps this incident has had something to do with the letter which the Emperor has addressed to the Minister. Napoleon III. is not the sovereign to allow his Ministers to be treated with indignity. In very complimentary terms the Emperor assures the Minister of his thorough satisfaction with his speech. “You have been able,” he says, “to reconcile the expression of my sympathies with a cause dear to France, with the regards due to foreign sovereigns and governments. Your words were on all points in accordance with my meaning. I reject any other interpretation of my sentiments.” This is an emphatic repudiation of Prince Napoleon. The Emperor’s letter makes it perfectly certain that he is not disposed to go to war for Poland.

The 17th of March, 1813, is perhaps the most remarkable day in Prussian history. It is the date of that noble Aufruf an mein Volk, in which Frederick William III. summoned his people to the war of liberation. The nation responded as one man. It had suffered with its King, and with him it was resolved at every sacrifice to regain its independence. The armies which Prussia brought into the field were not comprised of professional soldiers, they were most emphatically armies of citizens. King William I., himself a soldier of the war of liberation, celebrated on this 17th of March the fiftieth anniversary of the day upon which his father, identifying himself with his people and his people with Germany, raised their enthusiasm for him to so great a pitch. Unhappily he celebrated it almost alone. The people took little or no part in what should have been a national festivity. From all parts of the country the Knights of the Iron Cross—an order instituted for the war, and bestowed for especial bravery on the battle field—to the number of two thousand, made their way as the guests of the King to Berlin. As many more combatants in the wars of 1813-15, but undecorated, assembled there likewise. The King laid the foundation stone of a monument to his father, and afterwards entertained the veterans—halt, maimed, and blind—in the Royal Palace. It was a proud day for the old soldiers, when their King and fellow-soldier gathered them around him. It ought to have been a great festival in Prussia; but the Prussian people have quarrelled with their King, and therefore chose to abstain from all participation in the celebration of a day of which they profess to be even prouder than he, and from all tributes of respect to veterans whose great deeds they are always recounting. We confess that we cannot see the wisdom of their resolution. It smacks too much of that childish folly which refuses to eat its supper, in the hope of spiting its parents or schoolmaster. The Berliners would not have compromised their principles in giving the veterans a hearty reception, or in illuminating their houses. They would do neither, because they consider that the King’s scheme for reorganising the army is calculated to destroy the Landwehr, the great institution of the war of liberation, and because the persons on the committee for arranging the festival were, for the most part, notorious for reactionary tendencies.

King William has very graciously received a deputation of the Chamber charged with the offer of birthday congratulations. Some previous deputations have had to complain of very cool treatment, and the change, therefore, gives rise to all sorts of comments. His Majesty, however, went further and told the deputation that he hoped to remove existing differences. Pending questions, he said, might meet a solution within the current year, as he knew that the country and its representatives had always been faithful to the king. This conciliatory language offers a strong contrast to the scolding tone his Majesty has adopted in previous communications with the Chamber, and sanguine people may see in it some evidence of his Majesty’s willingness to compromise the dispute. At any rate, it is a striking repudiation of the language of his ministers, who have been employing the Staats Anzeiger to accuse the Deputies of disloyalty and democracy.

Signor Farini, the President of the Council and chief of the Italian Ministry, has resigned. His health has long been very much broken, and it was feared, when he accepted office, that he could not retain it long. His retirement, although his illness has prevented him from taking a very active part in public business, must prove a loss to the Cabinet. He was the only member who enjoyed a considerable reputation on this side of the Alps. All his colleagues are second or third-rate men, whose names were never heard whilst Cavour lived. But Farini, as well by the active part he took in 1848, by his administration of the Duchies in 1859, and his history, translated by Mr. Gladstone, was well known, both in France and England. Signor Pasolini, the Minister for Foreign Affairs, and the framer of the present Ministry, has also retired. Signor Minghetti, the Finance Minister, will add to those functions the Presidency of the Council, thus becoming the chief of the Cabinet. The new Minister for Foreign Affairs is Visconti Venosa, lately Secretary-General of that Department. These changes well represent the stage in which Italy has arrived. Foreign politics are to her at this moment a matter of but small importance. The reorganization and consolidation of her provinces, the reform of the law, the development of her resources, and the settlement of her finances are the vital questions for her, and the Ministers of Finance and the Interior ought to be the guiding spirits of her Government.

PARLIAMENTARY NOTES.

THURSDAY, MARCH 19.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

The Earl of Dalhousie asked whether the Government intended to take any steps towards the amalgamation of the City and Metropolitan Police Forces; urging the disasters of the 7th and 10th of this month as a conclusive proof that the civic authorities ought no longer to be allowed a separate and independent jurisdiction.—Earl Granville answered, on behalf of the Government, that an inquiry had been ordered by the Home Department; pending which nothing would be done.—The Duke of Cambridge said that he had offered military assistance to the City magistrates, but it had been refused; and it was with difficulty that he had obtained leave to send a small force of artillery soldiers, as there were none of the Life Guards available. He defended the Rifle Brigade from the censures cast on it during a debate in the House of Commons, declaring that it had obeyed orders, and that the responsibility for the inconveniences that had arisen in its march lay with the civic authorities, who had neglected their duty. It was not his part to say what ought to be done in regard to the organization of the police; but he thought there ought to be some power capable on great occasions of taking charge of the whole of London.—Lord Taunton, as chairman of a commission which had inquired a few years ago into the constitution of the City corporation, expressed his decided belief that the metropolitan and the City police forces ought at once to be amalgamated.—Lord Overstone was of a similar opinion, and said he felt persuaded that if the Government would firmly take up the question of that amalgamation they would be supported by the public generally, and by a vast majority of both Houses of Parliament. The subject then dropped and their lordships adjourned.

THURSDAY, MARCH 19.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

In answer to a question from Mr. Longfield, as to what progress had been made towards a settlement of the dispute between the Government of Great Britain and the late United States of America as to the island of San Juan; if any correspondence between the two Governments had recently taken place on that subject, and if there were any objection to lay the same before the House; Mr. Layard stated that since the civil war in America the communications between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of the United States on this subject had been suspended; and those which took place some time ago were incomplete, so that it would be inexpedient to lay them on the table of the House.

Mr. Gregory explained that in his remarks during the Greek debate he had intended no slight to Mr. Elliott, whom he believed to be a deserving public servant. On the motion to go into committee on the Tobacco Duties' Bill, Mr. Gladstone expressed a hope that Mr. Ayrton would not press his motion for a select committee, which would be contrary to the usage of the House and the interests of the trade.—Mr. Ayrton persisted, asserting that the reduction of the duty on foreign cigars would ruin the British manufacturers. His proposal was negatived by 170 to 87; and the House went into committee.—Mr. Gladstone proposed a few modifications in the rates of duty, of no great importance, which were carried after a considerable discussion, in the course of which Mr. Ayrton observed that the duty on foreign cigars was now 9s. per lb. That was a prohibitory duty, except in two instances, namely, in respect to the slave-trade cigar of Cuba and the Royal monopoly cigar of Manilla. The Havannah growers not producing a quantity of tobacco equal to the demand, of course controlled the market; and as it would be difficult for them to conduct their business if they were not able to deal with the whole quantity they grew, they imposed on the purchasers in the markets of this country the condition that, in buying one box of the best cigars they must buy another box of the second best, and another box of the worst. That was an important consideration, because the English dealer in being compelled to buy the last description, bought that which he must sell at a loss.—The Bill passed through committee.—The House resumed, and then went into Committee on the Bill for the Prevention of Corrupt Practices at Elections. Some amendments were proposed, chiefly with a view of rendering the measure more stringent; but the House is disposed to deal leniently with offences of which nearly all its members have at one time or another been guilty, vicariously, if not in person; and the Government scheme was allowed to pass substantially unaltered. The only changes made were the adoption of a clause, moved by Mr. Puller, rendering any person convicted of bribery, treating, or undue influence at an election, or against whom judgment shall have been obtained for any penal sum recoverable under the Corrupt Practices Prevention Acts in respect of any such offence, incapable of being elected or sitting in Parliament for five years; and a clause moved by Mr. Hunt, providing for the payment of the costs of Commissions of Inquiry by the county, borough, or place where the commission was held to inquire into the extensive prevalence of bribery, treating, or other corrupt practices at an election, in cases where the commissioners shall have reported that such practices did extensively prevail.

Some formal business was transacted, and the House rose.

FRIDAY, MARCH 20.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

No business of any interest was transacted.

FRIDAY, MARCH 20.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

At the request of Mr. Ferrand, Lord Palmerston promised a Government night after Easter for the discussion of the condition of Lancashire. In answer to Mr. Hennessy, Lord Palmerston explained the circumstances under which a Polish refugee arrested in Warsaw had come into possession of a British passport.—Sir George Grey explained that the police officers sent to Warsaw had had their expenses paid by the Russian Government. In answer to Mr. C. Bentinck, the First Commissioner of Works said that an inquiry had been instituted into the causes of decay of the frescoes in the Houses of Parliament. No satisfactory result had been arrived at, but it had been decided that the water-glass system of painting should be used in future. In answer to Mr. Lyall, the Under Secretary for the Colonies stated that steps would be taken to impose upon Ceylon a larger proportion than at present, of the costs incurred by the Imperial Government for the defence of the island.—Mr. Baxter moved: "1. That in the opinion of this House, in cases where ordinary traffic supports several lines of steamers, the present system of granting subsidies for carrying the trans-oceanic mails ought to be dispensed with." "2. That this House is not prepared to grant a sum of money to the Atlantic Royal Mail Company for conveying the mails between Galway and North America." On finding that he was not at liberty to press two resolutions on the order for going into Committee of Supply, he withdrew the former. The history of the Galway Packet contract is one which would do no discredit to the Government of the United States. Certain Irish gentlemen got up a company, which was to establish a direct communication between Galway and America; and when Lord Derby's government was in power, they applied to it for a postal subsidy. It appeared then the Company had strong Parliamentary influence in Ireland, and the request was granted. When the Liberals came into power, they denounced the affair as a job, and on some pretence, well or ill-founded, that the Company had failed to fulfil its obligations, they rescinded the contract. This drew upon them the indignation of the Irish members, who have ever since been agitating for a renewal of the contract, and who now contrive to convince Lord Palmerston of the propriety of complying with their request. Some of the independent Liberals who committed themselves very deeply on this question when it was made ground of attack on Lord Derby's government, are very indignant at Lord Palmerston's change of policy; and Mr. Baxter made himself the mouth-piece of their displeasure. He gave a caustic history of the whole transaction, and quoted the very strong language in which it had been characterized by Lord Russell. Mr. Gregory, member for Galway, defended the Company, showing that by this time much time would be saved in communication with America.—Mr. Bentinck said that this was a job. It was intended at first to make political capital for Lord Derby's government. It was now intended to make political capital for Lord Palmerston. He objected to postal subsidies altogether, as taxing the public for the benefit of the commercial classes.—Mr. Whiteside defended the contract. With two millions of Irishmen in America it was absurd to say that letters between the two countries ought to be taken to Liverpool on their way. Sir Rowland Hill had recommended the establishment of a packet station in the west of Ireland. By the adoption of this line, passengers would be saved a considerable sea voyage, and would escape the dangerous navigation of the channel. He opposed the motion.—Lord Palmerston said that his hon. friend the member for Montrose, in expressing his belief that the Government had resolved on granting that contract because they should thereby obtain the support of the Irish members in that House, had pronounced upon them a double censure. He had in the first place impeached their political morality, and he had impeached in the second place their political sagacity. It must be manifest to every reasonable observer that any such hope of gaining the support of the Irish members would be utterly extravagant. The resolution was rejected; 109 to 46.

Mr. Whiteside complained of the inefficiency of the Irish police, and cited the case of Mr. Braddel, who had been assassinated in the town of Tipperary in broad daylight, and whose murderer had never been taken.—Mr. Bagwell said that the military organisation of the Irish constabulary unfitted them for police duties.—Mr. O'Hara called attention to the case of Michael O'Connor, convicted of the abduction of Elizabeth Davey, who had been discharged on his own recognisances to appear for judgment when called upon.—Sir R. Peel said, in reference to the case of Michael O'Connor, that he had ultimately become married to Elizabeth Davey, and that the subject seemed to call for no further notice. With respect to the case of the murder of Mr. Braddel, he had to state that the police had done everything in their power to bring his assassin to justice. But their efforts had hitherto been baffled in consequence, in a great measure, of the sympathy evinced towards Hayes by the peasantry. He (Sir R. Peel) thought it probable that that great criminal was still in Ireland, and he hoped that his capture would yet be effected. He regarded the Irish police as a most admirable and efficient force, and it was not the intention of the Government to change their constitution. The right hon. baronet next proceeded to state, in reference to the question which had been addressed to him by Mr. Dawson at an earlier period of the evening, that he could not under present circumstances see his way to a settlement of the marriage law in Ireland; but he should hold himself free to re-consider the subject next session if his bill for the registration of births and deaths in that country should in the meantime work satisfactorily.

The House soon after went into Committee of Supply.

Sir G. C. Lewis, in moving a vote of £321,884 for the volunteers, said there was increase in the vote, compared with that of last year, to the amount of £199,000; and that increase was owing mainly to a capitation grant, to the amount of £154,576, which it was now proposed for the first time should be given to that force.—Lord Lovaine said that the scale on which they had gone on from year to year increasing the volunteer vote had become rather alarming. He moved that the vote be reduced by £154,576, the amount of the proposed capitation grant. He could not help regarding that grant as an unnecessary extravagance.—Mr. W. Williams said he believed that was the most economical item in the whole of our national expenditure. For the sum of £321,000, we had a force of 150,000 men available for the defence of the country.—After some further conversation, in the course of which a strong admiration of the efficiency and economy of the volunteer force was generally expressed, Sir G. C. Lewis stated that the muster-roll of the force comprised 157,000 men, and that 137,000 of them might be considered effectives.—The vote was agreed to, as were several others. The remaining business was then gone through, and the House adjourned.

MONDAY, MARCH 23.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

[A full report of Lord Campbell's speech on recognition, and the reply of Earl Russell, will be found in another part of our paper.]

In answer to Lord Torrington, the Duke of Somerset said that Government would resist the passage of a proposed railway through Greenwich, until they had ascertained that the Royal Observatory would not be damaged thereby.

MONDAY, MARCH 23.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Mr. Seymour Fitzgerald asked the noble Lord at the head of the Government whether the Government had accepted or were prepared to accept the proposal stated by President Lincoln in his annual Message to have been made to them by his direction, and which he understood was made as far back as October last, respecting the establishment of a convention between this country and the Government of the United States in order to examine and adjust complaints of the violation of neutral rights.

Lord Palmerston said,—Communications have passed between the two Governments in relation to a convention on this subject. Her Majesty's Government have no objection in principle to such an arrangement, but difficulties have arisen in regard to details. Those difficulties are not yet removed; but I am not without hopes that the two Governments may come to an understanding on the matter. (Hear, hear.)

On the order for going into Committee of Supply, Mr. Hennessy, who had given notice of his intention to make an inquiry of the Government as to the nature of the obligations with respect to Poland, involved in the Treaty of Vienna, prefaced his inquiry by some observations upon the state of the insurrection in that country,—of which the recent news did not lead him, he said, to take a disheartening view,—and proceeded to argue that if Russia had violated the Treaty of Vienna so as to inflict injury upon the Poles, and to endanger the peace of Europe, there was superadded to the bare right to interfere (which had been admitted by Lord Palmerston in a late debate) a moral obligation. He insisted that Russia had violated the treaty so as to entail those consequences, and that there was, therefore, a moral obligation binding the British Government to interfere by diplomatic action, in concert with other Powers. He asked, in conclusion, whether, in the opinion of the Government, such moral obligation did not exist.—Lord Palmerston said he adhered to the answer he had given to Mr. Hennessy in the late debate—namely, that, although this country had a right to interfere, no engagement had been entered into by Great Britain in the Treaty of Vienna which imposed upon this country the obligation of interfering by force of arms to compel the execution of the treaty. Mr. Hennessy, he observed, had now shifted his ground, and talked of a moral obligation. When the proper time came for laying the papers upon the subject before the House, it would be seen that, as far as the obligation went to make friendly representations on behalf of the Poles, that obligation had been fulfilled.

After some miscellaneous questions had been put and answered, the House went into Committee of Supply. The discussion of the Army Estimates, and some business of no public interest occupied the remainder of the evening. Mr. Gladstone announced that the Budget would be brought in on the 16th of April.

TUESDAY, MARCH 24.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

In reply to Lord Shaftesbury, Earl Russell said that two Polish students had been arrested in Prussia, and that Russia had demanded their surrender. But the French ambassador had claimed them as naturalized subjects of France, and it was to be hoped that his claim would be acceded to. In reply to Lord Lyveden, the Duke of Argyll said that Government did not intend to alter the constitution of the Indian Council.

Earl Grey presented petitions from inhabitants of Australia praying for alterations of the boundaries of the Australian colonies.

The Duke of Newcastle said that the applications made for the formation of distinct colonies in Australia were so numerous that it would be impossible to comply with them all until the different districts should become more settled and more populous. The progress of explorations, however, had of late been so rapid, that he believed it would in a short time be desirable to create the territory to the south of the Gulf of Carpentaria into two new colonies, one on the Albert River and the other on the Victoria River. But, in the meantime, the former district would be annexed to Queensland, and the latter to South Australia.

The subject then dropped, and their lordships adjourned.

TUESDAY, MARCH 24.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Mr. Cave moved for a copy of any communications received from Her Majesty's Consul in the French colony of Réunion respecting the condition and treatment of the Coolies imported thither from British India. In our own colonies we took good care of such immigrants, and our Consul in Réunion was appointed for the special purpose of protecting them; but he (Mr. Cave) had made inquiries with regard to the treatment of the Coolies there, and had been informed that their condition was a modified form of slavery. This statement had been confirmed in a debate which had taken place in the Vice-Regal Council at Calcutta. He thought we ought to suspend the immigration of Coolies to Réunion.—Mr. Layard said it appeared from the reports of the British Consul upon the spot that a decided improvement had of late taken place in the condition of those labourers; and the Consul and her Majesty's Government were neglecting no opportunity of securing for them a just and kindly treatment. He did not think it would be desirable that the whole of the papers in question should be produced; but he would submit them all to the examination of his hon. friend, and he would then try to come to an understanding with him in reference to those portions of them which it would be proper to make public.—Sir M. Farquhar and Sir J. Elphinstone supported Mr. Cave, arguing that it was our duty to take efficient means for the protection of immigrants from India. The motion was then withdrawn.

Mr. Hubbard moved a resolution that the incidence of an income-tax touching the products of invested property should fall upon net income, and that the net amounts of industrial earnings should, previous to assessment, be subject to such an abatement as may equitably adjust the burden thrown upon intelligence and skill as compared with property. He contended that the unpopularity of the tax arose from its not being founded upon any principle; that, whether it was to become a permanent source of revenue, or to be reserved for exigencies, it was equally the duty of the House to base the tax upon a definite and acknowledged principle. After adverting to the objections which had been made to the practicability and the soundness of the theory embodied in his resolution, he entered minutely into details as to the mode in which, under his theory, the tax would operate upon various species of property, replying as he went on to the arguments which had been urged against it by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, especially that it was hostile to the landed interest; and he fortified the proposition contained in the latter part of his resolution by authority and examples. In conclusion, he maintained the practicability of his theory; he denied that it would create, as alleged, new inequalities and grievances, and he repudiated the charge of aiming at class legislation, meaning, he said, nothing more than to put before the House a simple principle as a basis for the tax.

The motion was seconded by Mr. Leatham, who reviewed and replied to the arguments with which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had met Mr. Hubbard's propositions last session.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer observed that Mr. Hubbard appeared as a reformer of the income-tax and the advocate of a particular plan—not as a reformer of the income-tax in general—casting aside the plans of previous reformers. His plan he had supposed to be, in all essential points, perfect and invulnerable, whereas he (Mr. Gladstone) pronounced it impracticable and visionary. He did not stand upon the perfect structure of the income-tax; but its inequalities and anomalies had at least this advantage—that they were in some degree understood, and the back was adapted to the burden. If, however, the plan proposed by Mr. Hubbard was adopted, it would only shift the tax from one set of anomalies to another, and for one class of evils substitute a greater. He reminded the House of the inquiries which the subject had repeatedly undergone and that opponents of the tax, when they looked at it closely, discovered that, though not perfect, it was not prudent to initiate changes that would encourage hopes and expectations, not to be realised. Observing that Mr. Hubbard's plan had been rejected by his own committee, and his motion negatived last session by a large majority, Mr. Gladstone examined the details and operation of the scheme, and repeated what he had said on the last discussion, that it really proposed to put the hand into the pocket of one man and transfer the money taken from it into the pocket of another, adducing examples in confirmation of the argument. He protested against the principle of Mr. Hubbard's plan, which, when examined by his own committee, had been seen to be dangerous, encouraging vague and illusory expectations.—Mr. Hubbard having replied, the House divided, when the motion was negatived by 118 to 70.

Mr. Scholefield moved the second reading of a Bill to amend the law of partnership. His object was to extend the principle of limited liability to private partnerships; allowing sleeping partners to share in the profits, without incurring liability beyond the amount of their investments, under certain stringent conditions; and making possible the introduction of the French practice of partnership en commandite. If the Bill were read a second time, he should move that it be referred to a Select Committee.—Mr. Buchanan moved the Bill be read a second time that day six months.—Mr. M. Gibson observed that, as the general principle of limited liability had been deliberately adopted by the Legislature, it was unnecessary to argue the general question; what the House had to consider was, how it was proposed to apply the general principle in this particular measure, and with what safeguards. Although he was of opinion that there were many details in the Bill which must be materially altered, its principle was consistent with the general principle adopted by Parliament, and, as it was proposed to refer the Bill to a select committee, he should vote for the second reading.—After some further debate the second reading was carried by 56 to 39. Some other business was transacted, and the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 25.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The sitting was occupied by an adjourned debate on the Irish Salmon Fisheries Bill, which was again adjourned.

Foreign Correspondence.

PARIS, March 24.

The past week has been a stirring one. The Polish debate in the Senate has contributed to keep up the agitation the Polish insurrection has created. Count Walewski, himself a Pole by birth, and one of the soldiers in the insurrection of 1831, and Prince Napoleon stigmatised, in powerful speeches, the atrocities committed by the Russians; and the Prince, forgetful of the old maxim, quis nescit dissimulare nescit regnare, delivered a stinging personal attack against the Czar for his proclamation thanking his army for the manner in which they had done their duty—a proclamation which, coming after the massacres at Miechow and other places, utterly belies the liberal feelings ascribed to its author by his admirers both in France and England. Prince Napoleon's oration was, in fact, a Philippic against the Emperor Alexander, and though the Prince stated that he did not want war, every word he spoke was in favour of a resort to the ultima ratio. M. Billault, with his usual skill, contrived to say nothing explicit. Probably to modify the effect of the speech of the Emperor's cousin, he spoke somewhat kindly of the Russian autocrat, and abstained from giving any encouragement to Poland. The general impression left by his address was, that it probably meant nothing.

Whilst Paris was discussing the speeches in the Senate, and canvassing the probabilities of the Emperor going to war to help the Poles out of their difficulty, the news came of the defeat of Langiewicz, which gave rise to the belief that it was all over with the rebellion—a belief which turns out to have been somewhat premature, as, simultaneously with the disasters to the Dictator, in other parts of the kingdom the insurgents seem to have come off victorious from several encounters, which the telegraph reports with its usual unintelligible conciseness. Whilst, however, we were all deploring the sudden collapse of the insurgents, and congratulating ourselves on a war having become impossible, the Emperor's letter to M. Billault appeared in the Moniteur, disavowing Prince Napoleon, and pronouncing the said M. Billault to be the sole oracle that had truly described his Majesty's policy. The publication of this letter is generally ascribed to the urgent requests of the Russian Embassy, who viewed the speech of Prince Napoleon in the light of an insult requiring disavowal. You will not be surprised to hear that, in the present excited state of public feeling, the letter has been very severely criticised, and that the most popular man in Paris just now is Prince Napoleon, who seems, in his able, headstrong, and injudicious address, to have seized with rare à propos the views of the masses and made them his own.

The Poles, meanwhile, continue to fight, and their friends and sympathizers here continue to prognosticate their success, and to call on the Government to stretch a helping hand to suffering Poland. But it strikes me that Europe will confine herself to barren marks of sympathy, unless some violent movement of public opinion forces the Governments of England and France into action.

It is proved beyond doubt that Russian troops pass to and fro over Prussian territory, but in spite of all the late talk of the papers about the violation of the principles of non-intervention, breach of neutrality, &c., &c., it is not likely that the displeasure of England and France will go beyond a mere diplomatic note.

Here, the American question appears at a standstill. The Yankees and their friends are, of course, horrified at the success of the Confederate loan. At Havre, Rouen, and other commercial centres I learn that the subscriptions flowed in quite as fast as they have done in London and Liverpool.

Lovers of scandal have been edified by the trial of Messrs. Garcia and Calzado for cheating at cards. It disclosed a very pretty state of society. The defendants are both notorious men. Garcia is that celebrated gambler, the terror at all Germanic roulette tables, who won four millions in two years, and lost every farthing the third. He appears since then to have been recouping himself at private tables. Calzado, who started in life, I believe, as a drummer in a Spanish regiment, and who is reported to have made an enormous fortune in Cuba and Mexico, chiefly by gambling, seems to have been a kind of sleeping partner of Garcia, lending him money "to try his luck;" but no clear evidence of the fact was adduced, and the case against him rests solely on suspicion. The scene which led to the trial took place at the house of an antiquated Phryne, Madame Barucci, whose notoriety seems to be her chief attraction. The damsel had bought a mansion in the Champs Elysées, the most expensive part of expensive Paris, and to celebrate her coming into possession gave a party, to which a "select circle" of demi-reps and turfmen were invited. Among the company was one "Angel de Miranda," who, though admitting that he knew all about Calzado and Garcia, states that he lost to them in the course of the evening something like £5,000! The very natural question being put to him, how it happened that he played for such large sums (as much as 60,000 francs depended on a single coup) with men whom he distrusted, this "Angel" replied that "he did not think anything like foul play could occur at a respectable house like that of Madame Barucci."

The game was interrupted by one of the bystanders, who declared that the cards had been tampered with. They were examined, and new cards, which Garcia admitted to have brought with him, were found mixed with the old ones. A most discrepitable scene ensued. Garcia was made to refund, and was hunted from room to room, bank-notes flying about in every direction. About £6,000 was collected in this way, of which sum Miranda received nearly two-thirds. The only thing to show that Calzado was in a league with Garcia, was his reluctance to allow himself to be searched, and the fact of a roll of bank-notes falling out of the leg of his trousers. However, the court did not give him the benefit of the doubt, and he was sentenced to thirteen months' imprisonment. Garcia did not appear to take his trial; judging shrewdly enough that the climate of Italy at this time of the year is preferable to that of Paris, he quietly went off the very day after the Barucci soirée to Monaco, where there is a roulette table, the distractions offered by which will probably enable him to hear with equanimity that the Paris tribunal have sentenced him, by default, to spend five years of his valuable life in gaol.

LETTER FROM RICHMOND.

RICHMOND, February 10, 1863.

A short missive will suffice to inform you of all that has occurred of decided interest, since the date of my last letter, in Congressional proceedings, or in military and naval operations.

For two weeks past the Confederate Senate has been occupied in the discussion of the Bill for the organization of the Supreme Court. The Bill was reported by Mr. Hill, of Georgia, from the Judiciary Committee, and coming up for consideration in its due course, after some amendments of an unimportant character, was read by sections, which sections, five in number, were passed singly, in their order. Pending the question on the passage of the Bill, Mr. Clay, of Alabama, offered an amendment, as an independent sixth section, repealing the 45th and 46th sections of the Judiciary Act of the Provisional Congress. The main point involved in this amendment was the construction which had been placed upon the 45th and 46th sections of the Judiciary Act, whereby an appellate jurisdiction over the Courts of the several States was lodged in the Supreme Court. Upon this point arose a long and animated debate, which has not yet terminated. Messrs. Wigfall of Texas, Semmes of Louisiana, Yancey of Alabama, and Herschel V. Johnson of Georgia, supported the amendment in speeches of much earnestness and ability, and Mr. Yancey in certain passages rose even to eloquence. The amendment was opposed with equal force and learning by Messrs. Hill, of Georgia, Phelan, of Mississippi, Henry, of Tennessee, and Maxwell, of Florida. Mr. Yancey's rhetoric and fervour were expended in an eulogium upon South Carolina. Mr. Henry, on the other side, passed a panegyric upon the incorruptibility and lofty independence of the juridical character, quoting from Lord Macaulay to show that the bench had always upheld the liberties of the people. The whole theory of State Rights, as opposed to power vested anywhere outside the individual commonwealths, and exercising authority over them, was expounded by its peculiar and most jealous defenders. The debate will probably be continued through another week. Mr. Wigfall will again occupy the floor tomorrow, and it is expected that Mr. Hunter, of Virginia, Mr. Sparrow, of Louisiana, and other Senators, will submit their views upon the vexed question before the vote is taken on the amendment. This discussion of a matter of so much importance to the future of the Confederacy, has excited a large popular interest, despite the distractions of the war, and the abstruse nature of the points at issue, and would have attracted large audiences, were not the accommodations of the Senate Chamber so very narrow. There are no seats for visitors, and the locus standi of the apartment without the railing is sufficient to admit of more than fifty persons hearing and seeing the speakers. Every day this limited space has been densely filled for many minutes before the Senate was called to order.

It is related of Queen Elizabeth, of blessed memory, that when, upon a certain occasion, she inquired of one of her ministers what had recently passed in Parliament, the courtier replied, "Please your Majesty, six weeks." If any one, observant of the proceedings of the House of Representatives for the past fortnight, were asked in general terms what had been before that body, he would probably reply, "Mr. Foote, of Tennessee." Whenever your correspondent has looked in upon the deliberations of the House, he has found that gentleman upon his legs. Mr. Foote is ever rising to a privileged question, or making a motion of inquiry, or asking for correspondence or what not; so that if a stranger, Lord Harlington for example, who had dropped in some fine day, no matter when, to take a view of the lower branch of the Confederate Legislature, should judge the House of Representatives according to the old maxim of "Ex Pede Herculem," he would not unreasonably conclude that it was the most garrulous assembly upon earth. It is to be regretted that the "honourable gentleman from Tennessee" will persist in consuming so much of the time of the House, for he thereby mars his capacities for usefulness, which are of no mean order. Well-informed upon all subjects, uniformly accurate of speech, and at times exceedingly impressive in the enunciation of his views, perfectly fearless in his exposure of abuses, and with a very striking personal appearance, the grey-bearded old statesman might exercise a powerful influence over his fellow members, would he but consent to talk less than he does. A few days ago he attempted in Committee of the whole, to induce the Committee to strike out from the General Appropriation Bill the clause providing for the maintenance of our Foreign Commissioners, and sustained the attempt by remarks very pointed and sensible, which might perhaps have had their weight coming from a more reticent member; but the Committee refused to strike out, and the Bill was passed and reported to the House in this respect just as it was printed. For several days the House has been mostly in secret session, and no whisper of what engages their attention is heard out of doors.

Dr. Holland, of Texas, who is on the staff of General Magruder, and participated in the capture of the Harriet Lane, arrived in this city ten days ago, bringing with him the official report of that brilliant achievement, and the signal book taken on the vessel. Captain Wainwright, who commanded the Harriet Lane, and who fell dead upon the deck, refusing to surrender like a gallant gentleman, well knowing the value of the signal book, and the immense mischief that would result to the navy and marine of his country should it fall into our hands, had secured it by placing it in the breast-pocket of his uniform coat. He was shot down pistol and cutlass in hand, after having declared that he would not yield himself a prisoner, by Leon Smith, the brave sailor who managed the naval portion of the enterprise. Smith fired at Wainwright twice with a navy revolver. The first ball penetrated the signal book, but was arrested by the under plate of the metallic cover in which the book was kept; the second ball entered the skull, producing death in a few moments. Captain Wainwright was a lieutenant of the United States' steamer Merrimac, at the time she made her trial trip across the Atlantic, and lay for some time in Southampton Water, seven years ago. Leon Smith was a captain of a passenger steamer, the General Rusk, plying between the ports of New Orleans and Galveston before the blockade of the Southern ports, and is a brother of Caleb B. Smith, recently Secretary of the Interior in the Cabinet of President Lincoln. No sooner had General Magruder secured the Harriet Lane than he determined to send her out to assist the Alabama and Florida in preying upon the Yankee commerce in the Gulf. A crew was hastily collected in Galveston, Leon Smith was placed in command, and the Harriet Lane steamed gallantly from the harbour, as it afterwards proved not one moment too soon; for early the next day four large vessels of war, sent by Faragut from New Orleans, appeared off the bar to prevent her departure. Smith has not been idle since he went out, if we can place any reliance upon reports that reach us from the Gulf. Nor has General Magruder been inactive on land in the meantime. Unwilling to allow the cobwebs to be woven across the throats of his guns, as Mr. Tennyson says, he despatched an expedition under Major O. M. Watkins to Sabine Pass, the outlet of the Sabine River, which divides Louisiana from Texas, for the purpose of breaking the blockade at that point, with the assistance of certain rams in Sabine Lake. The expedition was a complete success. The enemy's fleet was dispersed. Thirteen pieces of ordnance stores, valued at one million of dollars, and one hundred and nine prisoners fell into his hands, and at the latest advices, the Confederate rams were lying in the Gulf off the mouth of the Pass, "waiting for new comers."

A furore of delight possessed the Confederate Capital a week ago, at the intelligence flashed to us from Charleston that the blockade was effectually brought to an end off that port, by the daring adventure of Commodore Ingraham with the iron-clads Chicora and Palmetto States; and if we had been a more demonstrative people than we are, and had moreover been sufficiently rich in the means of illumination, the town might have blazed with lights of joy. As it was, we may be said to have gone off half-cocked. Enthusiastic gentlemen rushed to the State Library to consult Vattel, Wheaton, Polson, Wildman, and Phillimore on the rights of the blockaded and what constituted a legal infraction. Extras from the offices of the daily papers enlivened the tedium of the dies non, and the decorous congregations assembled in Richmond's fifty places of worship were thinking more of Charleston and its rams on that excited Sunday than of psalter or sermon. The next morning we all read in the telegraphic columns of the paper that the Yankee fleet dispersed by Ingraham had returned to their accustomed positions, and that the port of Charleston was again closed. A good deal might be said, by authority of writers on international law, in support of the proposition that a blockade once broken for ever so short a time by a superior force, must so remain until due notice has been given to neutral nations for its re-establishment; and if the European Powers were desirous of terminating a blockade, which was never entitled to respect under the dicta of the Congress of Paris, the temporary raising of it at three points on the Southern coast would afford them an excellent opportunity for so doing. In what I have said, I am very far from desiring to underestimate the importance of the blow so bravely struck by Commodore Ingraham. The example set by Magruder at Galveston, and energetically imitated by the Charlestonians, may and will be followed up hereafter; and it may be assumed without undue confidence, that by the 1st of June the blockade will be virtually "played out," as the Yankees say, without the intervention of foreigners. The turreted invulnerables of the Monitor and Papaie pattern cannot lie off our ports, for the reason that the first heavy sea will send them to the bottom. All the fast-sailing steamers of the Federal navy will be needed in the Spanish Main for the protection of Yankee commerce, while the old wooden hulks of the ancien regime, ineffective always to prevent such vessels as the Antonica and the Giraffe from entering or leaving any given harbour, are exposed continually to the midnight attack of the Confederate rams.

Undeniably, however, this is contingent upon the issue of the mighty efforts that will be made by the Yankees within the next four weeks to possess themselves of Charleston, Savannah, and Mobile. An immense fleet of their vessels was at anchor in the harbour of Port Royal on Saturday, February 7th, comprising fifty-two transports, fifteen large war steamers, and five iron-clads. While I write, the grim Monitor batteries may be moving up Moffitt's Channel, and the bright bay, whose waters have slept so peacefully in the sunlight these twenty months or more, since the Yankee flag was lowered upon the walls of Sumter, may resound with the roar of a yet louder and more fearful cannonade. The defences of Charleston are thought strong by competent engineers, but it is an untried experiment how successfully they may resist the attacks of these new destructives built by the blacksmiths, mailed monsters without a crack in their harness, unimpressible to the heaviest ordnance, and Titanic in their capacity for mischief. It would excite no consternation here if Charleston should fall—such an event has been thought possible any time since Christmas, and the Yankees would be no nearer the subjugation of the South possessing the whole sandy strip of our coast-line, with the smouldering ruins of what once were prosperous cities, than they were on the 15th day of April, 1861, when Abraham Lincoln issued his first proclamation for troops to put down the "rebellion."

We are encouraged, however, to hope that our forts and floating batteries in Charleston harbour may be able to withstand the onset of the Yankee armada, from the result of the bombardment of Genesis Point near Savannah last week. "When an irresistible meets an immovable what will be the consequence?" was the old puzzle in physics which amused us in school—the attack on Genesis's Point enables us to answer Nil. The great monstrum horrendum, informe, ingens, the Montauk, battered away for four hours at the fort without other damage than carrying away a small portion of the parapet, and wounding one or two of the garrison. Our batteries were ordered to fire only solid shot, which they did with great deliberation and accuracy, the missiles bounding from the sides of the monster like the bullets of Jules Gérard or Gordon Cumming from the hide of a rhinoceros. At length a ponderous mass of iron hurled from an eleven-inch gun struck the turret of the Montauk, and was battered into a thousand fragments by the impact. The commander of the fort, supposing it to have been a shell, asked why his orders to fire nothing but solid shot had been disregarded. What damage was done to the Montauk is not positively known, but from that moment she ceased firing and hauled off down the stream.

Your advices from New York have, no doubt, already made you acquainted with the displacement of Burnside and the elevation of "Fighting Joe Hooker" to the chief command of the "Army of the Potomac." The new leader begins well. He tells his troops that the enemy is inferior to them in equipment, intelligence, and valour (!)—a piece of information for which they must be duly thankful, and which must fill Abraham Lincoln's soul with satisfaction and enliven his memory with jokes. It is just possible that Old Abe, who is of an eminently practical turn of mind, would prefer to have some better assurance of the superior valour of his armies than the mere say-so of "Fighting Joe," and we cannot but think that his boastful announcement will provoke a little bit of a sourire upon the impassive countenance of his Imperial Majesty the Emperor of the French, and other "intelligent" observers of our American quarrel, in Europe. But, as General Hooker accepts his position upon the express condition that he shall take Richmond in the same old "ninety days," he may perhaps be indulged in endeavouring to infuse courage into his troops by what means best he may. Mark, I do not say they lack courage, but it is undeniable that they are overshadowed by a presentiment of doom in marching against the veterans of Lee, Longstreet, and Stonewall Jackson, and the better opinion of Washington City is, that the whole "Army of the Potomac" is a devoted band. The advanced movement was to have been made two weeks ago, and the army was put in motion for the Rappahannock to cross the stream four miles above Fredericksburg, but the foremost ranks had not reached the bank by four hundred yards when the order was given to countermarch. The whole column was hopelessly bemired. The waggons were so deeply sunk in the red mud of Stafford that it became necessary to abandon them. Horses and mules, in many instances, left their hoofs in the clay as they were extricated, and in others, were killed in the traces as they stood, extrication being impossible. At one time it seemed likely that the "army of the Potomac" would share the fate of those armies in the Miltonic record, which sank whole betwixt Damietta and Mount Cansus. The weather since this ineffectual effort of the Yankees to move forward has not been such as to improve the condition of the roads. It has rained for twenty-four hours together in torrents. Snow has fallen to the depth of eight inches. The mercury has been as low as 8° of Fahrenheit in this city. To-day we have the temperature of spring and the wind from the sweet south, breathing of the violets of South Carolina. Such sudden alternations of heat and cold, with such an excess of moisture, have not been calculated to make the highways more practicable for the transportation of artillery. A dry season of three or four weeks would probably bring Hooker on, and then ——— nous verrons ce que nous verrons.

There was a skirmish between considerable numbers on the 31st of January at Blackwater, not far from Suffolk, on the line of the Norfolk and Petersburg Railroad. The Federals, 15,000 strong, under General Corcoran, formerly of the "bloody 69th" Regiment of New York Volunteers, attacked the Confederate troops under General Roger A. Pryor, numbering about 8,000. A sanguinary fight ensued, which resulted in the complete repulse of the Yankees, General Pryor remaining in possession of the field. Our loss was fifty in killed and wounded;—the enemy's, 500. All the buildings in Suffolk, the churches, the court-house, &c., were converted into hospitals for the reception of the disabled Yankees. General Corcoran, having been largely reinforced, General Pryor fell back to a stronger position, where he awaited another attack, which, up to this moment, has not been made.

I am happy to apprise you of the decided abatement of the small-pox, and of the improved sanitary condition of the city, in respect of other maladies that have been fatally prevalent during the winter.

We have news to-day of the loss of three transports in Red River, and there is a rumour of a revolution in Kentucky, with fighting in the streets of Louisville, which, if it be true, you will learn by more direct channels of intelligence than are at our command. The point to which we are now looking with intensest interest is Vicksburg. The Mississippi has so far proved a rebel river, and will not desert its bed for the Yankee canal, and we have strong hopes that the heroic little city will yet hold its own.

General Sterling Price is in Richmond at present, but will go West in a few days with enlarged powers for usefulness in Missouri. He was serenaded last night at the Spotswood Hotel, and made a speech which was received with great enthusiasm.

The new Richmond theatre was opened to the public for the first time last evening. It is a showy and very tasteful little building, with abundance of ornament in gold, seats for about twelve hundred persons, and a foyer handsomely furnished with lounges and mirrors. The play presented last evening was Shakespeare's A You Like It and a very appropriate ode, written for the occasion by Henry Timrod, of South Carolina, was recited to an immense audience; so that you see we are not without our amusements in the midst of war's alarms.

A SOUTHERNER.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

Our friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed; that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any date, will be useful and acceptable presents.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives, or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognized at this office.

Our subscribers in the South will have their paper supplied through HENRY HOTZE, Esq., the Confederate States' Commercial Agent at London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

Subscription, 26s. per annum—post paid, 30s., payable in advance. All communications on business to be addressed, and Post-Office Orders made payable to, J. B. HOPKINS, 13, Bouverie-street, Fleet-street, London, E.C.

Agency at Liverpool: WM. KNOX, Secretary Southern Club, 53, Brown's-buildings.

Agency for the Continent: G. FOWLER, 279, Rue St. Honoré, Paris.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, MARCH 26, 1863.

Lord Campbell's Speech in the House of Lords.

It is fitting that all great questions which agitate the public mind should find expression in that highest arena of debate, which is assumed to represent the wisdom, the intelligence, and the dignity of the nation. Even where no legislative action is contemplated, and no executive action to be prompted, the Parliamentary discussion of any important topic is eminently useful in fixing and maturing public opinion; and in preserving it from an unwholesome stagnation, or in bringing it back to the true points at issue. Thus, though Lord Campbell's speech in the House of Lords on Monday night had no other immediate result than to elicit from Earl Russell a reiteration of his policy of procrastination, the cause of the Confederate States cannot but gain both within the doors of the House and outside, by the bold and manly advocacy of their claim to recognition. If a complete mastery of a subject, lucidity of arrangement, closeness of reasoning, and sobriety of statements, can promote any cause before any tribunal, then has Lord Campbell earned a lasting title to gratitude from the eight millions of a foreign and yet not alien people, on whose behalf he addressed the peers of this realm, and through them the British public. Not a salient point of the argument was omitted; each in its appropriate place was brought out in full relief; and the whole linked together by easy and natural transitions, so as to form a compact body of facts and deductions, which no attempt has yet been made to controvert.

Lord Campbell opened by stating that his object was not to review the past policy of the Government on American affairs, but to direct attention to the divergence which had lately appeared between this policy and that of England's nearest ally, the Emperor of the French. He thought that the time was approaching, and but for the serious state of Polish affairs might, perhaps, already have arrived, when the action of France would force this country to a decision, and when, without a definite conviction in Parliament or outside, the Government would be taken at a disadvantage. He distinguished between the modes of action which had been tried or proposed—mediation or interference, and that only effective mode which was still untried—acknowledgment of the Southern belligerents, either by sending an ambassador, by negotiating a treaty, or by instructing the Consuls to receive exequaturs from the Confederate Government. He disposed of the objection that such acknowledgment would be fruitless by referring to the persistent efforts which one of the belligerents had made to obtain it, by sending envoys to the great capitals of Europe, and the extreme measures to which the other had resorted to prevent it, by intercepting these envoys even at the risk of a war with England. He then explained the practical effects of recognition in disabusing the minds of the Northern people of fallacious hopes, and placing both parties in a position to negotiate. He next examined the various precedents of the recognition of an insurgent Power, and demonstrated, notably by the example of Portugal, where recognition was accorded by the unanimous action of all the then Great Powers of Europe a twelve-month after the declaration of independence, twenty years before material aid was granted, and almost twice that period before the substantial struggle for reconquest had ceased—that the true principle involved in the exercise of this grave international act was not, as had been recently asserted, that all substantial struggle should have ceased, but that all substantial hope of reconquest on the part of the former sovereign should, in the opinion of neutrals, have been exhausted. The other and novel interpretation of international law was contrary to humanity; since it tended to needlessly protract a hopeless struggle; because no Government had ever consented to its own humiliation by being the first to relinquish its pretensions, and that the Government of the United States could no more be expected to recognise the independence of the Confederate States before other nations had set the example, than a patient could be expected to perform the operation of amputation upon himself. He established the binding force of the precedent of Portugal by the concurrent testimony of all the masters of the science of international law, corroborated and reaffirmed as it is by the latest and not the least of them, Sir James Mackintosh.

Having thus laid down the true principle, and proved the consistent practice of the right of acknowledgment, Lord Campbell proceeded to the application to the present case. The hopelessness of reconquest, he argued, was proved by the verdict of the financial world in the remarkable success of the Confederate loan, based upon a security which, as the cotton burnings of last year must sufficiently show, depended solely upon the stability of the Confederate Government and its ability to resist invasion. It was further proved by the concurrence of the highest military authorities of our age. In this respect the Emperor Napoleon, and the Princes of the Orleans family, who shared in the campaign of McClellan, seemed to agree. Recent revelations have made known that at the outbreak of the war, General Scott, the Commander-in-Chief of the armies of the Union, deemed such reconquest possible only on conditions which he at the time considered impossible. Nor, so far as was known here, had any other Federal commander ever committed himself to a prediction of reconquest; but they had all left that task to the newspapers of the North and to Mr. Seward, who, whatever his other abilities might be, was assuredly not a military authority. He further cited the opinions that had been expressed in the very House which he addressed, of the improbability and impossibility of Southern subjugation. As an additional evidence he contrasted the elements of the contending forces, the vacillation of purpose, the hesitancy and inefficiency, the absence of any predominant military genius, which characterised the North, with the steadfast determination, the valour, and self-sacrifice of the South, and the ability of its leaders; the confidence of the latter with the despair confessed by the former in the enlistment of negro regiments; and after paying a deserved tribute to the Confederate President, he concluded "that a new chapter would be opened in the history of the world if on the great theatre of war in America those qualities to which men had ever pointed with scorn should triumph over those which had hitherto been regarded with admiration."

From the right of acknowledging the Confederate States as resulting from the principles and practices of international law and the facts of the case presented by the two belligerents, the noble Lord proceeded to prove the duty of this country to exercise this right. First, he deemed it a point of honour that a great country like this should not receive benefits without reciprocating them, should not enjoy the essential advantages of recognition in the consular protection allowed to its subjects and their property in the Southern States, without extending to the Southern Government the same advantages, and should either withdraw these Consuls holding their exequaturs from a Government with which the Confederacy is at war, or should duly accredit them to the authority which now, by mere forbearance, permits the exercise of their functions. The next ground for exercising the right of recognition was that of strict impartiality. He agreed with the Secretary for Foreign Affairs in the sentiment expressed by the latter in a despatch to Mr. Mason, that this Government could not assume to decide a question so much debated on the other side of the Atlantic, viz., the Constitutional right of secession; but he argued that it was, in fact, deciding the question against the seceders, if recognition was withheld from them after the deliberate conviction had been reached, that secession was irrevocably accomplished. He reviewed the many manners in which English neutrality had borne heavily against the South, how through the action of this Government France was held back from recognition, and how, by a subsequent construction, the only beneficial clause of the Paris Convention to which the Southern Government at the instance of those of France and England had been induced to give its adhesion, was rendered practically nugatory; and he quoted from a despatch of Earl Russell to the United States Minister, dated 27th of March, 1862, published by the Washington Government, but not included in the correspondence laid before Parliament, in which the Foreign Secretary reminds Mr. Adams that great allowance had been made to the American Government in the great calamities that have befallen it, and that the public law has been liberally construed in their favour. He did not question the wisdom or the policy at that time of thus liberally construing the public law in favour of the stronger belligerent, but he contended that recognition of the weaker, now, when the issue was no longer in doubt, would be but a just reparation, and was due as a compensation and a readjustment of practical impartiality.

The argument of duty, Lord Campbell sharpened with that of interest. The peace of Canada, he argued, was best secured by an alliance with one of the two Powers, which hereafter were to divide the major part of the North American Continent, and for such an alliance, the North, for reasons which he clearly stated, could not be relied on. He appealed to the Peers around him who had represented their country in foreign lands, that diplomacy was inefficient and impossible, near a nation whose passions and prejudices were arrayed against that country, and dwelt upon the necessity that no such obstacles should obstruct the progress of British influence with the new Southern nationality. He briefly referred to the distress in Lancashire, daily finding expression in a more aggravated form, and pointed out the impossibility of relief by supplies of cotton from other sources, so long as an avalanche of three or four million bales of that material was ready, by peace, to be launched upon the market.

In conclusion, the speaker dealt with the only objections that could be urged against the duty, and the interest of exercising the right of recognition. In a few pointed sentences he showed the confusion of issues that had been made on the slavery question, that the only issue which British philanthropy had to consider, was not whether slavery was or was not the cause of this war, but in which of its possible terminations the interest of the slaves was most likely to be promoted. He showed that while Southern independence held out promising hopes for the amelioration of the slave's condition, Southern subjugation threatened him with a far worse lot than had hitherto fallen to him. He even went so far as to predict that while with Southern independence slavery must necessarily be confined within its present limits, the overrunning of the South by Northern conquerors, finding the confiscated lands worthless without negro labour, and the present negro population demoralized and diminished by servile insurrection, would almost certainly lead to the re-opening of the African Slave-Trade, as the only source of the indispensable supply. He showed that while reconquest could not benefit the slave, and assuredly not the Southern white man, whom it would deprive of home and of personal and political rights, it would be equally fatal to the last remaining liberties of the North, which it must inevitably convert into a military dictatorship. All these considerations of right, duty, interest, and humanity, the speaker urged upon the consideration of their Lordships, ending with the prediction that until they were acted upon in the recognition of the South by neutral Powers, the disastrous war would never end.

Imperfect as is this sketch, the reader will scarcely fail to see that seldom has a speech been made on a great subject in which so much has been said in few words, and so little left unsaid. Of Earl Russell's reply we have not space, and less need to say much. Its irrelevancy to the points raised by Lord Campbell was pithily expressed by one, who, after hearing it, remarked, "If Lord Campbell's speech had had the small pox, Earl Russell's was never near enough to have caught it." Without pretending to meet any of the issues his interpellator had raised, the Secretary for Foreign Affairs contented himself with a somewhat imposing declamation upon the high and sacred motives which had in all former instances animated Great Britain either in mere recognition or in active interference. Had he been an American orator in the Congress at Washington instead of a noble Earl in the midst of the nobility of Great Britain, we should have suspected this part of his reply to be addressed not to Lord Campbell or to the House, but to that far-famed constituency of "Buncombe." A solemn deprecation of interference or becoming parties to the war seemed equally inapplicable to Lord Campbell's speech, as Earl Russell seems himself to have felt, for he had evident difficulty in connecting the two subjects by the gratuitous hypothesis, that his noble friend, or (for this was too little warranted by anything that Lord Campbell had said) "those who looked forward to his motion" had some such interference in their minds. Upon the whole, the Minister proved himself a dexterous debater, for while he carefully avoided inconvenient topics, he managed to balance his words so as not altogether to discourage either belligerent, or commit himself in favour of either. While declaring the present time most inopportune for recognition, he left the Cabinet which he represented free to act at any given period—not the immediate present; and while speaking of the tremendous efforts the North was making for a renewed campaign, he more than implied the probability of their failure. Making allowance for his doubly delicate and difficult position as the Minister of a most important branch of the Government, and the representative on this occasion of a notoriously divided Cabinet, we are not altogether disposed to quarrel with Lord Russell's speech. One passage, however, deserves special notice. It is where he says, borrowing Mr. Seward's phrase, that recognition would be an unfriendly act to the Government of the United States. Lord Russell apparently never considers that non-recognition might also be an unfriendly act to the Government of the Confederate States, and seems to forget that Great Britain never assumed any obligations to the late American Union which were binding towards only one-half of the States composing it, and not towards the other half.

The Struggle in the South-West.

The mysterious plans for the reduction of Vicksburg which have so long been talked of in the North have at length assumed a definite form and purpose. It is now evident that the Yankees have a wholesome dread of the Vicksburg batteries, and that it will be long before another assault upon the city is adventured. So the plan of campaign is reduced to the simple object of starving the garrison out. An attempt at an investment and the stoppage of every avenue by which supplies are furnished is the one hope of the Federal commanders; and, if we are to credit the New York press, the efforts by which this end is to be accomplished transcend everything that has been previously achieved in history. Great rivers are to be diverted from their courses, millions of cultivated acres are to be reconverted into their primeval condition of desolate swamps, nature's roads will be closed, and then Northern ingenuity will open new channels through interminable lagoons, and sluggish bayous, and noisome marsh. The Mississippi will become a silent highway, and the fate of Tyre and Sidon, Babylon and Nineveh, is the doom which the relentless North holds out to the once populous cities which fringe the southern extremities of the Father of Rivers. The pertinacious defence of Vicksburg and Port Hudson has brought this crowning indignity on the Mississippi. It was not sufficient to dispute his right to flow in his accustomed channels opposite the former fortress. There remained the batteries on the bluffs of Port Hudson. These, too, were to be avoided, and with a resolution worthy of them, the Yankees have set to work to dispense with the Mississippi altogether, and to solve the gordian knot in the South-West by cutting and digging a new outlet to the Atlantic for the trade of the Western States. The following is an outline of this "big" project, supplied by the New York Herald:—Some eighty miles above Vicksburg, on the Louisiana side of the Mississippi is Lake Providence. A small stream connects this lake with the Mississippi, and the "levees" on the Louisiana bank having been cut, there is a rush of water by this channel into Lake Providence, which, it is hoped, will carry with it the Federal gunboats. Southward from the lake flows the river Tensas, running about 250 miles almost parallel with the Mississippi, and joining with the Washita River at Harrisonburg, in Louisiana, nearly opposite Natchez. There their united currents take the name of the Black River, and after another 100 miles, discharge themselves into the Red River, about thirty miles above its confluence with the Mississippi. Supposing the route to have been opened for the passage of gunboats or transports, a considerable advantage would have been obtained, Vicksburg would have been safely passed, all the supplies it has hitherto obtained by the Red River from Louisiana and Texas would have been cut off." But this is not enough for the daring intellects that have drawn up the Yankee programme. Unfortunately, fifty miles below the mouth of the Red River is Port Hudson, barring the passage with its frowning batteries, and the Federals have no alternative but to fight or find some other way out of their difficulties. Accordingly the mouth of the Red River is to be blocked up, and the whole volume of water diverted from the Mississippi by Lake Providence and Tensas River, is to force its way into the half Bayou half river, Otehafo bayou, and freeing for itself a broad path through the lagoons, the driftwood, and the black mud, which now impede the navigation of the river, burst forth into the Gulf of Mexico, some hundred miles west of the mouths of the Mississippi. Then Vicksburg, and Natchez, and Baton Rouge, and New Orleans will be cities of the past. Such is the scheme which, if all others fail, is to strike terror into the hearts of the rebellious South, and give another proof to the awe-struck world of the overpowering might of the North.

Passing from the extravagance of fiction to the realm of fact, we find that for the moment the efforts of the Federals are devoted to the starvation of Vicksburg. The "cut-off" will not work. The Mississippi remains wedded to his old course. But the route by Lake Providence to Red River is seriously essayed, and, if it shall prove practicable, much inconvenience will result to the garrison. The Federals will then obtain the command of the Mississippi between Vicksburg and Port Hudson, and Vicksburg will only be supplied and provisioned from the State of Mississippi. But it is very doubtful whether the Lake Providence route is practicable, even when the waters are at the highest, and even if the difficulties of the passage of the swamps should be so far overcome as to admit of its navigation, the Confederates with their recent captures ought by this time be in a position to hold their own against any force their opponents could, by so tortuous and dangerous a route, bring against them. However, until the Red River is closed, Vicksburg cannot be starved out, and we may be sure no effort will be spared to stop up this source of supply. In another direction a similar attempt to isolate the defender of Vicksburg has been attended with more success. It seems that two naval expeditions have been despatched to clear the Yazoo river, the one steaming up from the mouth of the Yazoo, a few miles above Vicksburg, the other starting some 250 miles up the Mississippi by the Yazoo pass. This pass was formerly the communication between the Mississippi river, and the principle watercourses of the State of Mississippi, but of late years it has been blocked and rendered unnavigable, and much of the surrounding land once overflowed by its waters, has been reclaimed and cultivated. The object of the Federals is to gain access by the opening of this pass, and the clearance of the Yazoo river and its principal tributaries, to the rear of Vicksburg. It is hoped that by the breaking down of the levees the whole country will be inundated, and light transports and gunboats of small draught will be able to penetrate quite to the rear of Vicksburg, and so cut off its communication with Jackson, Mississippi. The investment would then be tolerably complete. The expedition by the Yazoo pass had been so far successful that it had passed the most difficult points of navigation; the other, starting from the mouth of the Yazoo, had, according to report, reached Yazoo city, and inflicted a severe defeat on the Confederates stationed there. The victory is probably due to the Federal gunboats. The capture of the City is, however, an important success, although the Federal reports of the capture of 7,000 men is an obvious exaggeration. From Yazoo City to Jackson then is a tolerably good road, and if the Federals are in sufficient numbers, we may possibly hear of a blow struck in this direction. According to the latest accounts, an attempt to land at Haynes' Bluff, a few miles up the Yazoo, was daily reported, and in that case a severe battle may have been fought, possibly deciding the fate of Vicksburg. It is obvious, the Federals cannot remain much longer inactive. The waters must have reached the highest point. The deaths in the camps are already reported at hundreds daily. One account computes the sick in General Grant's camp at 20,000, another places the effective men at the same number. As soon as the waters begin to subside the sickness must increase tenfold. At present there is no limit to the supplies, and no opposition to the reinforcements forwarded by the Federal transports, but as the streams become lower the difficulty of providing subsistence for the large expeditions now operating in the South West will be insurmountable. Unless, however, the strength of the garrison of Vicksburg has been very much overrated, the attack at Haynes' Bluff is not likely to be more successful than the previous attack under General Sherman.

The fate of Tennessee is yet in the balance, and Kentucky is once more threatened by large masses of Confederate troops. General Rosencranz, instead of continuing his threatened advances, is fortifying himself at Murfreesborough, warned probably by the fate of his comrades at Franklin. The Confederates are in force in his front and on his right flank, and a Confederate army is reported to be marching past him into Kentucky. Forts Henry and Donelson are said to be already in the hands of the Confederates, and, if this be true, he will have quite enough to do to hold his own and secure a safe retreat. In Virginia we hear for the twentieth time that General Hooker is preparing for an advance, and that the moment the roads are fit, operations on a grand scale will be resumed—probably not a day too soon for the Confederate generals. Charleston is still only threatened, and, if we may judge by the failure of the bombardment of Fort M'Allister, is tolerably safe. A successful raid upon the Federal head-quarters in Virginia, by which a general and his whole staff have been carried off; the fight on the Yazoo, and two or three cavalry skirmishes, are the most stirring incidents recorded by the last mail. But within a few weeks the conflict must be renewed in its grandest and direst form, and the shock of great armies will have decided the issue of another campaign.

The Money Value of New England Fanaticism.

As is known to all the world, there are a certain number of States in the American Union, occupying but small space on the map of the New World, known by the appellation of New England. In the Southern States the inhabitants of this region are designated by the title of Yankees, and in consequence of the fact, that they were the chief instigators of the present war between the North and the South, the Northern armies are always referred to by Southerners under the general cognomen of Yankees. As a nation, or a community of States, they are highly civilized, intelligent, and endowed with many characteristics which are worthy of respect. Many eminent statesmen, and distinguished men in various other ranks of life, have sprung from this portion of the late Confederacy, but there are certain peculiarities, mental as well as moral, which distinguish them from the other States of the late "great republic." Perhaps the most prominent of these are fanaticism, and a love of gold. These qualities are traceable throughout their entire history; and the two are combined together in such equal proportions that it is almost impossible to decide which one predominates over the heart or the mind.

In estimating properly the qualities of the unadulterated Yankee fanatic, it is necessary to reverse all the rules by which we judge of other men, or we would be obliged to set him down as belonging to the class of cold calculating hypocrites, who wear the mask of virtue, only to conceal their selfish or criminal designs. We are accustomed to regard a fanatic as an earnest, deluded, infatuated man, guided by a sentiment which assimilates in a certain degree to an honesty of purpose, and who at least pursues his "idea" to the bitter end regardless of the personal consequences to himself or others. If he be not so entirely absorbed in his idiosyncrasy, as to be oblivious of all the probabilities or even possibilities of damage or advantage to himself personally, we ordinarily deny his claim to the appellation of fanatic, and dub him an impostor. Judged by this harsh rule, the Yankee would sink to the position of a dissembling hypocrite. And yet, for all that, he is, no doubt, a sincere convert to his own peculiar type of fanaticism.

It would be in vain to search through the historical records or traditions of that peculiar people to find a single instance in which, either individually or collectively, they have indulged themselves in the luxury of any species of fanaticism which did not possess a money value, and promise in its progress or consummation a handsome return upon the profit side of the account current. It has always been so, from the landing of the "May Flower" to the days of Butler the Beast. Looking back to the period when the great-grandfathers of the present generation ruled the destinies of the New World, we discover that the favourite mode adopted by those saintly missionaries of the Cromwellian faith, to convert the heathen, was to subject the native tribes to the restraints of slavery, and afterwards to extend the field of their labours to the prolific coast of South Africa. Having seized upon their victims, and assembled them upon the deck of the slaver, a few psalms, a few prayers, a few admonitions, and the poor woolly-headed sinners were considered as converted to the true faith, and in the direct road to salvation. Having gained their immortal souls, the fortunate blacks might well afford to give up their perishing bodies as a recompense. "For, after all," reasoned the Yankee auctioneer upon the arrival of his cargo at the slave-mart—blasphemously reversing the original order of the words—"what matters it if a man lose the whole world, if he gains his immortal soul?" Who bids more for the body of the redeemed African? Going! Going!! Gone!!! at only 150 per cent. profit upon the absolute merchantable cost, without estimating the labour and toil of plucking him as a brand from the burning!

Under such auspices the Yankee slave dealer disposed of his human cargo, and in due time retired upon his gains, with the pleasant consciousness of having worthily discharged his duty to God and man. But, at length, the slave markets were closed by the peremptory refusal of the former purchasers to buy any more. Any other religious enthusiasts would have felt some degree of embarrassment in adjusting their fanaticism to the exigencies of the new position. Not so the Yankee of the type we are considering. Never yet has he permitted any other passion to blind him to the exigencies of the pocket. His slave ships were in a fair way to be left rotting in the harbour, and it became necessary to decide promptly what to do. He revolved the subject in his mind, slept on it a single night, and the slave dealer of yesterday awoke the next morning a raving, ranting, run-mad abolitionist. The full enormity of holding "men and brethren" as chattel property never disturbed his conscience before. He pondered deeply, but not long. It was a plain case that the Southern slave owners deserved punishment; but how inflict it in such manner as to redound to the pecuniary well-being of the saints? Very high tariffs on foreign imported merchandise would tend to drive away European competition. Navigation laws might be so constructed as to give the ship-carrying trade of the South to the ship owners and ship builders of the Union, wherever they might be found.

See how that system would work. New England capital was largely employed in manufactures. If the foreign articles should be excluded, the South would be compelled to buy from New England at very high prices; thus putting very great profits into Yankee pockets. But the Southern people were planters and agriculturists, and did not build ships. Of course foreign bottoms being excluded, Yankee ships would, without a competitor, become the carriers of Southern slave products. The system worked like a charm. The Yankee fanatic discovered more and more clearly every day that slavery was contrary to every principle of right, and in direct conflict with the laws of God; and in process of time he became fully satisfied that the only effectual mode by which the "arrogant slave power" could be kept in due subjection, was to absorb all the profits of slave labour for his own uses.

The system was twice blessed. First, in that it diminished the slaveholders' capacity for mischief; and next, that it augmented the facilities of the Yankee for saving souls, and making contributions to the underground railroad, whereby the tide of fugitive Africans from the South might be passed on through the inhospitable States of the North, to the more genial atmosphere of Canada. Notwithstanding his undoubted love and admiration for the negro, he always, with a self-abnegation worthy of all commendation, preferred to book his protégées on to the British province, as an asylum of greater security.

Ingenious romances by ingenious authors, founded upon not impossible, however improbable fictions, touching slavery, the slave, and the slave owner, were always sure cards. To heighten the effect and increase the demand there were interspersed within the pages of these, illustrative wood cuts, representing a poor fellow, very black, and intensely unhappy, undergoing chastisement, as was fully explained, for no offence whatever. Or, what was perhaps even more touching, a beautifully proportioned, full-busted, delicately-formed, long-haired, intellectual, and refined-looking mulattress, of melancholy aspect and tearful eye, standing upon the auction block, offered by her own father to the highest bidder, amongst a crowd of lascivious-looking rascals. When cent. per cent. is the stake, the expansive capacity of the Yankee fanatic's imagination seems wonderful, if we consider what a stern cold block of humanity he appears in the crude state.

But none amongst them are more firmly imbued with the beauties of the scriptural precept, that the labourer in the Lord's vineyard is worthy of his hire, than the priest fanatic. Whoever has entered the Brooklyn church, where the renowned Mr. Beecher utters his blasphemies, must have been struck with the vast number and beauty of the bouquets, prepared with flowers of every hue and odour, which literally cover the sacred desk, behind which stands the saintly fanatic. These nosegays are deposited there by the matrons and maidens of whom his congregation is chiefly composed. "The flowers are very sweet and very pretty," says the pious recipient. "They fill the whole atmosphere with their delicious perfume; but, alas!" philosophises the preacher, "the winds waft it away, and within a few fleeting hours their tints have faded. They gratify the senses for a brief time, but they do not feed the perishing body!" Is it wonderful that the hint should be sufficient, and that on succeeding occasions golden half-eagles and full eagles should be found dangling in little bags from the bunches of flowers? With such an appreciative audience, is it wonderful that his zeal against slave-holders should grow faster than his zeal for his religious faith; and that at last he should conclude that "a more effectual moral agency than the Bible," was the sharp twang of a "Sharp's rifle?"

War, however, has served to develop the electrical connexion between the pocket nerve and the fanaticism of the Yankee, even more clearly, if that were possible, than the long peace by which it was preceded. If there is one characteristic of the Yankee mind touching the negro more fully developed than another, it is his unconquerable aversion to any personal contact with him after he shall have become a freeman. Still, being in such close proximity to the four millions of Africans in the Southern States, it could not be otherwise than that a certain number should find their way to the land of wooden nutmegs, despite the stringent laws for their exclusion. Yankee ingenuity is scarcely ever at fault in an emergency which will at all admit of a favourable solution. The Governor of Massachusetts has shown himself, however, more clever in expedients than any of his brother fanatics of the New England States. The escaped slaves and freed blacks, who have been attracted to this State as the great head-quarters of Abolitionism, have ever been regarded by the inhabitants generally with a feeling closely akin to loathing. How to get rid of them has ever been a subject of grave consideration. But the Africans have steadily refused to go away voluntarily; and as there was no legal means of driving them away, they still dwelt amongst their inhospitable "brethren," content with the scantiest possible allowance of food and raiment. The shrewd fanatic who is at the head of affairs in the commonwealth whose capitol is Boston, has at length devised a means of performing a patriotic duty, and at the same time clearing the country of the hated "contrabands." He has determined to enrol all the able-bodied male Africans within the limits of his jurisdiction into military companies, and send them off to fight the battles of the Union in the pestilential rice swamps of the Carolinas. See the marvellous acuteness of this most fanatical negro-worshipper. He saves to the extent of his black enlistments the white citizens, and thus fills up the quota of Massachusetts for the Union army. He saves, in a great measure, the enormous bounties necessary to the employment of foreign mercenaries; and he disposes of the always troublesome question of what to do with the black inhabitants, by sending them away under auspices which bid fair to relieve the State altogether from their presence. In accomplishing these purposes, who will doubt that a fanatical admiration of the black man, and hatred of the black man's master in the South, filled the bosom of the sagacious Governor?

But if the smartness of the individual Yankee fanatic challenges our admiration, in what terms may we speak of the sagacity displayed by the Yankee States in the aggregate, in their management of the devastating war? With rare exceptions, produced by local causes, New England alone has been exempt from all the horrors of the desolating conflict which has been waged by the North against the South. No hostile foot has crossed her borders, and but few of her children have trusted their persons upon the field of danger and of death.

Within the brief space of two years the debt of the United States has expanded into such vast proportions, that the mind is scarcely capable of grasping at a glance the amount represented by the long line of figures required to express the sum total of Expenditures. All this vast array of numbers, running up from units to thousands of millions of dollars, represent moneys expended in clothing, equipping, and feeding the vast army, and building ships for the great navy of the United States. In truth, it may be said that this sum also represents a large part of the arms, clothing, and ships of war, of the Confederates. New England shipowners and builders have, in a great measure, supplied the vessels of war and the transports, New England manufacturers the arms and the clothing—and New England contractors have, to a considerable extent, monopolised the larger contract for the supply of the thousands of other articles which are consumed by armies. It would be safe to estimate that three-fourths of the money profits of the war have fallen to the share of New England and New Englanders, domiciled for the time being in other States, while all the burthens have fallen upon the Middle and Western States. The last named have furnished food at ruinously low rates to feed the Northern army, as well as the food for Southern rifles. The former have carried away the profits of the great war, considered in the light of a commercial speculation. Amid all the disasters and miseries which the conflict has brought upon both the North and the South, New England alone, has, without personal risk or danger, garnered a golden harvest. When the war closes, New England alone—her coffers filled with gold, and her inhabitants clothed “with purple and fine linen”—may survey the wide scene of desolation which lies beyond their borders, and return thanks to God that in avenging the black man’s wrongs, they had added so enormously to their worldly stores.

Is it wonderful that under such a state of facts, the thoughts of the great West should begin to turn towards peace; or that the voice of the Yankee fanatic should be still for war? What? succumb to the arrogant demands of the slave power to free itself from the dominion of the saints! Abandon the glorious cause of human rights—stop short in mid career before accomplishing the great task assigned by the Heavenly Father of the black man, while “green backs” are only 70 per cent. discount, and Yankee net profits at least the double of that sum! Perish the traitorous thought! Gird on the sword again, brave Western boys! and while you fight, the Yankee nation will work double time at the looms, to provide wherewith to keep you warm and comfortable. “God will not be let off with half-way work,” exclaims the pulpit fanatic, with an eye to the pecuniary interests of his compatriots. “One more united effort, and God’s work will have been achieved!” Ninety days more, and the rebellion will be crushed! Then “on to Richmond!”

The Confederate Loan.

The proposal for a loan of £3,000,000 sterling, to be issued in bonds at 90 per cent., for which Messrs. Emile Erlanger and Co., of Paris, are the contractors, was formally announced in London by the English agents, Messrs. J. Schroder and Co., on Wednesday evening, the 18th inst. The following prospectus fully explain the conditions:—

The bonds to bear interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum in sterling, from 1st of March, 1863, payable half-yearly in London, Paris, Amsterdam, or Frankfort.

The bonds exchangeable for cotton on application, at the option of the holder, or redeemable at par in sterling in twenty years, by half-yearly drawings, commencing 1st of March, 1864.

Agents for the contractors in London—Messrs. J. Schroder and Co., 145, Leadenhall-street.

This loan has been contracted with Messrs. Emile Erlanger and Co., bankers, of Paris, by the Government of the Confederate States of America, and is specially secured by an undertaking of the Government to deliver cotton to the holders of the bonds, on application after sixty days’ notice, on the footing aforementioned. The nature of the arrangement is fully set forth in Article IV. of the contract made with Messrs. E. Erlanger and Co., which is as follows:—“Each bond shall, at the option of the holder, be convertible at its nominal amount into cotton, at the rate of sixpence sterling for each pound of cotton—say 4,000 lb. of cotton for each bond of £100, or 2,500 francs; and this at any time not later than six months after the ratification of a treaty of peace between the present belligerents. Notice of the intention of converting bonds into cotton has to be given to the representatives of the Government in Paris or London, and sixty days after such notice the cotton will be delivered—if peace, at the ports of Charleston, Savannah, Mobile, or New Orleans; if war, at points in the interior of the country within ten miles of a railroad or stream navigable to the ocean. The delivery will be made free of all charges and duties, excepting the existing export duty of one-eighth of one cent per lb. The quality of the cotton to be the standard of New Orleans middling. If any cotton is of superior or inferior quality, the difference in value shall be settled by two brokers, one to be appointed by the Government, the other by the bondholder; whenever these two brokers cannot agree on the value an umpire is to be chosen, whose decision shall be final. It is at the same time provided that holders who do not convert their bonds into cotton shall be entitled to retain the bonds, and receive interest at the rate of 7 per cent per annum in sterling, payable half-yearly in London, Paris, Amsterdam, or Frankfort, at the option of the holder, until repayment of the principal at par. An annual sinking fund of 5 per cent. is provided for, whereby 2½ per cent of the bonds unredeemed by cotton shall be drawn by lot half-yearly; the first drawing to take effect on the 1st of March 1864, and to be continued on the 1st of September following, and on the 1st of March and the 1st of September in every succeeding year, so as finally to extinguish the loan in twenty years from the date of the first drawing.

The bonds to be issued at 90 per cent., which is to be paid as follows:—5 per cent on application, 10 per cent on allotment, 10 per cent 1st of May, 10 per cent 1st of June, 10 per cent 1st of July, 15 per cent 1st of August, 15 per cent 1st of September, less dividend 3½ per cent, 15 per cent 1st of October—£90. Subscribers will have the option of paying instalments in advance, on allotment, or on any of the above dates, under discount of 7 per cent per annum on such prepayments; but in default of due payment of the respective instalments, all previous payments will be liable to forfeiture. (By payment under discount, the price of the cotton is reduced to about 5½d. per lb.)

After allotment scrip certificates will be issued to bearers. These certificates, after payment of the last instalment, will be exchanged for bonds to “bearer,” in sums of £100, £200, £500, and £1,000 each, with coupons attached, payable 1st March, 1st September, as stated above. Arrangements have been made for the execution of the bonds in Paris. From the proceeds of the subscription the contractors and their agents are authorised to retain sufficient funds to pay the first two coupons. The drawings for the operation of the sinking fund will be duly advertised previous to the half-yearly redemption. An authenticated copy of the act of ratification of the contract may be inspected either at the offices of Messrs. Freshfields and Newman, the solicitors to the contractors, or of Messrs. Crowder, Maynard, and Co., solicitors to the agents of the contractors in London.

The loan was at a premium of 2½ per cent. on Wednesday evening; and on Thursday it was at 5 per cent. premium. It happened that on the same day (Thursday), other loans and securities generally were depressed. The Italian loan, introduced by Messrs. Rothschild, was at three-eighths discount to one-eighth premium, and the £3,000,000 called for in London was not subscribed. The new Danish loan of £500,000, which consists of bonds paid to contractors for railroads, was at ¼ discount. Russian Scrip was quoted at par. The only Government Scrip at a premium, besides the Confederate, was the Portuguese, which was quoted at 2½ to 3 premium. In the share list of the Times of Friday, under the date of Thursday evening, it is stated:—“In the share market to-day the business was again of a very limited amount, and in sympathy with Consols; the variations from yesterday’s closing prices in most of the descriptions, except colonial, tended downwards. * * In American, Virginia (6 per cent) recovered ½, and United States receded 2½.” Notwithstanding various attempts to dissuade the public from taking the loan, the applications by 2 o’clock on Saturday, when the lists were closed, were known in London to be for at least five times the amount asked for. The Daily News of Monday last remarks, “It appears that the contractors estimate the total applied for at about £15,000,000; but as they have not yet received the final reports from the Continent, some additions may be made to this heavy amount.”

The astonishing success of this, the first foreign loan of the Confederate States, is by far the greatest triumph they have yet achieved either in arms or by diplomacy. It is a proof that capital, always so sensitive, so instinctively prudent, knowing full well by the experience of the past year that the torch or confiscation awaits the security upon which the loan is based, should the Confederate territory become the spoil of the invader, entertains no longer a doubt of the stability of the Confederate Government, and its ability to preserve the integrity of its dominions. It is, in fact, financial recognition, scarcely, if at all, less important than diplomatic recognition would be. As it is a striking proof of confidence in the fortunes of the young nationality, so also is it a proof of no less implicit confidence in its honour. Great efforts had of late been made to reflect upon the credit of the Confederacy by resuscitating the almost forgotten repudiation of Mississippi, and by connecting with that act the name of President Davis. We have neither the desire nor at present the access to the circumstantial details of the facts, to decide whether or no that repudiation was in any degree justifiable, or what, if any, extenuating circumstances attended it. But this much has been rendered manifest by the recent investigation of the subject, that Mr. Davis, whom the slanderous tongue of Northern hatred has not scrupled to style “the father of repudiation,” was not even in public life when this transaction took place, that he never gave a vote for it, nor was in anywise connected with it; and that the most he stands charged with is having repelled, while a representative of that State many years afterwards, some hostile and injurious imputations against his constituency. Whatever may have been the delinquency of Mississippi—and of this, we repeat, we are not prepared to judge—the financial world has now given the common sense verdict, that her fault cannot justly affect the credit of the Confederacy of which she is a member, any more than it affected that of the United States while she continued one of them, and was not then the only repudiating State among the number.

THE GROWTH OF THE WHIG PARTY.

General Jackson’s successor inherited all the responsibility of his obnoxious measures, without the personal popularity which had enabled him to carry out the most objectionable portions of his policy in despite of all opposition. Commercial and financial distress, aggravated perhaps by the sudden refusal of the Treasury towards the close of Jackson’s term to receive paper in payment of dues to the Government, contributed to excite popular feeling against Mr. Van Buren, who had completely identified himself with the policy of his predecessor; and he failed to obtain his re-election. Since that time no President of the United States has held office for a second period—a circumstance which may be reckoned among the many signs of a change for the worse in the character of the Government. No doubt there are many arguments against the re-eligibility of a Republican chief magistrate, and a President elected for a period of six or eight years might with propriety be rendered incapable of immediate re-election. But the change, occurring when it did, appears to have arisen rather from a want of authority in the men chosen, and a want of stability in American politics, than from any public conviction of the inexpediency of the earlier practice, sanctioned as it was by the example and express approval of the principal founders of the Union.

It was under Van Buren that the sub-treasury scheme became law; and from that time the chief distinction discernible between the Whigs and Democrats is the attachment of the latter to this measure, and the preference of the former for a national bank. The Whigs, under the able leadership of Henry Clay, were rapidly gaining ground, especially in the Northern States, to whose confidence they were recommended by their protectionist predilections. They were able twice to defeat the sub-treasury bill, with the aid of a certain section of malcontent Democrats, who in time became identified with them; and in 1840 they succeeded in carrying their candidate for the Presidency. On that occasion the Abolitionists for the first time appeared as a distinct party; but their numbers were altogether insignificant. The Whig candidates, Gen. Harrison and Mr. Tyler, were elected by 231 votes out of 294. Exactly a month after his inauguration Gen. Harrison died. Mr. Tyler, who succeeded, of course, to the Presidency, was one of the seceders from the Democratic party, and had been nominated with a view to the conciliation of that section of the coalition. Soon after his accession to office he quarrelled with his Whig Cabinet, and was deserted by them, and formally renounced by the party. The occasion of the dispute was the rejection by the President of a bill for the establishment of a national bank, framed with the concurrence of his ministers, and with the express view of meeting what were understood to be his own wishes. The quarrel did much to break up the growing strength of the Whigs, and secure the next election to their adversaries.

In the meantime, sectional disputes had been growing more and more frequent and angry, and the danger of disruption had more than once seemed ominously near. The two chief contests took place on the "Right of Petition," as it was called, and on the annexation of Texas.

In 1833 the enemies of slavery organised the "National Anti-Slavery Society," and began to hold public meetings, at which language was used less violent than that which has become common of late years, but strong enough to provoke warm resentment in the South. There, meetings were held denouncing the Abolitionists, at which, apparently, as is the wont of platform orators, a good deal of angry nonsense was talked; and some State authorities went so far as to offer rewards for the delivery into their hands of certain prominent agitators at the North. This was, of course, a mere piece of bravado, as was the demand of the Governor of Alabama for the extradition of one of the offenders, a citizen of New York; for it could by no means be maintained that the Abolitionists of the North had rendered themselves amenable to the State laws of Alabama or Georgia; but, like all bravado, it was in very bad taste, provoked insulting retorts, and could serve no good purpose whatever. At that time, moreover, the Northern people generally had little sympathy with the fanaticism of the Abolitionists. Their meetings were frequently broken up by force, and their orators occasionally maltreated. But, as no legislative measures were adopted to coerce those who, while living under the law of the Union, were avowedly conspiring against the institutions of several of the States, and proposing to plunder, by one means or other, the citizens of those States of a large portion of their property, the South was still dissatisfied. Nor was its dissatisfaction so unreasonable as it may appear to English readers. When Englishmen agitated for the abolition of slavery, they were labouring to do that which the Government of which they were subjects and constituents had a right to do, and to do it by no other than legal means. For exciting servile insurrection they could have been punished by English law; and their right to endeavour by all peaceful means to induce Parliament to exercise its authority in any way they thought just or desirable could hardly be questioned. But when a citizen of New York agitated against slavery, he was endeavouring to assail an institution over which no Government wherewith he had any concern—neither the Government of his State nor that of the Union—had any jurisdiction. Yet, by whatever means he endeavoured to accomplish his purpose, he could be punished neither by the law of New York nor by that of the United States. And the demand of the South, therefore, was simply this: first, that citizens of one State should not meddle with the institutions of another; and secondly, that if they did so, they should be coerced by the legislature of their own State. The citizens of Massachusetts had no more to do with slavery in South Carolina than Englishmen have to do with serfdom in Russia or with the conscription in France. But he could not fairly claim the same license to discuss Southern slavery, denounce it, and agitate against it, that Englishmen might claim in regard to Russian servitude or French conscriptions; and this because he was the citizen of a State in the most close and intimate alliance with those whose institutions he claimed the right to endeavour to subvert. Towards those States he had at once the duties of a fellow-citizen and the disabilities of an alien. This may seem an anomaly, but it is an anomaly inseparable from the Federal form of Government. It would appear, therefore, that the demand of the South was substantially just, and that the threat of disunion, by which South Carolina tried to enforce compliance, was not unreasonable. As the matter was further discussed, and the contention grew more warm, another dispute arose out of the same question. The South complained that the mail was made the vehicle for the diffusion of incendiary publications in the Slave States, and demanded that Abolitionist prints should be excluded from it. The North, on the other hand, refused to allow to the Postmasters, or to the Postmaster-General a right of censorship over the mails. There was a good deal to be said on both sides. On the one hand, looking at the matter from the point of view of the South, it was certainly wrong that a Federal service should be used as a means of political warfare against the institutions of individual States and the property of their citizens. On the other hand, it was not easy to answer the protest of those who, ignoring the separate sovereignty of the States, declared that no public official could have the right of confining the use of the mails to one class of publications, or one political party.

A yet more angry discussion arose out of the presentation to Congress of petitions against slavery. The Anti-Slavery Society, hard pressed by the constitutional argument, were forced at last to issue a manifesto denying all idea of meddling with slavery in the Slave States, and to confine their action to attacks on its existence in the district of Columbia (embedded between and formed out of the territory of two Slave States), and in the Territories. But the tone of their petitions, the spirit of their action, and the purport of their arguments, were really directed against slavery in general, and were not unnaturally treated as wilful insults by citizens of the Northern against the representatives of the Southern States. It was as if the House of Commons were constantly assailed by petitions from the boroughs, insulting and reviling the members for the counties. In 1836 the first severe check was given to this kind of petition. In spite of the opposition of Mr. Adams (late president), and others, the House of Representatives determined that Congress had no power over slavery in the States—a question on which, one would have thought, there could be no manner of doubt—and that all petitions relating to slavery should be laid on the table, without being discussed, printed, or referred. Mr. Adams persisted, nevertheless, in presenting petitions, and demanding action upon each, in defiance of this "standing order." A bill to prohibit the transmission of Abolition pamphlets and papers by mail was introduced into the Senate, but failed to pass. The House finally adopted a standing order, in much the same terms as that just mentioned, which precluded the further presentation of abolitionist petitions. This rule remained in force till 1845.

The independence of Texas was recognised by Congress in 1837. In the next year its annexation was proposed by Mr. Preston, of South Carolina, in the House of Representatives; but the proposal was got rid of by a motion to "lay it on the table"—ayes, 127; noes, 68. In 1843 the question was again agitated; and in 1844 a treaty of annexation, negotiated by Mr. Calhoun as Secretary of State, was rejected by the Senate. Next year the vote of annexation passed the House, with a proviso extending the line of Missouri compromise to the territory belonging to or claimed by Texas—ayes, 112 Democrats and 8 Whigs; noes, 70 Whigs and 28 Democrats. In the Senate, a similar resolution was carried by 27 to 25, every Senator being present; and on the last day of Mr. Tyler's tenure of office, the annexation was approved by him.

In the meantime two questions connected with slavery had excited a good deal of sectional animosity, and had been the theme of angry discussion, both in and out of Congress. The first was the case of the Amistad, a Spanish vessel, bound from one Spanish port to another, having on board a cargo of slaves, who seized on the ship and murdered the crew. She fell into the hands of an American man-of-war off the coast of Connecticut. Spain claimed the restoration of the vessel and slaves. This case came before the Supreme Court; Mr. Adams pleaded the cause of the negroes, and Mr. Justice Story pronounced a decree for their liberation.

The other case was that of the American brig Creole, for New Orleans from Richmond, with tobacco and slaves. Here again the slaves mutinied, murdered one of the crew, and carried the vessel into Nassau. Mr. Webster, then Secretary of State, demanded indemnification; which the British Government refused. On the 21st of March, 1842, Mr. Giddings introduced into the House a series of resolutions taking substantially the view of the case adopted by Great Britain, affirming that, once outside of the State jurisdiction of Virginia, the slaves violated no law of the United States by an attempt to recover their liberty by force; and that the exertion of the Federal power for the protection of the "commerce in human beings" would be subversive of the rights of the Free-States and incompatible with the national honour. A furious storm was excited, by the offensive phraseology, perhaps, rather than by the substance of these resolutions, and a vote of censure on Mr. Giddings was carried by 125 to 69. He resigned his seat, but was immediately re-elected by his constituents in the State of Ohio. It was plain that sectional feeling was becoming more and more preponderant; and that the issue between slavery and abolition would be that on which the fiercest political contests were henceforth to be expected.

The annexation of Texas—substantially a sectional question—was the ground on which the Presidential campaign of 1844 was fought out. Henry Clay, who, on the whole, disapproved of the measure, was the candidate of the Whigs; but his position as a slaveholder deprived him of the support of the Abolitionists. Mr. Van Buren, who was at first the favourite of the Democrats, was withdrawn in favour of James K. Polk, who was known to be more decidedly the partisan of annexation. The electoral vote stood for Clay 105, for Polk 170. The popular vote was for the latter 1,335,000, and for the former 1,297,000. The Abolition candidate, Mr. Burney, polled 64,000 voters; and the perversity of that faction in bringing him forward excited the bitter animadversion of the Whigs. Mr. Polk owed his election principally to this error on their part, and in some measure also to his protestations of obstinate adherence to the extreme pretensions of the United States in regard to the Oregon territory; pretensions which he finally consented to modify to a very important extent.

At this time parties were very nearly balanced. The Whigs had a preponderance in the Northern States; they had also a certain amount of support in the Southern, and especially in the Border States, due in no small measure to the high personal character and popularity of their leader, Mr. Clay. The Democrats had a strong minority in the North, and a complete ascendancy in the South. The former were in favour of a strongly protective tariff, of a National Bank, and for the most part of restrictions on the development of slavery, and on the admission of new Slave States; but they were not Abolitionists, and were not disposed to violate the Constitution, as they understood it, or to endanger the Union, by provoking a sectional conflict. The Democrats understood better the danger which really threatened the Union, and were, therefore, more eager in their desire to avert it. They insisted on the protection of Southern rights, on a tariff constructed merely for purposes of revenue, and on the sub-treasury scheme. The Abolitionists were as yet insignificant in number, as they have always been in character; but their influence, from this time, was steadily on the increase.

*THE 10th volume of the Supplementary Despatches, Correspondence, and Memoranda of the great Captain only brings us down to the year 1815. There seems to be no end to Wellington literature, and it is probable that before the close of the century, the governors of the National Library may deem it necessary to devote an entire wing of the Bloomsbury building to books relating to Wellington, and to compile a Wellington catalogue. Not that we think too much has been said and written about the man who was destined to play such an important part in that vast struggle to which we are indebted for the civilization and advancement of the nineteenth century. Opinions differ as to whether the Iron Duke was a greater commander than Napoleon, and some persons will not admit that he was deservedly eminent as a politician and statesman, but no one can dispute that he was endowed with the strength, capacity, and genius for hard work. His contemporaries did not esteem him a busy man, because he always had time for social intercourse, yet we cannot but marvel at the mass of work he got through, and how little he was assisted. The office of Secretary to the Duke must have been, we mean compared to the labour that might have been expected, something like a sinecure. In all the correspondence, from despatches to Government and private letters to Ministers to notes on passing affairs, the one mind is present in every line; and it is plain that when the Duke did not write with his own hand, he was not content with giving general instructions, but sketched out the entire communication for his Secretary. The hard work was to some extent the result of special circumstances. A man may be as gifted, as methodical, and as industriously inclined as was the Duke of Wellington; but if he has not the same opportunity of always finding something worth doing to be done, he will not be able to get through so much business. The volume before us refers to the era when the Duke belonged to Europe as the arbiter of her destinies, and it contains much that is curious—a little that the Orleanists and Bourbons will consider slightly irrelevant, and a few items that may convince M. Thiers, M. Victor Hugo, and the legion of writers who have lately been so fiercely and vindictively fighting the battle of Waterloo on paper, that they have blundered egregiously, and that it is better not to try the experiment of hiding incontrovertible facts with cobweb theories that are blown away with the slightest breath of criticism. After 1815 the Duke was engaged at home in reconciling democracy with aristocracy and republican freedom with royal prerogative; and in no small degree to his industry, influence, and unselfish patriotism, do we owe our internal concord and our constitutional progress. We know it is the fashion to decry the Duke's civil career; but when the dust of another generation has settled on his tomb, when the party conflicts which raged in the beginning of the century are only remembered historically, what he did as a politician and a statesman will be regarded as a fitting sequel to his illustrious conduct as a warrior. Immediately after Waterloo the Duke was the idol of Europe, and doubly the idol of England, yet he became so exceedingly unpopular as to be mobbed in the streets of London. That unpopularity does him infinite honour. He stood, as it were, between the throne and the people; and cheerfully bore much of the odium that would otherwise have been heaped upon royalty. The Duke was opposed to change; he was, in fact, a Tory of the old school; but when change could no longer be justly resisted, he gave way, and unlike Sir Robert Peel, managed to take his party with him. The importance of this policy is incalculable, for whilst it did not foster agitation it made revolution impossible; but if the Duke had cared more for popularity than for duty he would have pursued a different course. He lived to reap the reward of his self-sacrifice. Ere he died he was not only the trusted adviser of the Crown, but once more the idol of the nation, and he was truly entitled to the warm gratitude and entire confidence of the Queen and people. We believe that the succeeding volumes of this work will tend to make Englishmen appreciate better the civil labours of the Duke of Wellington, by making them better and more generally understood.

†THE author of "Such Things Are" has made a strange mistake in the title of that novel. It should have been called "Such Things Are Not," for assuredly there are no people on earth like unto the fictitious personages in it, and such deeds are not done except on the stages of those minor theatres that do not trouble the Lord Chamberlain for licences, or for permission to perform such exciting dramas as "Blood for Blood," or, "The Mysterious Cow-house." If the author ever thought of a plot he has evidently forgotten to put it in, or reserved it for another novel that we are promised, and which we suppose is to be a kind of key to the present exceedingly dull and heavy riddle. We confess we cannot understand the book, and the author may think, by way of consolation, that our confused notion of "Such Things Are," is the result of obtuseness, not to say of imbecility. We are in the position of the child taking physic—we do not know the object of the mixture, or what is in it, but we do know that it is uncommodiously nasty. There is a murder, or murders, that "won't out," at least in the present novel; and there is a lord who has done very wicked things, but we do not exactly know what, why, when, or wherefore. A young woman is saved from a watery grave by a coastguardman, marries him, and repents of her bargain; but what she has to do with the story we cannot imagine, unless it shall appear that she has had a hand in the murder or murders. The Waterloo Bridge mystery was not half so puzzling as "Such Things Are." Everybody seems to have done some dreadful deed, or else to know the secret of some other person's crime. A gentleman of strong feeling breaks a blood-vessel, because somebody accuses his wife of having something to do with some murder, or, it may be, because he himself has had something to do with some murder or murders. Another person who threatens to reveal something he knows about somebody else is poisoned, but by whom he is poisoned is not quite clear. It would be unfair not to mention one advantage that "Such Things Are" has over ordinary novels. When young ladies are recruiting at the sea-side, and from stress of weather, are obliged to remain in those uncomfortable pens, commonly called sea-side lodgings, there is a great rush to the circulating library, and much disappointment is experienced by first volumes being out. Now in the case of "Such Things Are," it does not matter which volume is read first, and we are not sure that it will not be advantageous to read it backwards. Moreover as there is no plot, young ladies may skip ad lib. without doing the author injustice.

THE QUESTION OF RECOGNITION IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

LORD CAMPBELL'S MOTION.

On Monday Lord Campbell's motion, previously postponed in consequence of the indisposition of Lord Russell, was brought before the House. The following is a full report of Lord Campbell's speech on that occasion. For the convenience of the reader we have arranged the different subjects under appropriate heads.

THE SITUATION.

My Lords,—Although I know that no apology is requisite for calling the attention of the House to the papers for which I moved in August last, and which have lately been presented, I am anxious and impatient to point out the exact view with which that motion is submitted to you. I do not wish to raise a question on the course which Government have taken as regards American affairs during the autumn. The question I propose is wholly seated in the future. The facts which led to it are known and easy to recall to you. During the whole of the last Session France and Great Britain were alleged, and were believed to act together on the difficulties which the civil war might generate. Since then they have diverged, or rather in the memorable phrase of a noble friend now absent from his place (Lord Clarendon), have seemed to drift from one another. In November we restrained the French Government in a course which they desired to take; in January the Emperor by himself pursued a second line of action, meant, like the first, to terminate hostilities. That line of action having failed, all thoughts of intervention, mediation, and remonstrance being exploded by the insolent reply of Mr. Seward, the Emperor being anxious still to close the war as he has proved himself, and having paid to the Government of Washington every debt of justice and of courtesy, the question of recognising the insurgents may at any moment come before us as the question of attempting to obtain an armistice was urged upon the country in November. Were it not that for some weeks past Poland has engaged the world, before now it might have reached us. As things stand, it will find us in the worst condition to receive it, without conviction one way or the other in either party of the State by the avowal of their leaders. A fatal error might arise not from an erroneous view, but from the want of any. It is at such a moment, if ever, that Parliamentary debate is useful and admissible; when of two opposite opinions on a question rapidly impending, neither can be said to prevail over the other, and no man on earth guesses by what our conduct will be guided. It is, therefore, with a view to a distinct and practical result that I have given noble lords the opportunity of speaking on America. It could not have been done in any other form, because a resolution to reject the action of the Government would have justly been resisted, and its withdrawal would be most disastrous to the 8,000,000 men whose claims are now before you.

PRACTICAL EFFECTS OF RECOGNITION.

The opinion I am anxious to maintain is that the divergence, of France and Great Britain on America ought not to go further, but to cease, and that when France invites us to acknowledge Southern independence, we should neither hold her back nor let her move alone, but on the contrary, act with her. And by acknowledgment, I mean the course of sending an ambassador to the insurgent, or of receiving his ambassador, or of engaging in a treaty with him, or of seeking equivalents from him for the consuls in his territory. The first impression I should wish to combat very briefly is, that the acknowledgment by neutral States of Southern independence would have no practical effects and no important consequences. It seemed to be that of a noble Earl over the way, who lately held the Foreign seals, at the beginning of the Session. But if acknowledgment is wholly immaterial, why has the South continued to demand, and the North so long and pertinaciously endeavoured to avert it? Why are Southern envoys now in London and in Paris, and why was the Government of Washington prepared at every cost but that of war to intercept them? Why have the Envoys, on arriving, made acknowledgment the simple object of their mission, and why has Mr. Seward sent to the different Powers a volume of despatches to resist it? It has reached me from credible authorities that last year the planters began to grow cotton when acknowledgment was looked for, and ploughed it in when the hope expired. It happened in this manner the planters viewed acknowledgment as the road to peace, were ready to invest their capital in the ordinary way when that road was likely to be opened; and it may well occur to them as having such a tendency. From the Northern mind it would take away the hope of Southern subjugation; from the Government of Washington it would take away the power of describing eleven communities contending for their liberty as rebels. The people of America are influenced by phrases, and will not come to terms with what they have been hounded on to look at as rebellion. But they can see a fact when Europe blazes it before them, and they will be awakened by her judgment to the nature of the foreign war on which their treasure and their happiness are wasted. When Europe has acknowledged it the independence of the South may be debated in the Senate and the House, where no one now can venture to advert to it. A probable result of such a measure, if pursued by France, Great Britain, and other neutral States together, is, that it would weaken in the Executive at Washington its borrowing ability, because their loans are founded on the chances of reconquest; and reconquest would then appear what it is, a vision and a mockery. And it would do so with good reason. Victorious already, animated then, the Southern armies would be doubly irresistible; they would not have, if they retained it now, the power to be vanquished. Another practical effect of recognition would be that the belligerents might then endeavour to negotiate, which it is clear they cannot do at present. A separate result would be to put an end to all the idle dreams of reconstruction and of union which are floating in America, and which serve to prolong the war, because they disincite the North to the only basis upon which the close of it is possible. A yet more serious result the measure promises is freedom to the Government of Washington from the necessity of hopeless war which weighs on it at present. As soon as Europe sanctions its retreat, the greater portion of its evils are annihilated. As long as Europe sanctions its attempt, to renounce it is to suffer an indignity which never fell upon a State engaged in war with insurrection since modern history opened its varied scenes to our notice. Noble lords who recollect how, after it had lasted forty years, the civil war between Spain and Holland was influenced in 1607-9 by the diplomacy of France and England, may be led to think in what form the present struggle might adjust itself. But they will also see that the efforts of the two Powers would have been as vain as they were brilliant and successful, unless Europe had before acknowledged the insurgent. I will not dwell upon the instance. It must engage the study of every minister or sovereign who aspires to the lofty task of closing the hostilities before us.

PRINCIPLE ON WHICH INSURGENT POWERS OUGHT TO BE ACKNOWLEDGED.

The next doctrine which stands in the way of the conclusion I am pointing to, is even more important to consider, because in this House it received a kind of sanction on February 5, from the noble Earl who leads the opposition, and who had the manliness to state that in responding it he differed from the mass of his supporters. It has been laid down that you should recognise insurgent Powers when you are going to give material assistance to their cause, or when the civil war is over, that neutrals should reserve their voice until arms have fallen from the weak and fainting hands of the belligerents. Whether or not such ought to be the principle, it is not, as examples show, that on which the Powers of either world have generally acted. So far from the cessation of hostilities preceding the acknowledgment of neutrals, the acknowledgment of neutrals has in nearly every case preceded the cessation of hostilities. I fully understand that the cases of Belgium under Lord Grey, Greece under the Duke of Wellington, Holland under Queen Elizabeth, ought to be excluded, because in all three material assistance and diplomatic intercourse were blended. But the United States acknowledged Nicaragua under Walker before hostilities had ceased to menace the existence of his Government; they acknowledged the South American Republics rising against Spain before the effort to reduce them was exhausted. When Colonel Mann was sent by the Government of Washington to Hungary, in 1848-9, he was instructed to acknowledge the seceding kingdom, not when hostilities had ceased, but when its independence could be counted on; and he reserved the voice he was invested with, not because he was controlled by the presence of Austrian troops, but by the chances—and he reasoned well—of the insurgents being reconquered. He did not find a settled, but a migratory Government, which fled from post to post, instead of meeting the invaders at its capital. But if we pass to Europe, France acknowledged the United States revolting against England before Lord North renounced his efforts to subdue them. It is idle to assert that Lord North engaged in war on such a provocation. All who read the memorandum drawn up by Mr. Gibbon for the Government, and do not fancy themselves better versed than him in the opinions of the statesmen who instructed him, know that Lord North began war with France on a different provocation. And what if he did not? Is Lord North, after he had marred his reputation by a civil war which all the men who formed the glory of that epoch denounced as wicked and demented, to be held up as a master of public law and an oracle on international proceedings? Is the Minister of the day, no matter what may be his character or what may be his errors, virtute officii an heir to the authority of Bynkershoek or Grotius? So much for France. Great Britain was tardy in acknowledging the South American republics. But that tardiness was reprobated by a brilliant and enlightened opposition, of which the noble lord the Secretary of State was not an inconsiderable ornament. And that tardiness was partially imposed by a generous regard for Spain, invaded as she was in 1823. It was justified moreover by the hazard of breaking with the great allies with whom, long after 1815, we had been acting, to whom, in 1823, France had become subservient, and who viewed the cause of the South American republics with aversion. It was not public law or abstract rules, but special facts and policy and prudence which guided the Ministry in that instance. The next and last example I shall give will make one independent of the others I have mentioned. It surpasses all the rest in magnitude and clearness; it tallies with the question now before the world in nearly every point, and it is one in which not a single State but Europe may be said herself to have delivered—and that in times far more monarchical, and therefore more averse to revolution than our own—a judgment on the question of acknowledgment. Great Britain, France, Sweden, Holland, all formed treaties with Portugal, seceding from the rule of Spain in 1641, a year after the Duke and Duchess of Braganza had proclaimed its independence, a quarter of a century before the Crown of Spain resolved to acquiesce in it. At that time Prussia had not come into existence as a State, Prussia had not begun to mingle in the politics of Europe. Austria was attached to Spain by ties of family, and therefore the four recognising States may be fairly said to have composed a general tribunal of the Continent. So far from having ceased, the Spanish effort to reconquer by intrigue, conspiracies, and arms went on till after 1665, with a variety of fortune. The Duchess of Braganza, who became regent, and on whose fortitude and judgment the success of the insurgents hung, employed the celebrated Schomberg as a general. Don John of Austria led the Spanish armies against Portugal. The battle of Villa Vicosa took away at last the hopes of the invaders. The war lingered on. In 1668, Spain and Portugal negotiated peace with one another. Was Europe acting then against the principles which ought to have directed her? Is there anything in Grotius, Bynkershoek, Vattel, Von Martens, Wheaton to condemn her? I have deemed it no less than a duty to examine all these writers on the question of acknowledgment. But it is not a duty to inflict quotations on your lordships. The references are with me here, and they will be at the command of any member who desires them. A shorter method will enable me to show that the authorities agree in holding the power to maintain its independence, not the close of efforts to subdue it, to be the condition upon which a neutral may acknowledge an insurgent. Sir James Mackintosh, in a celebrated speech of 1824 upon the South American Republics, insists with glowing approbation on the case of Portugal, which I have brought under the notice of your lordships. He does not question, but applauds the conduct of the recognising Powers. He does not hold it up to be avoided as an error, but, on the contrary, to be regarded as a brilliant lesson in his day; and your lordships well know that Sir James Mackintosh was the disciple, the exponent, the successor, and the equal of the great men who have moulded public law into a science. You well know that what he sanctions they have sanctioned, and that when he unreservedly subscribes to what Europe did in 1641, Europe must have acted on their principle. The principle of such men appears to be that the hazard of reconquest is the only bar to acknowledgment when it is likely to accelerate a peace and benefit the country which extends it. Should the insurgent yield after the acknowledgment of neutrals, their judgment is rebuked, their action vain, and they have given useless umbrage to the Power ultimately dominant. But it is not correct according to the law of nations and the history of the world to aver that the struggle must be over; the last army routed; the last shilling spent; the last drop of blood exhausted by the combatants. The vocation of acknowledgment is rather to preserve than to destroy, and by diplomacy to give a quicker passage to the end, which the long and sanguinary road of arms would ultimately point to. When you cannot advise the older state to persevere and when you denounce its efforts, and when you prophesy its failures, and when you cannot recommend the younger state to yield, what can be more cruel or irrational than to prolong hostilities between them? But by the reservation of acknowledgment you do prolong hostilities between them. The effort to reconquer has never been renounced, and scarcely ever been suspended, until neutrals had acknowledged the insurgent, from the civil war between Switzerland and Austria in the Middle Ages down to that which rages at this moment. And such a general result is what the plainest reason would have led us to anticipate. While neutrals countenance his hopes, is the invading Power likely to recede from them? Can he proclaim without suggestion his defeat? Can he embrace without authority his own humiliation? Can he assure bystanders he has sunk, while they by silence still imply he may rally? It is not, therefore, easy to defend the conduct of a neutral who indirectly calls out for battles, and imposes expeditions with a foregone conclusion, that they must be useless for their purpose. But it is said, may you acknowledge an insurgent destined to succeed, while hostile armies are encamped in portions of his territory? My lords, if you may not, you should withdraw your representatives from any country which becomes the seat of war. We ought, at least, to have withdrawn our minister from Spain in 1823, when France unfortunately marched without resistance on its capital. In accordance, therefore, with experience, authorities, and reason, I submit to this House, you may acknowledge the insurgent as soon as no doubt remains upon the issue of the struggle.

IS THE ISSUE DOUBTFUL?

And is the issue doubtful?—The capitalists of London, Frankfurt, Paris, Amsterdam, are not of that opinion. Within the last few days the Southern loan has reached the highest place in our market. £3,000,000 were required, £9,000,000 were subscribed for. The loan is based upon the security of cotton; and it has been well known for a twelvemonth that as far as the invaders march, that security must perish. But what is the opinion of military men upon the issue? The Emperor of the French having been brought up as a soldier—having given a long life to military science, and having recently commanded the greatest armies of the day at Solferino and Magenta—in the despatch of November last did not conceal from the Government of Washington that subjugation was impossible. The Princes of the House of Orleans, who served with General McClellan, are thought to have inspired the excellent account of the campaign which appeared on October 15 in the Revue des Deux Mondes, and which has also tended to disperse the vision of reconquest. To the same scale of judgment, General Scott appears, by recent revelations, to contribute. And this, too, is remarkable. Not one military person in the North is known to view reconquest as attainable. Neither Gen. McClellan, Burnside, Rosecranz, McDowell, Halleck, or Buell, have ever publicly declared, so far as it has reached us, that the object of the Government they serve under is feasible. The cheap ignominious task of prophesying triumph, has been wisely left to the voluminous despatch writer, who, whatever he his virtues or accomplishments, is no more qualified to judge the issue of campaigns than he is to guide the movements of battalions. But, after all, it may be granted in the abstract, that reconquest is attainable; to genius nothing is denied. The only question it becomes the neutral Powers to consider is, can it be attained by Mr. Lincoln and his colleagues? It is by Mr. Lincoln and his colleagues, if at all, the South is to be conquered. There is not any person in their armies, such as Britain proudly watched in the Peninsula, able to control a Government behind, or overwhelm an enemy in front of him. If there was, they would recall him. It is, therefore, necessary to inquire what proof, then, of its ability has this aggressive Cabinet developed. Is it in its choice of expeditions or of viceroys? Is it in appointing, superseding, or replacing the commanders it must lean on? Is it in their firm adherence to a principle? At one time they were opposed to the invasion they have plunged into. Is it in their conduct about slavery? At one time they boasted of their disposition to maintain it. Soon after they desired the Border States to be delivered from it. After that emancipation was declared, but only in the States which were resisting them. The loyal region might preserve the institution—but seceders must renounce it. It ought to flourish where they reign—but not to stand beyond the limits of their sovereignty. But next, a bankrupt treasury would buy it by an outlay equal to the public debt of our country. But after all, a servile war was indispensable, and so were armies to enforce it. A servile war, however, was proclaimed. The proclamation cannot be considered as unprecedented. The model was before them. Lord of Nature, as he deemed himself, Xerxes ordered lashes to be given to the waves. Swelling with omnipotence, Mr. Lincoln and his colleagues dictate insurrection to the slaves of Alabama. Are these the movements of a Government by which the broken fragments of the Union can be welded, a mighty Continent subdued, 8,000,000 free men braced into a unit, robbed of home, of honour, and of freedom? But who are they arrayed against? The House ought not, indeed, to join in the encomiums on the Southern President, which heat and sympathy have prompted. As no one was deemed happy by the ancients until his life had closed, no one will be stamped as great by us until his enterprise has triumphed. But so much may be hazarded of this extraordinary man that, gifted amply by nature, he has made the union of political and military excellence his object, and that as far as Europe has observed, in the midst of danger and of care such as few men have the power to imagine, fewer to sustain, he has exhibited the patience and the enterprise, the ardour and the coolness, the heroism and urbanity, for which it generally happens that nations draw their birth and civil wars accept their destination. And this is most important to remember—if we look back to such conjunctures we do not find an instance in which mind, character, capacity have yielded to the want of all, no matter how well sustained the latter as regards forces, numbers, and revenue. The Roman Commonwealth, in spite of territory, population, armies, and resources, was destroyed from wanting any mind by which the mind of Cæsar could be balanced and encountered. Holland was lost to Spain when the Prince of Orange and Prince Maurice were superior to all the viceroys and the captains the mother country could oppose to them. Her South American dependencies were gone when she had no opponent of Bolivar. Your Lordships do not want to go back to the enlightened pages of Davila or Sully to remind you that the civil wars of France, after every kind of trial and of vicissitude, all closed in the pre-eminence of Henry IV., in head and heart the master of his epoch. The Carlists had not any match for Espartero, the Sardinians had not any equal of Radetzky. The same lesson is impressed on us by the collision of Washington and George III., of Charles I. and Cromwell. It is true indeed that history need not repeat itself, and that events are neither bound by theories or precedents. But such experience at least may forcibly suggest to us that had the Ruler of the world designed Southern subjugation, an instrument more powerful than that of Mr. Lincoln and his colleagues would be seen conducting to his purpose. It is not going beyond the bounds of caution to allege that a new chapter will be opened in the annals of mankind, if on this unrivalled scene the qualities which they regard with scorn are found triumphant over those which they agree to follow and to reverence. But last of all, if Mr. Lincoln and his colleagues could succeed against the leader and the armies which oppose them, could they succeed against their own consciousness—revealed to us by many signs—of incapacity to do so?

GREAT BRITAIN BOUND TO RECOGNISE BY HONOUR.

If noble lords agree, therefore, with the financial world, with military men, and with the Government of Washington itself, that the issue is not doubtful, and if, therefore, Great Britain has the right to acknowledge Southern independence, why ought she to exercise it? The first answer is because honour calls on her to do so, and it rests on a detail which I shall rapidly explain to your Lordships. British Consuls have remained during the war at Mobile, Charleston, and Savannah. They are there for the protection of our subjects, who reside by thousands on the seaboard. In times like these their presence is essential. Were it not for Consuls to identify them, the severe enlistment laws of the Confederacy might at any time descend on our people; or in the sudden turns of war their goods might be destroyed without a clue to ownership or means of compensation. They are also there to witness the blockade, and to report upon its efficacy. And these Consuls draw their exequaturs from the Government of Washington. They are a standing derogation to the Power which receives, which shelters, and endures them. We are not inclined to withdraw them. We ought, therefore, to accredit them to the insurgent who permits them to reside, and if we do he is acknowledged. Honour forbids nations as it does men to run up a score of gratitude themselves, and to create a score of just resentment, in its object, to offer insult at the moment they are profiting by favour. In one sense alone do the Confederacy gain by the arrangement; we give them all the grandeur of forbearance; they allow our Consuls to reside, and we withhold the recognition which public law entitles them to ask of us. But is not our aspect with regard to them a poor one? We deny their rights over their territory, and yet at their hands receive the safety of our citizens. The Southern Congress is about to entertain the question of any longer tolerating our Consuls in this attitude. And what will be the situation of Great Britain if led by and by to do by interest and by convenience, what self-respect, and pride and justice dictate at this moment?

GREAT BRITAIN BOUND TO RECOGNISE BY NEUTRALITY.

The neutrality is the next consideration, which, if fairly viewed, did lead Great Britain to the course I have adverted to. The noble lord the Secretary of State, in his despatch to Mr. Mason, dated August 2, has pointed out that the great controversy on the right to secede, so long and frequently debated in America, cannot be resolved by foreign Governments. It is not for them to decide between the arguments of Webster and Calhoun; they ought rather to reserve their judgment, considering the balance of the argument and intricacy of the facts, than to pronounce in favour of secession or against it. But by withholding recognition when the issue no longer seems to be a doubtful one, when the danger of reconquest is not the restraining fact, Great Britain does pronounce against the title to secede, does stamp the Southern movement as illegal, does therefore part with the neutrality which orders silence on that question. On what other ground is she refusing to acknowledge? And let your Lordships mark that by acknowledgment you do not for a moment stamp with your authority the claims of the insurgent—you give no verdict in his favour. If you did, the history of the world would have to be rewritten; if you did, this country would never have been able to acknowledge the Revolutionary Government of France in February, 1848, which derived its short-lived power from neither throne, nor law, nor parliament, nor people—flung up by the delirium of Paris to sink at once with its repose, and no more to be regarded as the legal rulers of the country than the men in livery who cross the stage to take away the furniture between two portions of a drama can be mistaken for the heroes of the scene or the owners of the theatre. Acknowledgment is not a tribute, therefore, to the rights of the insurgent. But when the hazard of reconquest is dismissed, it is a tribute to the rights of the invader to withhold it. We are now declaring on the question of a title to secede on which the noble lord himself, on which neutrality forbids us to be umpires. But even if it did not, the Confederacy, as Mr. Davis in his recent message has perspicuously explained, have suffered wrongs, although not meant to injure, from Great Britain. Our Government, however, conscientiously held back the Emperor of the French from a proposal which might have eminently served them. With the best intentions and designs they refused to allow the despatch of Mr. Mason an acknowledgment in August for over six months to reach the eye and judgment of the country. By denying our harbours to both sides when both might have had access to them—no doubt from a laudable desire of tranquillity—it has compelled the Southerners to burn their prizes on the waters, has thus destroyed their chance of raising privateers; and vastly limited their powers of self-defence against the country which invades them. After inducing the Confederacy by a transaction which I described a year ago, to pledge itself to the observance of certain rules laid down at Paris in 1856, the British Government has not been ready to maintain them in the vital point that blockades must be effective to be binding. But illustrations of the kind may be dismissed. Partiality to the United States has been avowed in a despatch of March 27, 1862, from the noble lord to Mr. Adams, and which the Government of Washington have brought before the world in p. 62 of the volume they have recently distributed. In resisting the extortionate demands which Mr. Adams had addressed to him, and which, indeed, he manfully exposes, the noble lord as a set off to his austerity, declares that allowance has been made for the difficulties which the United States had to contend with in the war; and that public law has been liberally interpreted in their favour. The book is here if I am challenged. Allowance has been made for the difficulties of the United States in a war which both humanity and policy forbid, and which their own aggressive faithlessness created. Public law has been interpreted, and liberally—in favour of a Government which supports the infamous McNeil, lays waste the houses of distinguished adversaries in Virginia; which ruins havens in Savannah and in Charleston; which is ready to let loose 4,000,000 negroes on their compulsory owners; and to renew from sea to sea the horrors, the crimes of St. Domingo. But let it be so. I did not come here to impugn the decisions of the noble lord. He is not called upon to vindicate them. I mentioned these unfavourable actions to the South, without a view to censure of the Government. The only inference I draw is that if neutrality directs, us they require an instant course of reparation and of balance. Acknowledgment is the only form in which Great Britain can propose, or in which the injured Power is willing to accept it.

GREAT BRITAIN BOUND TO RECOGNISE BY POLICY.

But I will not build up an argument, sufficient as it stands, and go on to the next consideration, which demands (and loudly) such a measure. It is our own security in Canada. A noble Earl who gained his laurels in the East, well pointed out to us last session that, whenever the war closed Canada would be endangered. If victorious the Northern States might attack it in the drunkenness of pride; if defeated in the bitterness of torture. Some men, out of doors, have been so infatuated as to hold that by carefully abstaining from anything which gives umbrage to the United States, we should defend it. As if aggressive Powers had ever been restrained by wanting pretences for the wars they were inclined to. The security of Canada is quickly seen by your Lordships to reside in one circumstance alone—the danger of attacking it. That danger will at least be greater when the Southern power is kindly to Great Britain than when it is estranged, inasmuch as the aggressive State will then have to contemplate the chance of an attack upon his rear as well as the blockade of his seaboard. No doubt Canada is safe while the civil war continues; but we are neither able nor entitled to prolong it for her safety. The civil war may close after the acknowledgment of Southern independence by the Emperor, although Great Britain has not shared that manifesto. We may not be able much longer to keep back the virtue and humanity, as well as all the interests, the fears and wants which tend to force the measure upon Europe. From the moment separation was inevitable, no statesman could be blind to the want of an ally on the other side of the Atlantic. The United States can never possibly become one, not only because they are embittered, or because our interests are clashing, or because our institutions are repugnant, or because a rivalry is forced upon us in manufactures, and in ships, but because no alliance has ever yet occurred between the mother country and the power who had violently broken from it. The friendly disposition of the South is therefore necessary to us; it is attainable, and if we wantonly forego it, if we allow the war to close before we have acknowledged, both the separated Powers being irrevocably hostile to us, we may be forced, now to guard Canada from one, now the West Indies from the other. Our diplomats, moreover, would have no influence or voice in the Confederacy, whether they attempted to soften the resentments which the war had left behind it, to gain legitimate advantages in trade, to deprecate aggressive views, or to improve the situation of the negro. But on this point noble lords who have been ambassadors abroad have the materials of thinking far more strongly than myself in the direction I have pointed to.

GREAT BRITAIN BOUND TO RECOGNISE BY DUTY.

Dismissing policy, I need touch but briefly on the moral obligation to acknowledge, because, on grounds already stated, it applies generally to the case of neutrals and insurgents, when the hazard of reconquest is exhausted. It arises from the circumstance adverted to before, that in the civil wars of Europe, since the time of Charles V. (and to these may be added that of the Swiss cantons and the House of Austria in the middle ages), the acknowledgement of neutrals has preceded the conclusion of hostilities; and while that is withheld, that close is not to be anticipated. It is only requisite to glance at the special circumstances which enhance an abstract duty as regards Great Britain and the war which is before us. The first and most striking is the Lancashire distress, which is not likely to pass off until cotton falls in price, and sells in abundance; and that can hardly be expected to occur until the war is over. No man, conversant with political economy, supposes that cotton crops will start into existence in other portions of the world, while an avalanche of 4,000,000 bales impends upon the market from America. But that it does so, our Consuls in the South, Mr. Bunch and Mr. Molyneux, have recently informed us in public letters, known to all the trading world. The impression that the price will be depressed during the existence of the war is strengthened by what has fallen from Mr. Bazley, Mr. Bright, Mr. Mangles, and Mr. Laing, the highest practical authorities, who have all addressed the public on the topic. Another special circumstance is that the Government of Washington are more incapable of making peace spontaneously, than any other which has ever grappled with insurgents, considering the pledges they have made; the debts they have incurred, the hosts they have annihilated. As well might you require a man to perform an useful amputation on himself against the influence of others, as expect that Mr. Lincoln and his colleagues can terminate the war against the South, whilst Europe still excludes it from the family of nations. The duty to give the strife a possibility of closing, is immensely heightened by the fact that the Executive at Washington appear to be pursuing it in the midst of well-founded despair and under a necessity which only neutrals can annihilate. That they are doing so will appear to those who watch the tone of Mr. Greeley in the New York Tribune, who observe the desperate expedient of enlisting negro regiments, and who reflect that West Virginia would be useless as a State unless the two belligerents were separated. But let any one recall the past and reason for a moment on this question. Would Mr. Lincoln and his colleagues have embarked upon the war had they foreseen the tenor of its history? If, on the eve of crossing the Potomac, a higher power had revealed to them the panorama of disaster and disgrace which they were doomed to bring upon their country; the panic of Bull Run; the scared and broken columns falling into Washington; the long and dreary autumn of paralysis which followed; the victories which took away the hope of any Southern party for the Union, and which as loudly as defeats proclaimed the madness of that enterprise; the cotton blazing next the Mississippi as they reached it; the capture of New Orleans without a practical result beyond the indignation of the world at the revolting tyranny which held it; had they caught a glimpse of the engagements which drove General McClellan to his gunboats—the seions of a royal house partaking his confusion—and seen the tide of war rolled back upon their territory, and then another host sent out to dissolve itself, to put an end to the anxiety of Richmond and to perform the tragedy of Fredericksburgh; and, last of all, had they been able to forecast, with eighteen vessels hot in their pursuit, the Southern cruisers roaming on the sea triumphant and implacable;—would they have been deaf to the commissioners in the spring of 1861? would they have scorned a peace? would they have sent their expeditions to Fort Sumter? would they have trampled upon the law to plunge into hostilities? Then, are they not reluctantly pursuing them without a choice, till neutrals have acknowledged the insurgent? Shall Europe any longer chain them to the effort? Or, rather, when the Emperor desires to release, ought we to keep them inert and helpless victims on the lake of fire their blunders have created?

SEPARATION BETTER THAN RECONQUEST FOR THE NEGRO.

My Lords,—These grand considerations of honour, of neutrality, of policy, and duty, would lead the people of the country to require an acknowledgment of Southern independence, were it not for the delusions as to Slavery, which for a month or two have been promoted, and which, unless I am enabled to confront, I should be said to have avoided. To confront is to expose them; and the directest method which occurs to me, is at once to drive these puny agitators to an issue. They have deceived the working-classes of the country by confounding questions about Slavery, which ought not to be discussed with the only one which it behoves the British public to consider. You may go on eternally debating whether the desire to extend and to preserve it was at the bottom of secession; whether the desire to abridge or to eradicate was at the bottom of invasion. These points, involving the recesses of the human heart, are little known on the other side of the Atlantic. History may discuss: Omniscience only can determine them; and it is cruel mockery to force them on a mass of operatives, divided by the ocean from any clue to the inquiry. The legitimate, the only issue is (and they will not venture to deny it), whether separation or reconquest will be most conducive to the welfare of the negro: the prosperity of Africa, and the attainment of the objects which have long engaged the Buxtons, and the Wilberfores, and other admirable men who seem to be connected with this diminutive machinery for prolonging war on one side of the ocean, by spreading fiction on the other. We should therefore trace, and it is quickly done, the natural results of the alternatives. In the event of separation, there will no longer be the possibility of extending negro bondage into territories in which it does not now exist. Already it is settled in New Mexico. And no boundary you can well conceive will give the Southern States uncultivated land beyond that Northern limit. In the event of separation, the North will not return the negro fugitives who cross over its border. And the planter must retain them, not by law and terror, but by judgment and humanity. There will be a premium on benevolence, a penalty on inattention and injustice, which has not heretofore existed. Slaves will be contented, or escape. Under the Union they found a prison in a Continent. In the event of a separation, the whole question of black labour may be impartially considered by the Southerners. Whereas, during the last decade the violence of the Northerners in debate had fixed the system, but inflamed into a point of honour, or a passion, the opinions against which they have crusaded. In what manner would reconquest operate upon the negro? A servile war must be its melancholy preface, in which murder confronts the slave and rapine the proprietor. In such a conflict, many blacks must be exterminated, and nearly all the higher classes driven from the country—the dismantled houses and the confiscated fields become the property of Northerners. The conquerors at once discover that the soil is worthless unless the labour of the black may be applied to it. The negroes who survive, demoralized and scattered, will not be all of them recaptured, and if they were, would be inadequate in number to the purpose. How are the new proprietors, desiring wealth and jealous of sterility, to find the labour which is wanting to them? Africa is open. Africa contains the millions they are seeking. The flag of the United States before now has unfortunately been a shelter to the slave-trade; and this, too, is unanswerable. During the last few years, while the Union went on undivided, the efforts of Great Britain on the subject were defeated. As soon as ever the civil war divided it, the Government of Washington conceded the right of search; while their organs insolently told us that it would be withdrawn as soon as Southern subjugation was accomplished. After this, what man can be so mad as to declare that the friends of Africa and her descendants ought to concur with the invaders and advance pleas in their behalf, which they themselves have never ventured to resort to?

EVILS OF REUNION.

The only other sentiment which in the event of other neutrals being prepared might indispose the country to acknowledgment is a lingering idea that the cause of freedom is involved in the retention of the Union. It is just, therefore, to inquire for whose advantage it would come again into existence. We have seen it would not be for that of Africa or of the negro. It could not be for that of the seceders, as the miseries of New Orleans have explained where that rule has been established, and those terrors have been felt which would then apply to all the cities of the territory. Who says they ought not to perish rather than submit to a yoke more bitter and degrading than was ever known yet in Warsaw or in Venice? But would it be restored for the advantage of the North? They can only gain their object, if it is attainable, through the medium of a general who, when he had attained it, must rank among the highest conquerors—with Caesar, Charlemagne, Napoleon. Would such a character be likely to resign his arms to Mr. Lincoln and his colleagues? What temptation could he have to conduct so remarkable, a sacrifice so thankless? It was thought by many that General McClellan at the time of his dismissal, might have turned his regiments upon Washington with safety; and there were not wanting those who loudly censured his forbearance. In this war there has been no fact more pregnant and instructive than the disposition, in spite of his reverses and bad fortunes, to exalt him; and for many months a halo has surrounded him. Would the army then refuse to follow one who had performed marvels instead of shrinking before obstacles; who had given them the plunder of the South instead of leading them through hardships and privations to their starting point; who had won affection, not by his designs and his retreats, but by his actions and his progress; whose title rested on the fact, not that Baltimore was safe, but that Montgomery had fallen. A tide of arguments would rush into the mind of such a general, to dissuade him from surrendering his power to institutions so discredited, so trampled on, and so remote from those which Washington bequeathed, as he would find subsisting in his country. But the impulse from within would be exceeded by the pressure from without. In the midst of a disorganised society which only pants for rule, he would not choose but be coerced into the part of a dictator. And it is for a despotism that the people of the North are pouring out their blood, and tarnishing their glory. Already it exists. It had its birth in war, and it would take its immortality from conquest. Then would the Union be restored for the advantages of the world. What country would be safe? What country would be free? Would Poland gain when the only friend and patron of the Czar recovered his original dimensions? At first, indeed, the necessity of Southern garrisons might keep them in repose. But in a few years—and they do not labour to conceal it from us—a power more rapacious, more unprincipled, more arrogant, more selfish and encroaching, would arise than has ever yet increased the outlay, multiplied the fears, and compromised the general tranquillity of Europe. And on this overgrown, on this portentous form of tyranny and egotism, many countries would depend for the material of that important industry which languishes at present.

FRANCE AND BRITAIN OUGHT TO ACT TOGETHER.

My Lords, the latter point might be explained by statistics I have with me. But it is even more important to remind you that not much more than five years have elapsed since France and Great Britain were united to withstand a Power which overshadowed and assailed the general security of nations. To gain their object it was requisite to interrupt a peace of forty years, and to squander noble lives upon the trenches and the battle field. In order now to gain equivalent results and parallel advantages, they are required not to lavish but to save; not to arm battalions, but disperse them; not to open conflict in the world, but snatch an hemisphere from misery. What in Russia wanted toil, outlay, unmeasured risks, and endless combinations, for aught we know may be accomplished by a fiat in America, and the presence of a noble Duke on the bench (the Duke of Newcastle) might have suggested to me, that there are some inherent evils in the partnership of arms which have not any place in the alliance of diplomacy. The initiative will belong to France. But if it did not, should Great Britain be ashamed of it? Whoever contemplates habitually her place and aspect on the globe, will sometimes think that it imposes a double task on her career to urge on civilisation from its Eastern cradle to its Western home, and also as the firm and watching outpost of the sea, to stand between the older Powers and the evils which the other side of the Atlantic may occasionally threaten. Long has she fulfilled the first, and nobly may she now sustain the second part of the vocation which belongs to her. And if it suits the dignity of empire to compass great results by trifling exertions—instead of wasting giant means upon invisible achievements—the day will be a proud one, when in a voice which other Powers have re-echoed the message rolls over the waters to guard the freedom of the Old World, and limit, if not arrest, the sorrows of the New. But whether we resolve to lead, or hesitate to follow, whether we keep Europe back, or join, or suffer dangerous isolation from it, I shall be indebted to your lordships for permitting me to show to-night that the neutral Powers have the clearest title to acknowledge Southern independence, and that until they exercise that title according to the only lights which reason founded on examples open to their rulers, the war will never end.

Earl RUSSELL.—My Lords,—I suppose there is no member of either House of Parliament who does not wish for a termination of the civil war in America. (Hear, hear.) It disturbs commerce, it interferes with the peace of the world, and it afflicts America herself (hear, hear); and if anything could be usefully, and, I must add, justly done to bring that war to a termination, I repeat there is no member of either House of Parliament, there is no person in the country, who would not gladly see such a consummation. (Hear, hear.) But, after having listened to my noble friend, I must confess I remain in the same persuasion as before at the present moment—and I speak only of the present moment—that there is nothing this country could do usefully and wisely which would tend to the termination of the hostilities on the other side of the Atlantic. (Hear, hear.) My noble friend has somewhat mixed different topics, and he has alluded to three different modes of intervention in the affairs of other countries. One, which is the minimum of interference, that of advice, good offices, and mediation; another, the mode proposed by my noble friend, that of recognition; and the third, one which we have sometimes resorted to, and which other nations have more frequently had recourse to—that of forcible intervention. My noble friend says, and says truly, that since I had the honour of addressing the House last summer there has been some divergence between the views of the Government of this country and that of the Emperor of the French. The Government of the Emperor of the French conceived that it might tend to the termination of the war if three Powers—France, Great Britain, and Russia—were to propose a suspension of arms with a view of negotiation between the two belligerents. Her Majesty's Government, after carefully examining that proposition, came to the conclusion that its adoption by us would not be likely to lead to its acceptance by the Government of the United States of America; while, by causing irritation, it would not increase but diminish the chances of our seeing a termination of the contest. The French Government has proceeded in accordance with its views, and has actually proposed to the Government of the United States to negotiate with the Southern States. That proposition has not been adopted; and I think your lordships will judge from what has happened with reference to the proposals of France, and with reference to suggestions thrown out in other countries, that any interference on the part of this country would only have tended to aggravate the evils of the present lamentable state of affairs in America. (Hear, hear.) It does not appear at the present moment that this contest would be likely to be terminated by an offer of our good offices. I say at the present moment, because it is impossible to say that, in the course of events, a time may not come when both the contending parties would be desirous of the good offices or wise counsels of friendly Powers. I do not see any probability of that at this moment, but I wish to guard myself against being supposed to speak positively of the future. (Hear, hear.) We come, then, to the course proposed by my noble friend,—namely, that of recognition. My noble friend alluded to several cases—not very happy illustrations of his argument, I think—in which the United States of America have recognised insurgent countries which they believed likely to be able to maintain their independence. One was the revolted state of Hungary, whose independence had sunk like the island in the Mediterranean. It had disappeared before the despatch reached Vienna by which the United States recognised it. Another instance referred to by my noble friend scarcely comes within the category, though it has been quoted by a gentleman who has written some very able letters under the title of "Historiens,"—I mean the recognition of the United States themselves by France two years after the war with this country had begun. If any one will examine that precedent, and the important documents which have lately come to light, he will see that the French monarchy of the day had, most unfortunately for itself, been exciting democratic passions in America, and had been endeavouring to raise opposition there to the Government of Great Britain. It had prepared means of concert with those States; and even in the letter, so courteous in appearance, but so exceedingly hostile and bitter in its spirit, written by the French Ambassador, it was stated that the French Government had not only made a treaty of commerce with the United States, but further, that they had a right to carry that treaty into effect, if necessary, even by force. This was a threat to take part in the war between Great Britain and her revolted colonies. But we know that besides this open threat there was a secret treaty signed, by which France lent her support to the revolted provinces, and the opposition of this country, which was then as decided as ever any opposition was, agreed that the threat was one of war, and that by war only could it be met. This was not a case of recognition, but a case of interference. It was, I think, a most unjustifiable interference, an interference for the purpose of spreading those democratic principles, which afterwards reacted on France, and produced so many excesses and crimes during the revolution. (Hear, hear.) Well, then, with regard to the other cases to which my noble friend has alluded, those of Portugal and Holland were cases of forcible intervention. There is hardly more than one case in which the question was limited to simple recognition,—that was the war carried on between Spain and her revolted colonies, which went on from 1808 to 1822 or 1823 without any proposal for a recognition. This case is one worthy the attention of your lordships, because it was illustrated by the mild wisdom of Lord Lansdowne, by the profound research of Sir James Mackintosh, and by the dazzling genius of Canuing. We have therefore upon this question of recognition as much light as can possibly be thrown upon any subject. Now I beg to refer your lordships to the words of Lord Lansdowne. He was zealous for the recognition of the South American Provinces, he thought it would be a great advantage to this country to recognise them, and he was entirely free from any trammels of office or any obligation to consult the interests of the minister of the day. But with that wisdom and forbearance which characterised every act of his public life (hear, hear) he stated that the first thing to be considered was the right, and he went on thus:—"It will be my duty this night to point out to your lordships the great advantages which may result from the establishment of South American independence. I hope I shall never stand up in the House to recommend your lordships to adopt any course of policy inconsistent with those principles of right which are paramount to all expediency, and which compose that great law of nations, any departure from which, to answer a selfish and ambitious policy, never fails to recoil upon its authors." (Hear, hear.) These are words upon which this House may well reflect (hear, hear) and we may well consider upon what grounds Lord Lansdowne founded the views which I have just brought under the notice of your lordships. In the first place, he stated it was necessary that a country which required to be recognised should have established its independence. In the next place, that it should be able to maintain that independence for the future; and, lastly, that it should be able to carry on with all foreign nations those relations of peace and amity which form the general international law of the world. Now, examine the state of the revolted provinces of Spain at that time, as Sir James Mackintosh and Mr. Canuing did. We find that the greater part of South America had been some twelve or fourteen years entirely free from the presence of Spanish armies. We find that with regard to those provinces in which that was not absolutely the case—namely, Mexico, where Vera Cruz alone was occupied by a Spanish garrison, and Peru, where there were 4,000 or 5,000 Spanish troops, although the cause of Spain seemed hopeless, it was agreed that their recognition should be deferred, and that only in the case of Buenos Ayres and those parts of South America which had clearly and for a number of years established their independence would it be right for Great Britain to proceed to the step of recognition? Besides this, Mr. Canuing took care to inform the Spanish Minister that such recognition would not be very long delayed, that if the Spanish Government wished to recognise them they ought to take that step, and that Great Britain was willing to give time before proceeding to recognise them herself. (Hear.) Well, here is a great precedent for our consideration—here is a step taken by the Government of the day after considerable care and examination; here is a course recommended by the Opposition of the day, not in any harsh spirit, but notwithstanding the conviction which this country generally entertained, that the cause of Spain was hopeless and that the independence of those provinces was firmly established. (Hear.) Well, now, if we look to the present position of North America and compare it with that of the States of which Lord Lansdowne spoke, we find that the war in North America is still carried on with the utmost vigour—I had almost said with the utmost fury. We find some of those provinces which were the first to proclaim their independence—a great part of Louisiana, New Orleans, and the banks of the Mississippi, occupied by the Federal armies. There are very considerable Federal armies menacing cities of the Confederation, such as Charleston and Savannah. So that no man can say it is a case of hopeless war. For my own part, and speaking according to my limited vision, I do not believe those efforts of the Federals will be successful. But no man can say that the war is finally over, or that the independence of the Southern States is established. (Hear, hear.) Well, then, what is the present state of the case? Although great efforts have been made in vain, the great Federal Republic seems unwilling to accept the decision of events. So far from it, we find that the last acts of the Congress which has just expired are to place, by conscription, every man fit to carry arms at the disposal of the President of the United States, and to vote sums of money amounting to no less than £180,000,000 sterling, for the purposes of carrying on the war. Well, then, in this state of affairs I should say that, looking to the question of right, it would not be a friendly act towards the United States, it would not be to fulfil our obligations to a country with which we have long maintained relations of peace and amity—a great country which says it can still carry on the war—it would, I say, be a failure of friendship on our part if at this moment we were to interpose and recognise the Southern States. I have endeavoured to guard myself by saying that I speak now with reference to the present aspect of affairs. I hardly know any moment in which my noble friend could have brought forward his motion with less encouragement from events. It may turn out that these immense efforts which are being made shall be made in vain; that the spirit of the South is unconquerable as their determination never to be united again with the Northern States is final and irrevocable, and that a time may come when the duty of this country will be totally different from what it is at the present moment. All I maintain is, that it is our duty at present to stand still, and not to proceed to an act so definite, so positive—an act so unfriendly to the United States as that of the recognition of the South. (Hear, hear.) My noble friend spoke of various topics—of danger of Canada being attacked by the Northern Republic, and of the West Indies being attacked by the Southern. My lords, I cannot follow my noble friend into these suppositions. I do not venture to say what may be the future course of events. I confine myself to that which I think to be our duty now—(hear, hear)—which I think is right, and if that be so we must be content in future days to meet with future dangers, and it will not enfeeble our arms if we have it in our power to reflect that we have never failed in our obligations to those which have been great States in peace and amity with us, and that it has not been through any fault of ours that a great affliction has fallen on them. (Cheers.) Well, my lords, I know not that there is anything in what my noble friend has said to-night which would make it necessary for me to go much further into this question, but at the same time there were parts of his speech in which he referred to former occasions and former instances of interference on our part, as if my noble friend and some of those who looked forward to his motion to-night expected that there should be some interference on our part in this war. Now, I wish to say only a few words upon that which we have done in former days by way of intervention. We, too, like other States, have at times taken upon us to intervene. We interfered in the case of Holland to save her from the religious tyranny and political despotism of Philip II. That contest was hallowed by the blood of Sir Philip Sydney, and by the part we took we contributed to her independence. In another case—the case of Portugal—we interfered. Charles I., Cromwell, Charles II., all agreed in that interference. We declared ourselves ready to send 10,000 men to the aid of the new Government of Portugal, and we helped the Portuguese to relieve themselves from the Spanish tyranny under which they groaned, and to establish the independence of their State. In more recent times, when Greece endeavoured to establish her independence, we aided her in her contest with Turkey; we rescued her from the destruction which threatened her, and helped her to found a free and independent Monarchy. Take the case of Belgium again. When the Belgians declared that they were unable to remain under the Government of Holland, in accordance with the Treaty of Vienna, we interfered by force, in conjunction with France, and the wise and happy arrangement was made by which the freedom of Belgium was secured. Now, my lords, in all these instances, whether the intervention was carried on by our ancestors or in our own times, there is nothing of which an Englishman need be ashamed. (Hear.) If we have taken part in interventions, it has been in behalf of the independence, freedom, and welfare of a great portion of mankind. I should be sorry, indeed, if there should be any intervention on the part of this country which could bear another character. (Cheers.) I trust that this will not be the case, and that no interests, deeply as they may affect us—interests which imply the well-being of a great portion of our people, but interests which may affect also the freedom and happiness of other parts of the globe—will induce us to set an example different from that of our ancestors, but that when we are bound to interfere, it will be an interference in the cause of liberty, and to promote the freedom of mankind, as we have hitherto done in such cases. (Hear.) It is with this conviction that I have addressed these few remarks as to what has been done by this country in former days, and I trust that with regard to this civil war in America, we may be able to continue our impartial and neutral course. Depend upon it, my lords, that if that war is to cease, it is far better it should cease by a conviction, both on the part of the North and the South, that they can never live again happily as one community and one republic, and that the termination of hostilities can never be brought about by the advice, the mediation, or the interference of any European Power. (Cheers.) I repeat I have spoken only of the duty of the Government at the present time, and I trust that there will now be no further debate on this subject. (Loud cheers.)

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

AMERICA.

The Mississippi is not the least obstinate of the "rebels" Mr. Lincoln has undertaken to reduce to obedience. The Father of Waters cares no more for the edicts, boastings, and threats of the Yankees, than do the Confederates. When Farragut dug a little ditch the river was not diverted from its course, and the effort of Grant to increase the size of the little ditch did not change the current of the mighty river. Upon this the Federals became angry, and announced their intention of setting aside the Father of Waters, and making the Great Union River. What follows? The Mississippi, not in the least alarmed, has brought the ditch which had, at a terrible cost of life and treasure, been enlarged to a canal, "to an unexpected termination. The Mississippi has broken through the levée and filled the trench with earth and rubbish, thus rendering it useless." Almost every plan has now been tried to reduce the Mississippi to Federal control, except one of Mr. Lincoln's proclamations or one of Mr. Seward's despatches; but we do not think that those wonderful instruments would have more effect upon the course of the river than the scheme of Farragut, the gallant commander who lately wreaked his spite upon four hundred helpless women and children, or than the awful threat of the New York press to dig the Great Union River.

In one respect the Mississippi has gratified the pious New Englanders. In consequence of cutting the levées at Yazoo Pass and Lake Providence, "a district in Mississippi nearly as large as Scotland has been laid under water; and in Louisiana a region covering 5,000 square miles has been converted into a lake." We need not anticipate the judgment of mankind upon this barbarous mode of warfare, which damages Confederate property without aiding the cause of the Federals; but the Southerners prefer a drowned country to submission to Northern despotism. It is reported that they have cut the levées, and compelled one corps of General Grant's army before Vicksburg to re-embark and retreat up the river. If the rest of the Northern troops do not retire before the warm weather sets in, they may learn that swamping a country does not help the invader.

The most important war news is the repulse and defeat of the Federal squadron under Admiral Farragut. It appears that on the 14th March an attempt was made to run the batteries at Port Hudson. Only one vessel passed, and that in a crippled and useless condition. The Mississippi was burnt to the water's edge, and part of her crew captured; Farragut's flagship, the Hartford, was disabled, and retired towards Baton Rouge, and the rest of the vessels were forced to retreat. The Richmond Whig says the Confederate victory was complete. We have not at present any details of the engagement. It is also reported that St. Helena, a place twenty-five miles in the rear of Port Hudson, was attacked on the 9th of March by the Federals, and that heavy firing was heard in that direction on the 13th. The inference from this is that the Federals intended a combined attack. Although we have advices from New York to the 21st of March, no Federal account is given of the engagement at Port Hudson, from which we may infer that the Southern press have not exaggerated the Confederate victory.

The Federal victories on the Yazoo and the capture of Yazoo City are not confirmed; they were, in fact, mere fabrications. On the 14th of March the Federal expedition reached Greenwood, at the junction of the Tallahatchie and Yallahusha rivers, where its progress was stopped by the Confederate batteries. The Federal gunboat Chillicothe was disabled, and the fleet retired three miles up the Tallahatchie, 150 miles from Yazoo City, where it still remained at the latest advices.

The rest of the war news may be summed up in a single paragraph. The Federal fleet is not able to retake Galveston, but has been compelled to withdraw to a respectful distance, in consequence of the powerful batteries erected by the Confederates. The Brooklyn was damaged in an encounter with them. It is reported that Vicksburg has been bombarded without effect. In South Carolina General Hunter, after pompously announcing his intention of advancing, has not moved, and one of his positions has been threatened by the Confederates. The Federals claim to have crossed the Rappahannock, and to have captured twenty-five Confederate cavalry, and that they have repulsed a Confederate attack near Newburn; while they admit they were repulsed on the 17th ult. at Franklin, on the Blackwater River, and that the Confederates have captured twenty-five Federal cavalry at Drainsville, Virginia. The anxiety felt in Washington with regard to Nashville has been increased by the Confederates capturing Federal waggons within six miles of that city; and the Confederates have also taken a train at Woodford which had left Louisville.

It is reported that 1,000 negroes under the command of Colonel Higginson, who ascended the St. Mary's River on the 9th March, provided with several thousand muskets to supply all slaves who could be incited to insurrection, have been captured. It is added, "If the report of their capture proves true, it is supposed that Colonel Higginson and all the white officers who commanded them have been shot." The only opinion that civilized nations will entertain is that shooting is too respectable a death for men guilty of an attempt to incite an inferior race to insurrection.

In the Confederate Congress on the 11th March, Mr. Conrad introduced a resolution, pledging Congress to co-operate with the Executive in any measures it may adopt, consistent with the honour, the dignity, and independence of the Confederate States, tending to a speedy restoration of peace. It was referred, without debate, to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

General Halleck has written a letter to General Rosencranz, urging him to live on and plunder the people of Tennessee. General Halleck has always been a brave man with his pen. We all remember what great Union victories he gained on paper, and how at his command 10,000 of General Beauregard's men were captured with a goose-quill and a drop of ink. The hero of these bloodless fights would do better if he were to tell Rosencranz how to catch the hare that he advises him to cook.

According to his ability Rosencranz has deserved well of the Lincolnites by plundering the inhabitants of Tennessee; and, no doubt, he is quite willing to do so to a greater extent, if Halleck will supply him with the means.

The peace resolutions which were passed by the Senate of New Jersey on the 26th of February, were introduced by a series of protests against the unconstitutional policy of the Lincoln Government. They denounce war waged for unconstitutional or partisan purposes, or for the subjugation of States with a view to their reduction to a territorial condition; military law and the domination of military over civil law in States not in insurrection; arbitrary arrests and the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act; the admission of new States into the Union by the division of existing ones; the emancipation proclamation, and the expenditure of public money. The New Jersey Legislature believes that the appointment of Federal Commissioners to meet Commissioners from the insurgent States, to consider if any plan may be adopted consistent with the honour and dignity of the national Government, by which the present civil war may be brought to a close, is not inconsistent with the integrity, honour, and dignity of the Federal Government, but as an indication of the spirit which animates the adhering States, would, in any case, tend to strengthen America in the opinion of other nations.

A Union convention has been held at Louisville, Kentucky, from which Mr. Craven, Member of Congress, elect for the State Indiana, was ejected, for denouncing the Lincoln Administration, and resolutions were adopted to devote all the State resources to crush the rebellion, and requesting the Government and State authorities to take steps to defend Kentucky against invasion. It is unnecessary to observe that the meeting no more represented Kentucky than the Tooley Street Tailors represented England. An odd comment on the reported Union feeling is the announcement that, "It has been found necessary to send a military expedition into one of the counties of Ohio to arrest deserters. It was supposed that there would be organized resistance on the part of the inhabitants, and that bloodshed would ensue."

The Yankees are very angry about the brilliant exploits of the Alabama and the Florida. They are pleased to call these steamers British pirates, and to threaten retaliation against British trade.

Mr. Lincoln is said to have refused to issue letters of marque.

The resolutions introduced in the Legislature at Albany, inviting General Butler to accept the hospitalities of the State, have been rejected. Mr. Hutchings, of New York county, in opposing the motion, said that General Butler was a disgrace to civilization. General Butler had better remain with his Boston friends.

The New York ship-builders decline taking contracts to build 8,000-ton iron-clad vessels wanted by Government, for fear of loss from the depreciation of the currency. The contractors require the Government to build by day work, to which the Navy Department will not consent. Our Southern friends will regret this, as some of the proposed large iron-clads might have been useful to the Confederates.

General Hunter, the eminent friend of the negro, finding white troops suffer from being placed in certain forts or posts "peculiarly liable to the ravages of climatic and epidemic diseases," has ordered a conscription of all able-bodied negroes between the ages of 18 and 50. The negroes will no doubt feel much obliged to their friend for his kind consideration, and thoroughly appreciate the Yankee love for the black race.

On the 20th of March gold at New York was at 54½ premium. Mr. Chase has visited that city, but has not negotiated a loan. A report that he had received an offer of £20,000,000 sterling from European capitalists upon the security of greenbacks is not confirmed; but it was useful in making Mr. Chase's late visit to the Empire City pleasant.

ENGLAND.

We regret to report an increase of pauperism in Lancashire last week. The returns of the Poor-Law Board show that while in eight unions there were 1700 paupers fewer than the week before, ten unions gave an additional number of 2900; showing a net increase of 1200. This is not surprising, as we know that no considerable revival of trade can take place while the American war continues; and it is not to be hoped that any considerable relief can be experienced from the migration of manufacturing operatives into the agricultural districts. A good deal has been said lately about encouragement to emigration, and the colonies are recommended as a refuge for the now superfluous population of Lancashire. It is much to be wished that men of the stamp of the Rev. Charles Kingsley would let subjects of this kind alone. There are some minds—and that gentleman's is among them—which are so constituted that they can take no interest except in a quarrel, and can take up no question but in a spirit of antagonism to some person, class, or party. Galled by the terrible exposure of his ignorance and want of candour in his attacks on the manufacturers some months ago, the Rector of Eversley has seized upon a new opportunity of reviling them, as he hopes, with better effect; and charges them with desiring to keep the operatives starving at home till the revival of trade, in order then to cheapen labour. The reverend novelist is as mistaken as he is malignant. If trade is ever to be what it once was, it is the interest of the labourers to stay where they are, and it is the interest of the country to keep them there; for they are worth, both to themselves and to society, three times as much as factory hands as they will ever be in any other kind of labour. If, on the contrary, our supplies of cotton are for the future to be very scanty, then it is clear that we ought to keep at home only those who are most peculiarly fitted for factory labour, and enable the rest to go wherever their work will be best paid, and most valuable to themselves and to society. The lowest class of factory operatives—the Irish immigrants who swarm in the larger towns—are well fitted for agricultural labour; but no district wishes for them, and they themselves, while they can live on alms, will be in no hurry to seek an honest livelihood elsewhere. There are many classes of workers in the factories, too, of a much higher grade, who may make excellent colonists; especially if sent out in well-arranged bodies of one or two hundred, and allowed to form separate communities in such young and underpeopled colonies as Natal and Queensland. But we hope that, if emigration be a necessary resource, it will be so conducted as not to take from Lancashire the élite of her population, and leave behind precisely those who could best be spared, and moreover would in many cases most readily adapt themselves to a new country and a new occupation.

All men acquainted with the working of industrial concerns in England know the Trades' Unions well, as the steady and unflinching enemies of improvement, of law, of liberty, and of goodwill between labourers and capitalists. These societies, formed for the purpose of rendering aid to labourers out of health or out of work, have fallen almost invariably into the hands of professional agitators, who drive a lucrative business in fomenting quarrels between employers and employed. These men have established an unparalleled tyranny over the workers, who must cease work at their bidding, who dare not serve any master tabooed by the Unions, and who, if they venture to disobey, are sometimes assaulted, sometimes beaten within an inch of their lives, and not unfrequently murdered, by orders of the paid officials of the Union. No workman in a trade in which such a society has established its ascendancy dare accept work on other conditions or at other wages than those prescribed by it. When a strike is ordered, all who attempt to go on working are threatened, mobbed, and maltreated; and during recent strikes papers have actually been set on foot for no other purpose than to threaten and insult in the foulest manner those—especially women—who decline to give up a portion of their earnings, and pinch their families, to contribute towards the expenditure of the Union. Mr. John Bright, knowing the strength and thorough organization of these societies, has long been eager to use them for political purposes; and on Thursday evening last, he succeeded in assembling a large meeting of Trades' Unionists to hear and endorse his views on the American war. It is needless to say that no persons of distinguished social position were present on the occasion. Mr. Bright spoke with his usual clearness, force, and recklessness, affirmed that while the North was willing to allow cotton to reach us, the South had prevented it—in answer to which misrepresentation we need only refer to the Parliamentary papers—and appealed to the class passions of his auditors against privilege in England and slavery in America. In fact, his speech was directed rather against the Throne, the Church, and the Constitution of England, than against the cause of the Confederate States; and it was clear by the cheers of his audience that this was the attack they most keenly relished. The frantic hatred of Mr. Bright towards the respectable and independent portion of the press is fully shared by the Trades Unionists, and sufficiently proves what is the real fervour of their love of liberty. They cannot bear that any one should be allowed to differ from them. Very violent resolutions were passed, denouncing the aristocracy, the capitalists, and the press of England, and expressing the warmest sympathy with the cause of Butler, Mitchell, and Turchin; and an address to Mr. Lincoln, couched in a tone of slavish and fulsome eulogy, was also adopted.

Parliament has risen for the Easter recess, after a desultory but interesting debate on American affairs, in which the friends of the North were terribly worsted. The sympathy of the House with the Confederate cause was strikingly manifested by the coldness with which the able speech of Mr. Forster and the vehement oration of Mr. Bright were received on both sides; and the vociferous cheering which greeted the defence of the Government by the Solicitor-General, and the crushing exposure of the inconsistency and absurdity of the Northern complaints which was given by Mr. Laird. The former completely established the important doctrine that a violation of the Foreign Enlistment Act is no violation of international law; and that the United States have no cause to complain of the escape of the Oreto and the Alabama; their own Judges having laid down the law on this subject, as allowing neutrals to sell armed ships of war to belligerents. And Mr. Laird showed first, that during the Russian war a ship was built in an American port, and sent to Petropauloski; secondly, that immense supplies of warlike stores have recently been shipped from this country to the North; and finally, that the Federal Government had applied to Englishmen to have men-of-war built and fully equipped for them in this country. After this there is little fear that any further attention will be paid to the groundless remonstrances of the Northern partisans, or the absurd pretensions of Mr. Seward. Mr. Bright's complaint, that we had showed the Federal Government only "a cold and unfriendly neutrality," was well answered by Lord Palmerston, who, with the cordial approval of the House, asked whether a "warm and friendly neutrality" would be neutrality at all—whether it would not mean something very like hostility to the Confederates?

Lord Palmerston has been on a tour in Scotland, enjoying the fruits of a well-earned popularity, at the expense of more labour than any man of his age would be able to endure. But the Premier—perhaps because he always speaks in a slow, easy, almost slovenly manner—never seems to be fatigued by any amount of speaking. Mr. Bright, Mr. Cobden, and even Mr. Gladstone, would be laid up with sore-throat if they were called upon to go through the quantity of exertion in this respect, which seems to be a positive enjoyment to the veteran leader of the Liberals.

Her Majesty, though still refusing to be disturbed in the privacy which she has maintained ever since the death of the Prince Consort, has received several deputations from important corporate bodies to present addresses of loyal congratulation on the marriage of the Heir apparent. To each address the Queen returned a gracious reply. The royal answer to that presented by the Lord Provost of Edinburgh was couched in the following terms:—

I receive with great satisfaction your address of congratulation on the marriage of the Prince of Wales, and I thank you very sincerely for the loyal and affectionate wishes which you have expressed for myself and my family on this happy occasion.

I join most heartily with you in the prayer that our beloved son may have so profited by the careful training of his great and good father, that he may prove not only a comfort to his sorrowing family, but a blessing to the country, which has testified such unexampled goodwill towards his bride and himself.

EUROPE.

The promised diplomatic intervention on behalf of Poland takes a long time to mature. The only step which is known to have been taken in that direction is the despatch of a circular by Earl Russell to all the Powers of Europe—whether parties to the Treaty of Vienna or not—inviting them to join in a common representation at St. Petersburg. It is characteristic of the obstinacy with which, in this country, the Government refuses, under pretence of regard for the public interests, to give any account of its proceedings until the matter has been settled for better or worse, that this important fact has never been disclosed by an English Minister, although the subject has been discussed several times since the circular was issued, and that we only know it from the statements made by the Ministers of other countries to their respective Parliaments. What success the proposal has had we do not yet know. Italy and Portugal have given a favourable answer, but their adhesion is of very little importance if France and Austria do not approve the project. If, however, we have little reliable information on the subject, we have plenty of statements put forth, and with great positiveness, but entitled to very little credit. The French semi-official press writes mysteriously about a Congress. It does not venture to assert that the Emperor has invited the other Powers to take part in one. The Cologne Gazette, which often gets hold of important information, has made a regular sensational announcement, for the accuracy of which it pledges its reputation.

According to the German print, France has demanded that the kingdom of Poland should be entirely separated from Russia, and enjoy full and thorough independence, with the Duke de Leuchtenberg for its first king, Russia retaining all her other Polish provinces, and Austria and Prussia keeping their shares of the partition. Although the Cologne Gazette asseverates every day, in language constantly increasing in confidence, the accuracy of this statement, we cannot give it the slightest credence. Russia will not give up the kingdom of Poland unless she is absolutely forced to do so. The only way to force her is by a war waged upon a gigantic scale; and such a war no Power would engage in for such a small object. An independent kingdom of Poland confined within the limits of the artificial creation of the Congress of Vienna would be a wretched abortion. If Poland is to be independent again, she must have some access to the sea, and not be completely hemmed in by her three despoilers. A much more probable announcement is that of the Vienna journals, to the effect that at a conference between Count Rechberg, the Duke de Grammont, and Lord Bloomfield, it was agreed to address simultaneously an identical note to Russia, recommending the speedy introduction in Poland of seasonable reforms. That is the sort of result to which it was pretty evident from the first that all the "tall talk" and burning sympathies of Europe would come.

The telegraphic agents at Cracow are gentlemen of large invention and bold imagination. When there are no fights to tell of they invent them; when there is a skirmish they magnify it into a Polish victory; when there is a body of insurgents in a particular spot they announce its appearance in three or four different despatches, in one giving its locale by the Polish, in the second by the German, and in the third by the French name. The other day they announced that a M. Chojecki, private secretary to Prince Napoleon, had passed through Cracow on his way to the camp of General Wysocki; with what purpose they did not tell. To treat, perhaps, for the Polish Crown; to give Wysocki a little of the Prince's military science. People might take their choice. Two days after, we hear from Paris that Chojecki is not secretary to the Prince, that he has not left Paris, and that the Prince has sent no person to the insurgents. There is a story current in Paris that the Marquis Wielopolski has written a letter to the Prince in reply to the attack upon him made in the Prince's speech, and that the letter has produced a rejoinder.

Upon the Bourse the resignation of M. Fould is positively announced every other day. On Monday the announcement was made again, and this time it would seem to have been accurate. The Minister took offence, it is said, at a communiqué sent to the Journal des Débats by the Minister of the Interior, the object of which was really to show, in reply to some strictures of that journal, that no improvements had taken place in the Financial Administration since the accession of M. Fould to office. The resignation has not been accepted. The Emperor will not willingly dispense with the services of a man whose presence in office is regarded, and with justice, by the commercial and monetary world of France as a guarantee for every possible retrenchment, and in some degree a pledge for the maintenance of peace.

M. Fould remains in office, and the author of the slight put upon him expiates his impertinence by a resignation, which is, in fact, a dismissal. M. Magne was the Finance Minister, under whose administration the confusion arose which M. Fould undertook to dissipate. Naturally he has looked with no particular goodwill upon the proceedings of his successor, although in his office of "talking minister" he has had very little opportunity of showing his ill-will. However, he contrived to get the communiqué to which we have referred, issued from the Ministry of the Interior, and the result of his ingenuity is shown in a letter from the Emperor recording the difference of opinion between him and M. Fould, and breaking his fall by a place in the Privy Council.

There is little intelligence of interest from Poland. The Poles have not yet agreed amongst themselves whether Langiewicz signally defeated the Russians in the encounters which led to his own flight and the dispersal of his army. The Russians have published no account of the contest. Lying as the Russian bulletins undoubtedly are, they are entitled to more credence than those supplied by the friends of the Polish cause. We announced, with some misgiving, last week, on the faith of telegrams from Russian Poland, a series of Russian defeats near Konin, in one of which Prince Wittgenstein was wounded and taken prisoner. They were, in truth, Russian victories; hardly won, no doubt, but still victories. The insurgents lost their two leaders, Mielenski and Collier, and after suffering terrible slaughter were driven into the woods. Prince Wittgenstein does not appear even to have been wounded. He certainly was not taken prisoner by the insurgents. The movements of the insurgents reported from Cracow are not worth mention. There seems to be a band somewhere in the Holy Mountains, in the Palatinate of Cracow, where Langiewicz had two or three brushes with the Russians; but the reports about it are such gross inventions, that one is almost led to disbelieve in its existence. The telegrams from Cracow multiply it into three or four large bands.

The Russians seem to be making considerable progress in clearing the country. Small bands will long carry on a partisan warfare, but as far as any judgment can be formed, the insurrection is at an end.

Far more destructive of the hopes of the friends of Poland even than the defeat of Langiewicz, is the knowledge of the causes which mainly led to it, or, at least, which rendered it so complete. Even in the hour when all the hopes of their country depended upon their energetic co-operation, when every instinct of patriotism should have counselled them to forget all animosities, to lay aside all personal jealousies, and work as one man against the common enemy, the Poles were engaged in scandalous controversies. Microslawski had his partisans in the camp of Langiewicz. The Reds, or Ultras, swore by him, whilst the Whites, or Moderates, generally accepted the leadership of Langiewicz. In the last council of war, held whilst the Russian legions were gathering round the small, ill-provided army, the Reds refused to obey Langiewicz. That was the reason for his abandonment of the army. He hoped to be able to pass through Galicia, and serve his country somewhere else as a partisan leader. There can be no hope for a nation, let its valour and its endurance be ever so great, which is the prey of such an incurable spirit of discord. Only twelve months ago, at a meeting in London in favour of Poland, mainly attended by Polish refugees, the name of Count Zamoyski evoked a tempest of hissing and hooting which nearly brought the meeting to an abrupt termination.

According to one telegram Langiewicz and Miss Pastowaskow have been removed to Brunn, in Moravia; according to another they remain in the citadel of Cracow.

There has been another debate in the Prussian House of Deputies about Poland. Herr Von Bismarck Schönlhausen repeated his statement, that the Convention contained none of the stipulations which Europe had persisted in attributing to it, but he did not say what the Convention really did contain; and with the power in his hands to dispel, in a minute, all the delusions of Europe on the subject, he obstinately refuses to do so. The natural result is that no one places any confidence in his asseveration.

Prussia has concluded a navigation and literary convention with Belgium—we presume in the name of the Zollverein—and has also agreed to pay her quota towards the redemption of the Scheldt dues.

A King has at last been found for the Greeks. Prince William of Denmark, the second son of Prince Christian and brother of the Princess of Wales, a lad of seventeen, has been selected as the scapegoat of Earl Russell's blunders. There seems to be no hope of escape for him. This time Earl Russell has got the victim tied hand and foot. The poor boy's sister, the Princess Dagmar, is to marry, we are told, the Cæsarewitch Nicholas; so the Russian Government will have nothing to say against the choice, and although the Danes are very unwilling to give him up—Prince Christian, in whose descendants the succession to the Danish throne has been established by the treaty of London, has only three sons, and on the failure of that line all the old pretensions to the separation of the monarchy would revive—they cannot well help themselves. As for the Greeks nobody considers them. They must take what they can get. "Beggars must not be choosers." However, they are not likely to make any difficulties. Prince William is young; he is a sailor; he is connected with the English Royal Family, and if they particularly wish it will, no doubt, adopt the Greek faith. His sister must be converted to that Church to obtain the perilous honour of sharing the throne of Russia, and Prince William may just as well keep her company.

As we anticipated above, the Greeks have caught at the chance of getting a king. A telegram from Athens announces that the National Assembly, without waiting for any consent from the King of Denmark, or the other European Powers, has proclaimed Prince William King, under the title of George I., and despatched a deputation to Denmark to tender him the Crown.

Farini's mind has gone. Visconti Ventosa, the new Foreign Minister, is a young man of no great reputation. He made his debut in his new functions in the course of a debate in the Chamber of Deputies upon the Polish question. The Chamber handed the petitions over to him, and passed to the order of the day.

The Swedish Riksdag has augmented the sovereigns' civil list. The Reform Bill seems to be making its way. The Chamber of Citizens and the Chamber of Peasants have accepted it with unanimity. It had but two opponents in the Chamber of Nobles. It has yet its most dangerous gauntlet to run, in the Chamber of the Clergy. It may be hoped that Sweden will soon have a legislature adapted to the wants of the present day, instead of the cumbrous four-chamber system, which, although serving well enough some centuries back, now leads, for the most part, to a legislative deadlock.

The Swedes naturally show great enthusiasm for the Polish cause. They would, doubtless, like to see Russia involved in difficulties which might enable them to recover Finland. Prince Czartoryski has been fêted at Stockholm. What he does there at this moment it is hard to say. He cannot surely have supposed that he could persuade the Swedish Government to declare war against Russia.

Politics are a curious game in Portugal. A telegram, dated Tuesday, announced that after some explanations given by the Marquis de Loule on the Polish question, the Chamber of Deputies had unanimously passed a vote of confidence in the Ministry. A telegram, dated Sunday, says that the Ministry has been defeated in the Chamber of Deputies, and that a change of Ministry and a dissolution are expected. Very April weather must reign in a Portuguese Legislative Chamber.

The President of the New Spanish Ministry has, according to the omniscient Mr. Reuter, informed Senor Olozaga that the Ministry will not continue the policy of the O'Donnell Cabinet, and that its programme will be based on liberal conservative principles, which means in a free translation that it will stop in office as long as it possibly can.

Troubles have broken out again in Syria between the Christians and the Mohammedans. The Druses are said to have attacked and plundered a Christian village. Some Christians have been assassinated in Damascus, and everything looks as if the bloody scenes of some three years since were to be repeated. The Turkish Government is in the market for a loan. Can we blame it for persisting in its career of extravagance, and leading a merry life upon borrowed money? It is pestered with solicitations from European capitalists to take their money, or rather from a set of clever money-dealers, who know how to pick up the money of those people of small property who find that the three per cent. consols do not give them so large an income as they would like.

PARLIAMENTARY NOTES.

THURSDAY, MARCH 26.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

The Bill authorising the proposed extension of the Great Eastern Railway to Finsbury Circus came up again for discussion. The motion was that the Bill be now read a second time, and an amendment was moved to substitute for "now" "this day six months." The debate, which had been several times adjourned, was resumed by Lord Shaftsbury. He said that the report made to the Board of Trade recommended the postponement of all Metropolitan railway schemes. Lord Granville thought that it would be desirable to appoint a Select Committee to consider the whole question. Lord Grey objected to this suggestion. A Royal Commission had advised in 1846 that any railways admitted into London should be constructed on some uniform plan. Such a plan ought now to be laid down, and this could not be satisfactorily done by a Select Committee. The best plan would probably be to make London railways the property of some public body, and then leased out to existing companies. He thought Government should take the subject into its own hands. The Duke of Somerset disagreed with Lord Grey. If a uniform plan were devised, Parliament would have to find the money for the scheme recommended. The Earl of Derby said that all his objections to this particular Bill had been fully substantiated; he agreed with Lord Grey that all Metropolitan lines should be postponed to the next Session; and that in the meantime a Commission should be appointed to prepare a general plan, which might be carried out by private companies, as was the case on the continent.—Lord Ebury supported the amendment; Lord Granville yielded, and the second reading was negatived without a division. Some formal business was then transacted.

The Lord Chancellor asked leave to introduce a measure affecting the Church patronage vested in him. Certain Crown livings are in the gift of the Crown; that is, in the gift of the Prime Minister, who must take the pleasure of the Queen before presenting to them. But the vast majority—chiefly small livings, are in the independent gift of the Chancellor. He proposed to sell the advowsons of 329 of the smallest of these, and apply the price to the augmentation of the value of other Crown livings in his gift. He said that a parish was much better off when the advowson was in the hands of a private individual, especially in the hands of a resident proprietor; as the latter was then led to take great interest in the Church, and not unfrequently to become a benefactor to it. He explained the terms on which the sales were to be made, and which are exceedingly favourable to purchasers; only half the value of the advowson being required to be paid down, and the remainder, with compound interest, when the living falls vacant. Or they might, in case they preferred it, grant a rentcharge of 5 per cent. on the value of the advowson, to be employed in augmenting the income of the living. The purchase-money would, under the rules of the Ecclesiastical Commission, be applied to the same purpose in the case of livings under £200 a year, which should be raised to £300. The surplus should be carried over for the augmentation of the smaller livings. Lord Cranworth and Lord Chelmsford, formerly Lord Chancellors, the Duke of Marlborough, and the Bishop of London, spoke in commendation of the measure, which was brought in and read a first time. After an unintelligible "Irish row" between the Earl of Leitrim and Earl Granville, the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, MARCH 26.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

In answer to a question, Sir R. Peel said that no reports had recently been received respecting the enlistment of recruits in Ireland for the Federal army. Indeed, although there had been rumours on the subject, there had been at no time any definite statements.

A question having been put by Mr. Whalley relative to certain disloyal demonstrations in Ireland, on occasion of the Prince's marriage, Mr. Scully rose and complained angrily of the epithet "disloyal," which, he contended, ought not to have been introduced in a question put to the Government, on which no debate could be raised. The Speaker desired the hon. member to point out the expressions in the question which he deemed objectionable.—Mr. Scully held that it was quite out of order to put a question on the paper in which the chief cities of Ireland were insulted by a charge of having taken part in the disloyal demonstrations and burnt effigies of the Prince of Wales, when such was not the case.—The Speaker—The rule of the House is that in putting a question, no argument or opinion is to be offered and no new fact stated, except as far as may be necessary to explain such question. The good sense of that regulation must be evident to the House. No matter ought to be propounded in the shape of a question which would be likely to raise observation and discussion. In the present instance it is quite allowable for the hon. member to state the facts which are necessary to elucidate his question. Whether or not the assertions he has made are true it is quite beyond my province to determine. It would, of course, be very improper, and out of order, for any member to state as fact anything which he cannot substantiate. If it is capable of being established as a fact that the effigy of the Prince of Wales has been publicly burnt, then, perhaps, no great question could have been raised as to the appropriateness of applying the term "disloyal" to the transaction. (Hear, hear.) At the same time the rule of the House is, as I have stated, that no matter of opinion or argument can be introduced in putting a question.—Sir R. Peel said that certain very improper demonstrations, and in some places serious riots, had taken place. But there was no reflection on the general loyalty of Ireland; and where the riots had occurred the magistrates had done their duty, and some of the offenders had been summarily punished. On the order for going into Committee of Supply on the Civil Service Estimates, Mr. Dodson called attention to the charges for the diplomatic service; and moved that, in the opinion of the House, all sums required to defray the expenses of the diplomatic service ought to be annually voted by Parliament, and that estimates of all such sums ought to be submitted in a form that would admit of their effectual supervision and control by the House. At present, part of those charges were voted annually, a part defrayed out of the Consolidated Fund.—Mr. Layard expressed a fear that if the proposal were adopted, the members of the diplomatic service would look rather to the House than to the Foreign Office, and would be gradually led into party connections and party feeling. He hoped it would be rejected. The motion was opposed by Mr. G. Duff, and supported by Mr. A. Smith and Mr. Ayrton. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said that, although he felt it his duty to oppose the motion, all his prejudices and prepossessions ran in its favour. It had, however, been the opinion of the successive Governments of this country that the higher class of diplomatists ought to be placed in a position of absolute independence of Parliament; and he was not prepared, on mature consideration, to adopt the opposite principle. The motion was negatived on a division by 136 votes to 65. The House soon after resolved itself into a Committee of Supply, and proceeded to the consideration of the civil service estimates. A discussion was raised by Mr. Henley on the novel course adopted by the Government, in first taking votes on account, and then proceeding on the same night to discuss the votes for the same services in detail, which he denounced as irregular and unconstitutional. Mr. F. Peel and Sir G. C. Lewis defended the course of the Government. The House then resumed; some further business was transacted, and the House adjourned at half-past one.

FRIDAY, MARCH 27.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

Several desultory inquiries were made on various subjects, and the Lord Chancellor's Church Patronage Bill was read a second time amid general expressions of approval, and ordered to be referred to a Select Committee.—The House at its rising adjourned till the 14th of April.

FRIDAY, MARCH 27.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Colonel Wilson Patten asked the Home Secretary for information relative to the condition of the manufacturing districts. Sir G. Grey said that since the riots at Staleybridge had been suppressed a better feeling had prevailed; but that the very unwise conduct of the Mansion House Committee in sending £500 to Staleybridge to be distributed in money and not in tickets had, as an encouragement to riot, caused serious apprehensions. Mr. Cubitt, late Lord Mayor, explained that it was an application from the clergy of Staleybridge which had induced them to take this step; and that they had sent the money not to the rioters, but to the Relief Committee. He took a subsequent opportunity of narrating the circumstances which led to the formation of the Mansion House Committee, before any central organization existed in Lancashire; and declared that he would have been willing to hand over their funds to the Central Executive at Manchester, if the public had seemed to approve the proposed transfer. After several unimportant questions had been put and answered, Lord Palmerston moved that the House at its rising do adjourn till Monday, April 13th. On this motion arose one of those curiously intermingled discussions to which such motions give rise, the rule being that the ministers, like other members, can only speak once on one motion; all who want to elicit a reply from the same minister, on whatever topic, must speak before he rises. With a view, therefore, of eliciting from Mr. Layard certain information on matters of fact, and from Lord Palmerston an expression of feeling or opinion, two Polish and two American questions were put, and an entangled debate took place on all. [We shall separate the discussions, for the convenience of our readers, begging them to remember that the order we adopt is not that of time, but of matter.] Mr. Hennessy called attention to the policy of Her Majesty's Government with respect to Poland. He complained that in times past Lord Palmerston had evinced a backwardness in the cause of Poland, accepting the promises of Russia, and refusing to act with France on behalf of the Poles, which justified the House, he thought, in scrutinizing his policy. He asked Lord Palmerston, therefore, what had been done relative to Poland, and how far Her Majesty's Government had accepted or refused joint action with France.

Mr. Griffith asked a question respecting the alleged passage of the Russian troops through Prussian territory in order to attack the Polish insurgents; and the alleged wounding and robbery of a British subject, Ludwig Finkenstein, bearing a British passport, by the Russian soldiery. In making these inquiries he discoursed at some length upon the Polish question.—Mr. Layard stated that the Government had no official information that a portion of Russian troops had crossed the frontier. As to the case of the British subject, the Government had received information, which led to the conclusion that a more disgraceful and discreditable outrage was never perpetrated. It appeared that Mr. Finkenstein crossed from Cracow into Poland with a Polish lady, who asked him to allow her to travel in his car. On crossing the frontier they were stopped by the Russian guard, but on the gentleman showing his passport they were allowed to pass on. At some distance from the frontier they fell in with a party of Russian troops, who stopped them during a night, and the officer said that they must be sent on to the General. A party of insurgents were in the distance, and as the travellers were being escorted, together with a number of captives, to the General, firing commenced. On the instant the Russian soldiers seized and murdered the captives and the lady, and took Mr. Finkenstein out of the car, stripped him, inflicted about thirty-eight wounds on him, and left him for dead. The two officers present did their best, according to Mr. Finkenstein's statement, to prevent this outrage. While lying on the ground Mr. Finkenstein was found by the Polish General, Langiewicz, who, perceiving signs of life in him, had him removed to Cracow. Lord Bloomfield, as soon as he heard of the case, sent a person to Mr. Finkenstein to learn the full particulars, and the statement now made to the House was taken down from Mr. Finkenstein's own words. (Hear, hear.) Mr. Finkenstein was not dead. The Government had sent out orders for a full inquiry into the whole case, and though there was some doubt whether Mr. Finkenstein was a British subject, yet if he should prove to be one, full reparation, it was to be hoped, would be obtained.—Lord Palmerston, in reply to Mr. Hennessy, said he could add very little to what he had said upon a former occasion. The Government had made a communication to that of Russia, and was in communication with the Government of France, for the purpose of joint action of a diplomatic character, and with other Governments parties to the treaty of Vienna. It was inexpedient to go into details with respect to these communications, but he hoped that, after Easter, the Government might be able to lay papers on the subject before the House.

Mr. W. E. Forster, member for Bradford, and one of the most rational members of the Radical party, complained of the sufferance by our Government of the escape of the Alabama and the Oreto. He argued that such connivance at an infraction of the law was sure to provoke bitter animosity on the part of the United States, especially if, as was said to be the case, six iron-clad vessels—a complete navy—were to follow the Alabama.—The Solicitor-General said that the Government of the United States was unhappily in the habit of making frequent and unreasonable complaints against England on grounds altogether frivolous; as that arms and munitions of war had been shipped for Confederate ports, and so forth; and these complaints, published in America, and supposed by the people there to be well founded in international law, did much to provoke ill-will towards this country. This conduct was deeply to be regretted, as the Federal Government must be perfectly aware that it had no right to make any complaints on such grounds. With regard to the Oreto, no complaint had been lodged against her until the day before she sailed, and then it was too late. She had been arrested at Nassau, tried, and acquitted for want of evidence of any intention to violate the Foreign Enlistment Act. On that score, therefore, there was no ground for complaint against our Government. The evidence in the case of the Alabama was not completed till the 26th of July; it was submitted to the law officers of the Crown, and on their opinion orders were given to seize her on the 29th, on which day she had put to sea without a clearance, as on a trial trip. These ships had not, in violating the Foreign Enlistment Act, committed us to any violation of international law. We had a right to enforce or not enforce that Act, or to repeal it, and no one could complain on that score. No wrong, therefore, had been done to the United States. He cited the following dictum of the Supreme Court of that country:—"A neutral nation may, if so disposed, without a breach of her neutral character, grant permission to both belligerents to equip their vessels of war within her territory; but without such permission the subjects of such belligerent Powers have no right to equip vessels of war, or to increase or augment their force, either with arms or with men, within the territory of such neutral nation. Such unauthorised acts violate her sovereignty and her rights as a neutral. All captures made by means of such equipments are illegal in relation to such nation." The equipment of the Alabama was therefore an offence against England, not against America. Another dictum of Mr. Justice Story, in reference to an American ship taken to Buenos Ayres, and employed as a cruiser in the service of the Government there by her American captain and crew, was strictly applicable to the present case:—"The question as to the original illegal armament and outfit of the Independencia may be dismissed in a few words. It is apparent that, though equipped as a vessel of war, she was sent to Buenos Ayres on a commercial adventure, contraband, indeed, but in no shape violating our laws on our national neutrality. If captured by a Spanish ship of war during the voyage she would have been justly condemned as good prize, and for being engaged in a traffic prohibited by the law of nations. But there is nothing in our laws, or in the law of nations, that forbids our citizens from sending armed vessels, as well as munitions of war, to foreign ports for sale. It is a commercial adventure which no nation is bound to prohibit, and which only exposes the persons engaged in it to the penalty of confiscation. Supposing, therefore, the voyage to have been for commercial purposes, and the sale at Buenos Ayres to have been a bona fide sale (and there is nothing in the evidence before us to contradict it), there is no pretence to say that the original outfit on the voyage was illegal, or that a capture made after the sale was, for that cause alone, invalid." He must trouble the House with one more American decision. The case occurred in 1832, and the doctrine laid down was this:—"The collectors are not authorised to detain vessels, although manifestly built for war-like purposes and about to depart from the United States, unless circumstances shall render it probable that such vessels are intended to be employed by the owners to commit hostilities against some foreign Power at peace with the United States." The United States might indeed ask us, as a friendly Power, to enforce our own laws in their favour; and in any case in which evidence was furnished, the Government was ready so to do. At the same time we must not forget that our neutrality had been quite as often and as flagrantly violated, and the Foreign Enlistment Act as much defied by the Federal as by the Confederate Government.—Mr. Bright admitted that Mr. Seward's complaints were in some cases ill-founded; but denounced the connivance of Government at the escape of the Alabama, and urged that, as the Federal Government was the only one acknowledged by us throughout the territory over which it claimed dominion, we might have done more than extend to it a cold and unfriendly neutrality.—Mr. Laird, the builder of the Alabama, said that everything in regard to the building of that vessel had been done openly and above-board, and no means of acquiring information had been refused to her Majesty's Government. He had been asked to build vessels of war, fitted with guns, for the Federal Government, but had declined to do so. "The North had received enormous supplies of arms and munitions of war from this country.

Mr. Seymour Fitzgerald called attention to the capture of the British steamer Peterhoff, one of a line of vessels trading regularly between London and the Mexican port of Matamoras, which, having no suspicious goods on board, and with her papers in order, was captured by order of Captain Wilks in the neutral waters of St. Thomas, and sent to Key-West for adjudication. He complained of this as a gross outrage on international law, and as likely to interrupt altogether our trade with Mexico; remarking, moreover, that the Government had had full warning of the intention to seize this ship, noted in a list of suspected vessels forwarded by Mr. Adams to the Foreign-Office. He censured in strong terms the conduct of Lord Russell in regard to the interruption of the trade between Liverpool and Nassau, which, he contended, had led to such outrages as the present.—Mr. Layard said that the case of the Peterhoff had been submitted to the law officers of the Crown; but he saw no reason to doubt that an American Prize Court would do justice in the case.—Lord Palmerston wished to know how our neutrality could be, as Mr. Bright wished it, warm and friendly towards the Federals without being, in fact, a sort of hostility to the Confederates. He lamented the proneness in America to raise a party cry against England, which he hoped would not be carried too far, since it had a tendency to endanger the friendly relations between the two countries, and he regretted that speeches should be uttered in that House calculated to encourage that cry. The Solicitor-General had demonstrated that the Americans had no just ground to find fault with us; that we had done everything the law enabled us and authorized us to do. It would have been much more agreeable to the Government if no supplies of any kind had been furnished to either of the belligerent parties, but they could not go beyond the law. In many previous instances it had been found impossible to prevent supplies being sent from England, even when, as in the Spanish civil war, we had espoused the cause of the party against whom those supplies were to be used. Some further discussion took place. After transacting some business of little interest, the House adjourned till the 13th instant.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, April 1.

Our last report closed upon a steady market, with Fair Dhollerahs at 17d.

On Thursday a good business was done, and the market closed strong on receipt of India news reporting a further advance in goods in Bombay of 6d., and Calcutta 1s. 6d. per piece.

On Friday the effect of these accounts was apparent in the large business done in Manchester, principally for Eastern markets, further relieving many spinners who had been crippled by accumulating stocks, and enabling them to come again freely into the Liverpool market. The sales here reached 12,000 bales, principally to the trade and exporters, at $\frac{1}{2}$ advance.

On Saturday, a business of 8,000 bales was done at firm prices.

On Monday, further Calcutta news was to hand, quoting an advance since the previous advices of 6d. to 9d. per piece, with excited markets; the sales reached 10,000 bales without change.

Yesterday and to-day, with sales of 5,000 and 7,000 bales, we have no further change to note. A good healthy tone pervades the market; the demand from the trade and exporters is liberal, but our stock being large and imports heavy, it is freely met by holders. We quote Middling Orleans 22d.; Fair Egyptian, 22d.; Fair Sawginned Dharwar, 18 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; Fair Dhollerah and Omrawtee, 17 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.

At no period since the American war commenced has an early settlement seemed less probable than at present; the voice of the Peace party in the North is almost hushed, and both Democrats and Republicans seem determined to prosecute the war at whatever sacrifice of blood and treasure. The South, meanwhile inspired by their victory at Port Hudson, their successful defence of Vicksburg, and the continued immunity of Charleston and Savannah from attack, are as confident as ever of ultimate success, and appear more likely to adopt the offensive before long than to meet with those crushing defeats so confidently predicted by the Federal press.

The future course of our market now mainly depends on the nature of our Eastern advices. If the Indian markets continue to advance, which seems probable, production here will increase, and prices continue to harden; with a liberal supply, however, on the water our stock will not for some time fall much under 400,000 bales, and with such an amount on hand, a large advance in price could not be maintained.

MANCHESTER, March 31.

During the past week there has been a moderately active demand both for yarn and cloth, at steadily advancing prices, caused by still further and better advices from Calcutta, at which market shirtings were reported to have realised an increase of from 16d. to 18d. per piece on the prices of the previous telegram.

Nos. 40, 50, and 60s' mule yarns, suitable for India, were purchased freely on Friday, at an advance of from $\frac{1}{2}$ d. to 1d. per lb., but these qualities being difficult to find in stock, orders were given out to spin, which will cause some mills to commence working again that have been stopped for some long time back.

Home-trade yarns were sold readily at an advance of from $\frac{1}{2}$ d. to 3d. per lb., and many spinners holding out for better prices, refused to sell at this advance.

India shirtings were in good demand at an advance of fully 3d. per piece, whilst mulls and jaconets fetched no more than was realised for them the previous week, notwithstanding there being an active inquiry for them.

On Monday there was again an active demand for India fabrics, owing to a report of there being a further telegram from Calcutta, dated four days later, advising another advance on shirtings of from 6d. to 9d. per piece.

To-day the demand for India goods has been satisfactory, 7 lbs. shirtings having realised an improvement of 6d. per piece on Friday's prices, and 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ lbs. ditto 3d. per piece. Mulls and jaconets sold readily at 3d. per piece advance, and such is the paucity of stocks of these staples in this market, that many parties have disposed of their "reject lots," which have accumulated during the past few months at good prices.

Home trade yarns are again $\frac{1}{2}$ d. per lb. higher, whilst India qualities are fully 1d. to 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. per lb. higher.

THE ALABAMA.

DIPLOMATIC CORRESPONDENCE.

The following documents are taken from the correspondence between Earl Russell and Mr. Adams, recently presented to Parliament; they were written subsequent to the departure of the Alabama:—

No. 15.

MR. ADAMS TO EARL RUSSELL.—(Received November 22.)
Legation of the United States, London,
November 20, 1862.

My Lord,—It is with very great regret that I find myself once more under the necessity of calling your Lordship's attention to the painful situation in which the Government of the United States is placed by the successive reports received of the depredations committed on the high seas upon merchant-vessels by the gunboat known in this country as "No. 290," touching the construction and outfit of which in the port of Liverpool, for the above purpose, I had the honour of heretofore presenting evidence of the most positive character.

It is my duty now to submit to your consideration copies of a large number of papers received from Washington, as well as from the Consul at Liverpool, all of which concur in establishing the truth of the allegations made by me of the intentions of that vessel prior to her departure from the ports of this kingdom. I then averred that the purpose was to make war upon the people of the United States, a nation with which Great Britain has now been for half a century, and still is, on a footing of the most friendly alliance by the force of treaties which have received the solemn sanction of all the authorities regarded among men as necessary to guarantee the mutual obligations of nations. That I made no mistake in that averment is now fully proved by the hostile proceedings of that vessel since the day she sailed from the place in this kingdom where she was prepared for that end.

It now appears from a survey of all the evidence,—first, that this vessel was built in a dockyard belonging to a commercial house in Liverpool, of which the chief member, down to October of last year, is a member of the House of Commons; secondly, that from the manner of her construction, and her peculiar adaptation to war purposes, there could have been no doubt by those engaged in the work, and familiar with such details, that she was intended for other purposes than those of legitimate trade; and thirdly, that during the whole process and outfit in the port of Liverpool, the direction of the details, and the engagement of persons to be employed in her, were more or less in hands known to be connected with the insurgents in the United States. It further appears that since her departure from Liverpool, which she was suffered to leave without any of the customary evidence at the Custom House to designate her ownership, she has been supplied with her armament, with coals, and stores, and men, by vessels known to be fitted out and despatched for the purpose from the same port; and that although commanded by Americans in her navigation of the ocean, she is manned almost entirely by English seamen, engaged and forwarded from that port by persons in league with her commander. Furthermore, it is shown that this commander, claiming to be an officer acting under legitimate authority, yet is in the constant practice of raising the flag of Great Britain, in order the better to execute his system of ravage and depredation on the high seas. And lastly, it is made clear that he pays no regard whatever to the recognised law of capture of merchant vessels on the high seas, which requires the action of some judicial tribunal to confirm the rightfulness of the proceeding; but, on the contrary, that he resorts to the piratical system of taking, plundering, and burning private property without regard to consequences or responsibility to any legitimate authority whatever.

Such being the admitted state of the facts, the case evidently opens a series of novel questions of the gravest character to the consideration of all civilized countries. It is obviously impossible to reconcile the toleration by any one nation of similar undertakings in its own ports to the injury of another nation with which it is at peace, with any known theory of moral or political obligation. It is equally clear that the reciprocation of such practices could only lead, in the end, to the utter subversion of all security to private property upon the ocean. In the case of countries geographically approximated to one another, the preservation of peace between them for any length of time would be rendered by it almost impossible. It would be, in short, permitting any or all irresponsible parties to prepare and fit out, in any country, just what armed enterprises against the property of their neighbours they might think fit to devise, without the possibility of recovering a control over their acts the moment after they might succeed in escaping from the particular local jurisdiction into the high seas.

It is by no means my desire to imply an intention on the part of Her Majesty's Government to countenance any such idea. I am fully aware of the fact that, at a very early date, more than one month before the escape of the vessel, on my presenting evidence of the nature and purposes of the nameless vessel, together with the decided opinion of eminent counsel that a gross violation of the law of the land, as well as a breach of the law of nations, was in process of perpetration, an investigation was entered into by the law officers of the Crown, which resulted in an acknowledgment of the justice of the remonstrance. In consequence of this I am led to infer, from the language of your Lordship's note of the 22nd of September explaining the facts of the case, that an order to detain the vessel at Liverpool was about to issue on the 29th of July last, when a telegraphic message was forwarded to you from that port to the effect that the vessel had escaped that very morning. Your Lordship further adds that instructions were then immediately sent to Ireland to stop her should she put into Queenstown, and similar instructions were forwarded to the port of Nassau. But it has turned out that nothing has been heard of her at either place.

It thus appears that her Majesty's Government had become so far convinced of the true nature of the enterprise in agitation at Liverpool from the evidence which I had had the honour to submit to your Lordship's consideration, and from other inquiry, as to have determined on detaining the vessel. So far as this action went, it seems to have admitted the existence of a case of violation of the laws of neutrality in one of Her Majesty's ports of which the Government of the United States had a right to complain. The question will then remain, how far the failure of the proceedings thus admitted to have been instituted by Her Majesty's Government to prevent the departure of this vessel affects the right of reclamation of the Government of the United States for the grievous damage done to the property of their citizens in permitting the escape of this lawless pirate from its jurisdiction.

And here it may not be without its use to call to your Lordship's recollection for a moment the fact that this question, like almost all others connected with the duty of neutrals in time of war on the high seas, has been much agitated in the discussions heretofore held between the authorities of the two countries. During the latter part of the last century it fell to the lot of Her Majesty's Government to make the strongest remonstrances against the fitting out in the ports of the United States of vessels with an intent to prey upon British commerce; not, however, in the barbarous and illegal manner shown to have been practised by "No. 290," but subject to the forms of ultimate adjudication equally recognised by all civilised nations: and they went the further length of urging the acknowledgment of the principle of compensation in damages for the consequences of not preventing the departure of such vessels. That principle was formally recognised as valid by both parties, in the VIIIth Article of the Treaty of the 19th November, 1794; and accordingly all cases of damage previously done by capture of British vessels or merchandise by vessels originally fitted out in the ports of the United States were therein agreed to be referred to a Commission provided for by that Treaty, to award the necessary sums for full compensation.

I am well aware that the provisions of that Treaty are no longer in force, and that even if they were, they bound only the United States to make good the damage done in the precise contingency then occurring. But I cannot for a moment permit myself to suppose that Her Majesty's Government, by the very act of pressing for the recognition of the principle in a Treaty when it applied for its own benefit, did not mean to be understood as equally ready to sustain it at any and all times when it might be justly applied to the omission to prevent similar action of British subjects within its own jurisdiction towards the people of the United States.

But I would beg further to call your Lordship's attention to the circumstance that there is the strongest reason to believe that the claim for compensation in cases of this kind was not pressed by Her Majesty's Government merely in connection with the obtaining a formal recognition of the principle in an express contract. This seems to have been but a later step, and one growing out of a previous advance of a similar demand based only on general principles of equity that should prevail at all times between nations. Here, again, it appears that the Government of the United States, having admitted a failure down to a certain date in taking efficient steps to prevent the outfit in their ports of cruisers against the vessels of Great Britain, with whom they were at peace, recognised the validity of the claim advanced by Mr. Hammond, Her Majesty's Minister Plenipotentiary at Philadelphia, for captures of British vessels subsequently made by those cruisers even on the high seas. This principle will be found acknowledged in its full length in the reply of Mr. Jefferson, then Secretary of State to the United States, dated 5th of September, 1793, to a letter from Mr. Hammond of the 30th of August preceding, a copy of which is unfortunately not in my possession; but which, from the tenor of the answer, I must presume to have itself distinctly presented the admitted ground of the claim.

Armed by the authority of such a precedent, having done all in my power to apprise Her Majesty's Government of the illegal enterprise in ample season for effecting its prevention; and being now enabled to show the injurious consequences to innocent parties, relying upon the security of their commerce from any danger through British sources, ensuing from the omission of Her Majesty's Government, however little designed, to apply the proper prevention in due season,—I have the honour to inform your Lordship of the directions which I have received from my Government to solicit redress for the national and private injuries already thus sustained, as well as a more effective prevention of any repetition of such lawless and injurious proceedings in Her Majesty's ports hereafter.

I pray, &c.,
(Signed) CHARLES FRANCIS ADAMS.

No. 16.

EARL RUSSELL TO MR. ADAMS.

Foreign Office, December 19, 1862.

Sir,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 20th ultimo, in which, under instructions from your Government, you submit, for the consideration of Her Majesty's Government, papers confirming the truth of the allegations which you made to me some time ago as to the intentions with which the vessel formerly known as "No. 290," but now called the Alabama, was fitted out at Liverpool; and you observe that those allegations are now fully proved by the hostile proceedings of that vessel since she left the United Kingdom.

You pass in review the history of the Alabama both before and since she sailed from Liverpool; and you state that the facts being admitted, they present to the consideration of all civilized countries a series of novel questions of the gravest character. You say that it is obviously impossible to reconcile the toleration by any one nation of similar undertakings in its own ports to the injury of another nation with which it is at peace, with any known theory of moral or political obligation; and you add, with some further observations in the same sense, that the reciprocation of such practices could only in the end lead to the utter subversion of all security to private property upon the ocean.

You, however, say that it is by no means your desire to imply an intention on the part of Her Majesty's Government to countenance any such idea. You admit that you are aware of the measures adopted at a very early date with reference to the Alabama, and of the orders subsequently issued to detain that vessel as soon as legal opinions were obtained; orders which it was not possible for the authorities to execute, because at the very moment when they were issued the Alabama made her escape from Liverpool.

You finally state that you have been instructed to solicit redress for the national and private injuries sustained by the proceedings of this vessel, as well as a more effective prevention of any repetition of them in British ports hereafter.

Before I proceed to examine the justice of these demands, it will be convenient that I should advert to the circumstances to which you call my attention as having occurred soon after the breaking out of the French revolutionary war. You observe that on that occasion remonstrances were addressed by the British Government to that of the United States respecting the fitting out of privateers in United States' ports with an intent to prey upon British commerce; and that the demands of the British Government were admitted by the United States, and were formally recognised in the 6th Article of the Treaty between the two countries of the 19th of November, 1794.

But an examination of the actual occurrences, and of the history of that remarkable period, present a state of facts materially different from those relating to the "Alabama." Those facts may be shortly stated as follows:—

The revolutionary Government of France had openly avowed its determination to disregard all the principles of international law which had been acknowledged by civilized States; and that Government proceeded to put in force its determination by claiming to equip, as a matter of right, and by actually equipping, privateers in the neutral ports of the United States by sending those privateers forth from those ports to prey upon British commerce by bringing prizes into the neutral ports, and by then going through some scant forms of adjudication.

This was the avowed system upon which the agents of belligerent France claimed to act, and upon which, owing to the temporary superiority of her naval force, they did for a short period act in the neutral ports and waters of the United States, notwithstanding the remonstrances of the United States' Government.

It was these several facts, namely, the open and deliberate equipment of privateers in American ports by the French, the capture by those privateers of British vessels in United States' waters, and the bringing them as prizes into United States' ports, which formed collectively the basis of the demands made by the British Plenipotentiaries. Those demands had reference not to the accidental evasion of a municipal law of the United States by a particular ship, but to a systematic disregard of international law upon some of the most important points of neutral obligation.

This is apparent from the whole correspondence of the British Government with the Government of the United States, and from the replies of Mr. Jefferson to Mr. Hammond, the British Minister. Consequently neither the complaints of the British Government in 1793, nor the Treaty of 1794, have any bearing upon the question now under discussion.

With regard to the claim for compensation now put forward by the United States' Government, it is, I regret to say, notorious that the Queen's Proclamation of the 13th of May, 1861, enjoining neutrality in the unfortunate civil contest in North America, has in several instances been practically set at naught by parties in this country. On the one hand, vast supplies of arms and warlike stores have been purchased in this country, and have been shipped from British ports to New York, for the use of the United States' Government. On the other hand, munitions of war have found their way from this country to ports in possession of the Government of the so-called Confederate States.

These evasions of the neutrality prescribed by the Queen's Proclamation have caused Her Majesty's Government much concern, but it is not difficult to account for what has occurred.

Such shipments as I have spoken of may be effected without any breach of municipal law, and commercial enterprise in this country, as elsewhere, is always ready to embark in speculations offering a prospect of success, or in which, at all events, the promise of gain is supposed to be greater than the risk of loss.

British subjects who have engaged in such enterprises have been left by Her Majesty's Government to abide by the penalty attaching to their disregard of the Queen's Proclamation of Neutrality, that penalty being by international law the condemnation as prize of war of vessel and cargo, if captured by a belligerent cruiser, and duly condemned in a competent Prize Court.

Her Majesty's Government have nevertheless availed themselves of every fitting opportunity to discourage these enterprises, and I have the honour to refer you, in illustration of the truth of this, to the answer which I caused to be returned on the 6th of July to a memorial from British merchants and shipowners at Liverpool, and of which I furnished you confidentially with a copy in my note of the 4th of August.

It is right, however, to observe, that the party which has profited by far the most by these unjustifiable practices has been the Government of the United States; because that Government having a superiority of force by sea, and having blockaded most of the Confederate ports, has been able, on the one hand, safely to receive all the warlike supplies which it has induced British manufacturers and merchants to send to United States' ports in violation of the Queen's proclamation, and, on the other hand, to intercept and capture a great part of the supplies of the same kind which were destined from this country to the Confederate States.

If it be sought to make her Majesty's Government responsible to that of the United States because arms and munitions of war have left this country on account of the Confederate Government, that Confederate Government, as the other belligerent, may very well maintain that it has a just cause of complaint against the British Government, because the United States' arsenals had been replenished from British sources.

Nor would it be possible to deny that, in defiance of the Queen's proclamation, many subjects of Her Majesty, owing allegiance to her Crown, have enlisted in the armies of the United States. Of this fact you cannot be ignorant.

Her Majesty's Government, therefore, have just grounds of complaint against both of the belligerent parties, but most especially against the Government of the United States, for having systematically, and in disregard of that comity of nations which it was their duty to observe, induced subjects of Her Majesty to violate those orders which, in conformity with her neutral position, she has enjoined all her subjects to obey.

Great Britain cannot be held responsible to either party for these irregular proceedings of British subjects; and an endeavour to make her so would be about as reasonable as if Her Majesty's Government were to demand compensation from the United States for the injuries done to the property of British subjects by the Alabama, resting their demand on the ground that the United States claim authority and jurisdiction over the Confederate States, by whom that vessel was commissioned.

So far as relates to the export of arms and munitions of war by subjects of Great Britain from British ports, for the use of the Confederates, it is a sufficient answer to say that the municipal law of this country does not empower Her Majesty's Government to prohibit or interfere with such export, except in extraordinary cases, when the Executive is armed with special powers; and, with regard to the law of nations, it is clear that the permission to export such articles is not contrary to that law, and that it affords no just ground of complaint to a belligerent. The authorities for this latter position are numerous and unconflicting, but it may suffice to refer to passages on the subject in the works of two American writers of high and admitted authority. The passages are as follows:—

1. "It is not the practice of nations to undertake to prohibit their own subjects, by previous laws, from trafficking in articles contraband of war. Such trade is carried on at the risk of those engaged in it, under the liabilities and penalties prescribed by the law of nations or particular treaties." (Wheaton's "International Law," sixth edition, 1855, page 571, by Lawrence.)

2. "It is a general understanding that the Powers at war.

may seize and confiscate all contraband goods without any complaint on the part of the neutral merchant, and without any imputation of a breach of neutrality in the neutral sovereign himself. It was contended on the part of the French nation in 1796, that neutral Governments were bound to restrain their subjects from selling or exporting articles contraband of war to the belligerent powers. But it was successfully shown, on the part of the United States, that neutrals may lawfully sell, at home, to a belligerent purchaser, or carry, themselves, to the belligerent powers, contraband articles, subject to the right of seizure in transitu. This right has since been explicitly declared by the judicial authorities of this country (United States). The right of the neutral to transport, and of the hostile power to seize, are conflicting rights, and neither party can charge the other with a criminal act." (Kent's "Commentaries," vol. i., p. 145, eighth edition, 1854.)

In accordance with these principles, the President's Message of 31st December, 1855, contains the following passage:—

"In pursuance of this policy, the laws of the United States do not forbid their citizens to sell to either of the belligerent powers articles contraband of war, or take munitions of war or soldiers on board their private ships for transportation, and although in so doing the individual citizen exposes his property or person to some of the hazards of war, his acts do not involve any breach of national neutrality, nor of themselves implicate the Government."

As regards the sailing of the Alabama from Liverpool, I cannot do better than refer you to the circumstances respecting that vessel with which I have already had the honour to make you acquainted. In my letter of the 28th of July I informed you that it was requisite to consult the law officers of the Crown before any active steps could be taken in regard to that vessel. In my letter of the 22nd of September I explained that, from the nature of the case, some time was necessarily spent in procuring the requisite evidence; that the report of the law officers was not received until the 29th of July; and that on the same day a telegraphic message reached Her Majesty's Government stating that the vessel had that morning sailed. Instructions were then despatched to detain her should she put in either at Queenstown or Nassau, to one or other of which ports it was expected that she would go; but the Alabama did not call at either of those places. On the 4th of October I stated to you that much as Her Majesty's Government desired to prevent such occurrences, they were unable to go beyond the law, municipal and international; and on the 16th of that month I replied to your observations with reference to the infringement of the Foreign Enlistment Act, by remarking that it was true that the Foreign Enlistment Act, or any other act for the same purpose, might be evaded by subtle contrivances, but that Her Majesty's Government could not on that account go beyond the letter of the existing law.

However, it is needless that I should pursue this branch of the question further, since you admit that you are aware that the Alabama sailed not only without the direct authority or indirect permission of Her Majesty's Government, but in opposition to the municipal law, and in spite of earnest endeavours made to enforce it.

That this should have happened is a circumstance not calculated to excite much surprise in the United States, for two reasons: first, because the principal municipal law of the United States (passed almost at the same time as that of this country, and, it is believed, after a full understanding between the two States) is, in fact, almost identical with that of Great Britain upon this subject; and, secondly, because its notorious evasion, during the late war waged by Great Britain and her allies against Russia, was the subject of remonstrances on the part of Her Majesty's Representative at Washington to the United States' Government.

Great Britain was then, as on other occasions, assured that every effort which the law would permit had been made to prevent such practices; that the United States' Government could only proceed on legal evidence, the law as to which is almost, if not entirely, the same as in this country; and that without such evidence no conviction could be procured.

In the case of the Alabama, it is not denied that strict orders were given for her detention as soon as it appeared to the legal advisers of the Crown that the evidence might be sufficient to warrant them in advising such a course, and that the Alabama contrived to evade the execution of those orders.

Her Majesty's Government cannot, therefore, admit that they are under any obligation whatever to make compensation to United States' citizens on account of the proceedings of that vessel.

As regards your demand for a more effective prevention, for the future, of the fitting out of such vessels in British ports, I have the honour to inform you that Her Majesty's Government, after consultation with the law officers of the Crown, are of opinion that certain amendments might be introduced into the Foreign Enlistment Act, which, if sanctioned by Parliament, would have the effect of giving greater power to the Executive to prevent the construction, in British ports, of ships destined for the use of belligerents. But Her Majesty's Government consider that, before submitting any proposals of that sort to Parliament, it would be desirable that they should previously communicate with the Government of the United States, and ascertain whether that Government is willing to make similar alterations in its own Foreign Enlistment Act, and that the amendments, like the original statute, should, as it were, proceed pari passu in both countries.

I shall accordingly be ready to confer at any time with you, and to listen to any suggestions which you may have to make by which the British Foreign Enlistment Act and the corresponding statute of the United States may be made more efficient for their purpose.

No. 17.

MR. ADAMS TO EARL RUSSELL.—(Received December 31.)
Legation of the United States,
London, December 30, 1862.

My Lord,—I have the honour to acknowledge the reception of your Lordship's note of the 19th instant, in reply to the representation I had been instructed to submit to your consideration, touching the ravages committed on the commerce of the United States by a vessel of war built and fitted out in a port of this kingdom, and for the most part manned by her Majesty's subjects. So far as that note responds to the two great objects of inquiry which I had been directed to propose, my duty has been performed by the transmission, without loss of time, of a copy of it for the consideration of my Government. But your Lordship has done me the honour to touch upon several collateral topics incidentally connected with the reasoning contained in my note, in a manner which seems to require from me a somewhat extended explanation.

The first of these to which my attention has been particularly directed relates to the fact, which your Lordship appears readily to admit, that her Majesty's Proclamation of the 13th of May, 1861, enjoining neutrality in the unfortunate civil contest in North America, has been practically set at naught in this kingdom. Much as it may impair the confidence heretofore so generally and justly entertained in the ability of her Majesty's Government to enforce her authority within her own dominions, I am not aware that in the representation I had the honour to make upon this particular occasion, any reasoning of mine was made to rest upon it. The question, as connected with the case of "No. 290," was presented by the eminent Council on whose opinion I relied, mainly on the ground that the building and equipment of that vessel was a gross violation of the municipal law of this kingdom. It was expressly stated by Mr. Collier that "it appeared difficult to make out a stronger case of infringement of the Foreign Enlistment Act, which, if not enforced on this occasion, is little better than a dead letter." That this position was a correct one, is fully confirmed by the report subsequently made by her Majesty's law officers, and by the later efforts of her Majesty's Government to act under the law. It is not, then, the nullity of her Majesty's Proclamation that is now in question. It is rather the admitted fact of a violation of a statute of this kingdom intended to prevent ill-disposed persons from involving it in difficulty by committing wanton and injurious assaults upon foreign nations with which it is at peace, of which her Majesty's Ministers are invited by a party injured to take cognizance, of which they do not take cognizance so far as to prepare measures of prevention, but which, by reason of circumstances wholly within their own control, they do not prevent in season to save the justly complaining party from serious injury. On the substantial points of the case little room seems left open for discussion. The omission to act in season is not denied: the injury committed on an innocent person is beyond dispute. If in these particulars I shall be found to be correct, then I respectfully submit to your Lordship whether it does not legitimately follow that such a party has a right to complain and to ask redress. And in this sense it matters little how that omission may have occurred, whether by intentional neglect or by accidental delays having no reference to the merits of the question; the injury done to the innocent party giving a timely notice remains the same, and those who permitted it remain equally responsible.

It is in this view that the precedent which I had the honour to cite from the earlier history of the United States appeared to me to have much more pertinence than your Lordship is inclined to attach to it. I still think that it has not attracted so much of your attention as it deserves. Your Lordship will pardon me for suggesting that it was not because "the Revolutionary Government of France openly avowed its determination to disregard all the principles of international law which had been acknowledged by civilized States," or because of "a supposed temporary superiority of her naval force," it did "actually equip privateers in the neutral ports of the United States, and send them forth to prey upon British commerce," &c., that the Government of the United States were induced to listen to the demands of the British Government for redress. The claim that was actually made by France rested upon its interpretation of two articles of a solemn treaty, offensive and defensive, between France and the United States, which not without show of reason claimed for the former the right to fit out cruisers against its enemies in the ports of the United States. Although very properly denying this to be the correct version, the Government of the United States felt unwilling to act on a policy of repression until due notice given of its determination to abide by an opposite construction. In the interval, certain captures of British vessels took place, which the Government, because of its failure, for the reasons assigned, to prevent them, considered itself bound to make good. Here are the very words of Mr. Jefferson in his letter to Mr. Hammond:—

"Having for particular reasons forbore to use all the means in our power for the restitution of the three vessels mentioned in my letter of August 7th, the President thought it incumbent on the United States to make compensation for them; and though nothing was said in that letter of other vessels taken under like circumstances and brought in after the 5th of June, and before the date of that letter, yet where the same forbearance had taken place, it was and is his opinion that compensation would be equally due."

From these words the deduction appears to be inevitable that the principle of compensation in the case derived its only force from the omission by the United States to prevent a wrong done to the commerce of a nation with which they were at peace. So likewise may it be reasonably urged in the present case, that the omission of her Majesty's Government upon full and seasonable notice to carry into effect the provisions of its own law designed to prevent its subjects from inflicting injuries upon the commerce of nations with which it is at peace renders it justly liable to make compensation to them for the damages which may ensue.

That the British Government of that day did consider itself equitably entitled to full indemnity, not simply for the hostile acts of Frenchmen in American ports, but for the loss and damage suffered on the high seas by reason of assistance rendered to them by citizens of the United States, will clearly appear by reference to the fourth Article of a project of a Treaty proposed by Lord Grenville to Mr. Jay, on the 30th of August, 1794. The words are these:—

"And it is further agreed, that it shall appear that in the course of the war loss and damage has been sustained by his Majesty's subjects, by reason of the capture of their vessels and merchandise, such capture having been made either within the limits of the jurisdiction of the said States, or by vessels armed in the ports of the said States, or by vessels commanded or owned by the citizens of the said States, the United States will make full satisfaction for such loss or damage, the same being to be ascertained by Commissioners in the manner already mentioned in this Article."

If by the preceding representation I have succeeded in making myself clearly understood by your Lordship, then will it, I flatter myself, be made to appear that in both these cases, that in 1794 as well as that in 1862, the claim made rests on one and the same basis, to wit, the reparation by a neutral nation of a wrong done to another nation with which it is at peace, by reason of a neglect to repress the cause of it, originating among its own citizens in its own ports.

The high character of Lord Grenville is a sufficient guarantee to all posterity that he never could have presented a proposition like that already quoted, except under a full conviction that it was founded on the best recognised principles of international law. Indeed, it is apparent on the face of the preamble that even the later Statute Law of both nations on this subject is but an attempt to give extraordinary efficacy to the performance of mutual obligations between States, which rest on a higher and more durable basis of justice and of right. It was on this ground, and on this alone, that Lord Grenville obtained the concessions then made of compensation for damage done to her commerce on the high seas by belligerent cruisers fitted out in the ports of the United States. I shall never permit myself to believe that Her Majesty's Government will be the more disposed to question the validity of the principle thus formally laid down merely from the fact that in some cases it may happen to operate against itself.

This consideration naturally brings me back to the examination of that portion of your Lordship's note which relates to the alleged violations in Great Britain of Her Majesty's Proclamation by the respective parties engaged in this war. Although this subject be not absolutely connected with that on which I made my representation, I cheerfully seize the opportunity thus furnished me to attempt in some degree to rectify your Lordship's impressions of the action of the Government of the United States even on that question.

Your Lordship does me the honour to observe that I cannot be ignorant of the fact, which it is impossible to deny, "that in defiance of the Queen's Proclamation, many subjects of Her Majesty, owing allegiance to her Crown, have enlisted in the armies of the United States." "Her Majesty's Government, therefore, have just ground for complaint against both the belligerent parties, but most especially against the Government of the United States, for having systematically, and in disregard of that comity of nations which it was their duty to observe, induced subjects of Her Majesty to violate those orders which, in conformity with her neutral position, she has enjoined all her subjects to obey."

As these words, taken in their connection, might seem to imply a serious charge against myself, as well as the Government of the United States, I must pray your Lordship's pardon if I desire to know whether there be any particulars in my own conduct in which your Lordship has found the evidence for such a statement. So far as I have been made acquainted with the course of my own Government, or I remember my own, I must most respectfully take issue with your Lordship upon it, and challenge you to the proof. That very many of the subjects of Great Britain have voluntarily applied to me for engagements in the service of the United States is most true. That I ever induced one of them to violate Her Majesty's orders, either directly or indirectly, is not true. That numbers of Her Majesty's subjects have voluntarily crossed the ocean and taken service under the flag of the United States, I have reason to believe. That the Government of the United States systematically, and in disregard to the comity of nations, induced them to come over to enlist, I have not yet seen a particle of evidence to show, and I must add, praying your Lordship's pardon, I am authorized explicitly to deny. In response to a remonstrance made to me by your Lordship, it is but a few days since, I took occasion, so far as my action was concerned, or the action of any of the officers of the United States in this kingdom, to place the country right before you on that score. After the very explicit retraction made in your Lordship's reply to me, dated on the 16th instant, it is not without great surprise that I now perceive what I cannot but regard as a renewal of the imputation.

Your Lordship is pleased carefully to join the two parties to this war as if in your estimation equally implicated in the irregular proceedings conducted within this kingdom, and equally implicating the subjects of Great Britain in the violation of Her Majesty's Proclamation. Hence it is argued that the omission to hold any one to his responsibility affords no more just ground of complaint to one party than to the other. I cannot but think that your Lordship has overlooked a just distinction to be observed in these cases, and in order to show it the more clearly I shall be compelled to ask your Lordship to follow me in a brief investigation of the facts.

The only allegation which I find in your Lordship's note in connection with the United States is this, that "vast supplies of arms and warlike stores have been purchased in this country, and have been shipped from British ports to New York for the use of the United States' Government."

Admitting this statement to be true to its full extent, conceding even the propriety of the application of the term "vast" to any purchases that have been made for the United States, the whole of it amounts to this, and no more, that arms and warlike stores have been purchased of British subjects by the agents of the Government of the United States. It nowhere appears that the action of the British went further than simply to sell their goods for cash. There has been no attempt whatever to embark in a single undertaking for the assistance of the United States in the war they are carrying on; no ships of any kind have been constructed or equipped by Her Majesty's subjects for the purpose of sustaining their cause, either by lawful or unlawful means, nor a shilling of money, so far as I know, expended with the intent to turn the scale in their favour. Whatever transactions may have taken place have been carried on in the ordinary mode of bargain and sale, without regard to any other consideration than the mere profits of trade.

If such be, then, the extent of the agency of the United States on this side of the Atlantic during the present war, and no more, it appears clear from the positions assumed by your Lordship, in the very note to which I have the honour to reply, that thus far they have given no reasonable ground for complaint at all. The citations to which your Lordship has done me the favour to call my attention, as drawn from American authors of admitted eminence, all contribute to establish the fact that the mere purchase, or export by a belligerent from a neutral, of arms and munitions of war does not involve any censure on either party. I do not at the present moment entertain a design to question the correctness of that doctrine. As a necessary consequence, I can scarcely perceive the fitness of associating such actions as I have shown that of the United States to be, in the same category with that of which the Government of the United States has heretofore instructed me to complain.

And here, I beg to call your Lordship's attention to the fact that it is not the mere purchase or exportation of arms and warlike stores by the agents of the insurgents in America, of which I have ever complained. There is another, and a very important element in the case, to which your Lordship does not appear to have given the consideration, which so far as any one may be permitted to judge from the concurring testimony of all writers on international law, it certainly deserves. The United States have made an actual blockade of all the ports occupied by the insurgents—a blockade the validity of which Great Britain does not dispute. They are, therefore, entitled to consider every neutral who shall attempt to enter one of them, or carry anything to the besieged, as violating his neutrality and converting himself into an enemy. Hence, it happens that every British subject engaged in the work of aiding the insurgents, by introducing contraband of war into blockaded ports, not only violates his duty to his Sovereign, but commits an exceedingly aggravated and injurious offence to the Government of the United States. To associate such proceedings with the more purchase and export of arms on behalf of the United States, as of equal significance, would seem to be most inequitable. It is a fact, that few persons in England will now be bold enough to deny, first, that vessels have been built in British ports, as well as manned by her Majesty's subjects, with the design and intent to carry on war against the United States; secondly, that other vessels owned by British subjects have been and are yet in the constant practice of departing from British ports, laden with contraband of war, and many other commodities, with the intent to break the blockade and to procrastinate the war; thirdly, that such vessels have been and are insured by British merchants in the commercial towns of this kingdom with the understanding that they are despatched for that illegal purpose. It is believed to be beyond denial that British subjects have been and continue to be enlisted in this kingdom in the service of the insurgents with the intent to make war on the United States, or to break the blockade legitimately established, and to a proportionate extent to annul its purpose. It is believed that persons high in social position and in fortune contribute their aid directly and indirectly in building and equipping ships of war, as well as other vessels, and furnishing money, as well as goods, with the hope of sustaining the insurgents in their resistance to the Government. To that end the port of Nassau, a colonial dependency of Great Britain, has been made and still continues to be the great entrepot for the storing of supplies, which are conveyed from thence with the greater facility in evading the blockade. In short, so far as the acts of these numerous and influential parties can involve them, the British people may be considered as actually carrying on war against the United States. Already, British property valued at £8,000 sterling is reported to have been captured by the vessels of the United States for attempts to violate the blockade, and property of far greater value has either been successfully introduced, or is now stored at Nassau awaiting favourable opportunities.

If it be necessary to furnish to your Lordship a clearer idea of the nature and extent of this warfare, it may perhaps be obtained by reference to the two papers which I have the honour to append to the present note. The one contains a list of screw-steamers and sailing vessels which have been, or still are, engaged in this illegal commerce, furnished to me from observation by the Consul of the United States at Liverpool. The other is a copy of a letter from the Consul in London, giving a further list of vessels, together with some particulars as to the mode by which, and the persons by whom, this hostile system is carried on. Neither of these lists can be regarded as complete, but the two are sufficiently so for the present purpose, which is to place beyond contradiction the fact of the extensive and systematic prosecution by British subjects of a policy towards the United States which is uniformly characterized by writers on international law as that of an enemy.

I am not unaware of the regret expressed in your Lordship's note, at the existence of this state of things, as well as of the readiness with which you have acquiesced in the possible application by the forces of the United States of the penalty held over the heads of the offenders in Her Majesty's Proclamation. But my present object in referring so much at large to these offences is to show the great injustice of your Lordship in proceeding to comment upon the action of the respective belligerents as if there was a semblance of similarity between them. So far as the United States are shown to be involved in censure, it is simply by the purchase and export of arms and munitions of war from a neutral; an act which your Lordship expressly points out eminent authority to my attention to prove implies no censurable act on either party. Whilst, on the other hand, it is American insurgents who find British allies to build in this kingdom, and to equip and send forth war-ships to depredate on the commerce of a friendly nation, and it is British subjects who load multitudes of British vessels with contraband of war as well as all other supplies, with the intent and aim to render null and void, so far as they can, a blockade legitimately made by a friendly nation, as well as to procrastinate and make successful a resistance in a war in which that nation is actually engaged. Surely this is a difference not unworthy of your Lordship's deliberate observation.

But your Lordship, in accounting for the admitted failure to enforce the Enlistment Law in Great Britain, has done me the honour to remind me that not long since Her Majesty's Government was itself so far made sensible of injuries of the same kind with those of which I now complain, either inflicted or threatened against Great Britain in the ports of the United States, as to have made them the subject of remonstrance through Her Majesty's Representative at Washington. With so fresh a sense of these evils before your Lordship, there will be no further cause of surprise at the earnestness with which I have followed the precedent then set. You do me the honour to recall the fact that the Enlistment Law of the United States, which preceded in its date of enactment that of Great Britain, is almost identical with it. And you further state that "the notorious evasion of its provisions during the late war waged by Great Britain and her allies against Russia," was the cause of the remonstrances to which I have already alluded. Your Lordship further remarks that "Great Britain was then, as on other occasions, assured that every effort which the Law would permit had been made to prevent such practices; that the United States' Government could only proceed upon legal evidence, the law as to which is almost, if not entirely the same as in this country, and that without such evidence no conviction could be procured."

In an earlier portion of your Lordship's note you did me favour to cite, as good authority, to me an extract of the Message of the President of the United States of the 31st December, 1855, which went to show the extent to which assistance not only had been, but might be, rendered without censure by neutrals to belligerents. Perhaps your Lordship will not deny equal weight to the very next passage in that Message, even though it should somewhat conflict with your own allegation:—

"Whatever concern may have been felt by either of the belligerent Powers lest private armed cruisers or other vessels in the service of one might be fitted out in the ports of this country to depredate on the property of the other, all such fears have proved to be utterly groundless. Our citizens have been withheld from any such act or purpose by good faith, and by respect for the law."

I forbear from quoting the text any further, because it may revive unpleasant recollections in your Lordship's, as it does in my mind. I will content myself solely with the remark that the very last thing which your Lordship would be likely to object to in the facts there stated would be the want of ability of the Government of the United States to proceed with energy and effect in the repression of acts in violation of their Enlistment Act."

But if evidence of another kind as to its energy under that law be needed, I have only to remind your Lordship once more of the fact that on the 11th of October, 1855, Her Majesty's Representative at Washington, Mr. Crampton, addressed to the Government of the United States a note with the evidence to show that a vessel called the Maury was then fitting out at the port of New York armed to depredate on British vessels. On the 12th the Attorney-General sent by telegraph to the proper officer at New York to consult with the British Consul, and to prosecute if cause appeared. On the 13th the Collector stopped the vessel then about to sail. On the 16th the District Attorney had prepared and filed a libel of the vessel, and in the meantime ordered a thorough examination of her cargo. On the 19th the Marshal had made a full report of his examination. On the same day the complainant on whose evidence the Minister and Consul had acted, confessed himself satisfied, and requested the libel to be lifted. On the 23rd Mr. Barclay, Her Majesty's Consul at New York, published a note withdrawing every imputation made against the vessel. Thus it appears that in the brief space of four days the Government action under the Enlistment Law had been sufficiently energetic completely to satisfy the requisition of Her Majesty's Representative. If any similar action have been had since the first day that I had the honour to call your Lordship's attention to outfits of the same nature made in Great Britain, I can only say that I have not enjoyed a corresponding opportunity to express my satisfaction with the result.

The owners of the Maury were never compensated for the trouble and expense to which they were put by this process.

But the Chamber of Commerce of New York adopted a series of resolutions, two of which may serve as a sufficient comment on the remark which your Lordship has been pleased to let fall, touching the "notorious evasion" of the Enlistment Law in America at the time alluded to:—

"Resolved, that no proper amends or apology have been made to A. A. Low and Brothers, for the charge brought against them, which, if true, would have rendered them infamous; nor to the merchants of this city and country, so falsely and injuriously assailed.

"Resolved, that the merchants of New York, as part of the body of merchants of the United States, will uphold the Government in the full maintenance of the Neutrality Laws of the country; and we acknowledge and adopt, and always have regarded the acts of the United States for preserving its neutrality, as binding in honour and conscience, as well as in law; and that we denounce those who violate them as disturbers of the peace of the world, to be held in universal abhorrence."

I pray your Lordship to give one moment's attention to the manner in which the conduct imputed to Messrs. Low is stigmatised. I am sorry to confess that I have not seen the like indignation shown in this kingdom against similar charges made against distinguished parties in Liverpool, nor yet can I perceive it so forcibly expressed as I had hoped even in the tone of your Lordship's note.

I beg to assure your Lordship that it gives me no pleasure to revive the recollections of the events of that period. But inasmuch as they have been voluntarily introduced in the note which I had the honour to receive, and they seemed to me necessarily to imply an unmerited charge against the policy of the United States, I felt myself imperatively called upon to show that at least in one instance in which Her Majesty's Government made a complaint there was no failure either in the manner of construing the powers vested in the Government of the United States, or in their promptness of action under the Enlistment Law.

I pray, &c.

No. 19.

EARL RUSSELL TO MR. ADAMS.

Foreign Office, January 24, 1863.

Sir,—It is impossible for me to leave without notice some of the statements contained in your letter of the 30th ultimo.

These statements contain or imply a grave charge against Her Majesty's Government. You speak of the "admitted fact of a violation of a statute of this kingdom intended to prevent ill-disposed persons from involving it in difficulty, by committing wanton and injurious assaults upon foreign nations with which it is at peace, of which Her Majesty's Ministers are invited to take cognizance, of which they do take cognizance so far as to prepare measures of prevention; but which, by reason of circumstances, wholly within their own control, they do not prevent in season to save the justly complaining party from serious injury. On the substantial points of the case, little room seems left open for discussion."

On the substantial points of the case, as stated by you, there is, on the contrary, great room left open for discussion.

I must ask first, what are the circumstances within the control of the Government to which you allude? Do you mean that Her Majesty's Government in construing a penal statute, or in carrying into effect the provisions of a penal statute, were to hurry at once to a decision, and to seize a ship building and fitting out at Liverpool without being satisfied by evidence that the provisions of the Foreign Enlistment Act had been violated in the case of such vessel? Do you mean that Her Majesty's Government were to dispense with proof, and to inflict injury upon the Queen's subjects by seizing a ship upon your mere assertion that the owners of that ship were violating the law?

If such is your meaning, I must reply that the Government of this country respect the law. They do not seize upon property to the loss and damage of its owners without proof that they are legally entitled to do so.

Perhaps your meaning is that Her Majesty's Government should have proceeded on the opinion of Mr. Collier without waiting for other authority.

But, here again I must reply that the usage of this country requires that the Government should consult their own legal advisers, and obtain the opinion of the law officers of the Crown before they proceed to enforce a penal statute.

If you mean to contend, therefore, that a nation in a state of profound peace should set aside the formalities of law, and act at once upon presumptions and surmises, I entirely differ from you. I may remind you that evidence sufficient to satisfy a court of law as to the "equipment" or "fitting out" of a vessel for warlike purposes, and of its actual destination, is not obtainable without difficulty.

If you mean that Her Majesty's Government wilfully delayed or neglected the measures by which the character of the "Alabama" could have been legally ascertained, I must give a positive and complete denial of the truth of any such assertion. The opinion of the law officers, until the receipt of which her Majesty's Government could not act, was delivered at the Foreign Office on the 29th of July, but in the morning of that day the Alabama, under pretext of a pleasure excursion, escaped from Liverpool.

With regard to the very different circumstances of 1793 and 1794, those circumstances are recorded in history. It is notorious that M. Genet, the French Minister to the United States, fitted out privateers in the ports of the United States, that he boasted in his despatches of the captures of British vessels which those privateers had made, and that he procured a sham condemnation of those vessels captured in neutral ports. It is notorious also that he endeavoured to make the United States the basis of his operations and attempts to raise rebellions against England in Canada, and against Spain in Louisiana.

According to your own account the United States purposely delayed to give any redress to the complaints made by the British Government, of the capture of British merchant-vessels, because they felt unwilling to act on a policy of repression till they had given due notice of the construction they put upon a Treaty offensive and defensive with France, which had been quoted in defence of the depredations committed on British commerce.

It is evident that by so acting the United States' Government deliberately made themselves parties in the interval to the proceedings carried on in their own ports, and the same Government, with the sense of justice which distinguished them, made compensation afterwards for the injuries inflicted under cover and protection of their own flag, and promised to exclude French privateers "from all further asylum in their ports."

In Mr. Jefferson's letter, quoted by you, he says: "Having for particular reasons forborne to use all the means in our power for the restitution," &c. Here is the injury stated, and here are the grounds why it was permitted.

But the British Government have given no asylum to belligerent privateers bringing prizes into British ports. They have no particular reasons to allege. They have not forborne to use all the means in their power. They have used all the means they could use consistently with the law of the land; and, by no fault of theirs, those means, in a single instance, proved inefficacious. There was no want of a statute to enforce, nor of a will to enforce it; evidence was wanting, and an authority to decide upon that evidence, till it was too late. But Her Majesty's Government cannot promise the United States to act without evidence, nor to disregard the legal authority of their own law officers.

As to the other points we are nearly agreed, so far as the law of nations is concerned. But with respect to the statement in your letter that large supplies of various kinds have been sent from this country by private speculators for the use of the Confederates, I have to observe that that statement is only a repetition in detail of a part of the assertion made in my previous letter of the 19th ultimo, that both parties in the civil war have, to the extent of their wants and means, induced British subjects to violate the Queen's Proclamation of the 13th of May, 1861, which forbids her subjects from affording such supplies to either party.

It is no doubt true that a neutral may furnish, as a matter of trade, supplies of arms and warlike stores impartially to both belligerents in a war, and it was not on the ground that such acts were at variance with the law of nations that the remark was made in the former note. But the Queen having issued a proclamation forbidding her subjects to afford such supplies to either party in the civil war, Her Majesty's Government are entitled to complain of both parties for having induced Her Majesty's subjects to violate that Proclamation; and their complaint applies most to the Government of the United States, because it is by that Government that by far the greatest amount of such supplies have been ordered and procured.

I do not propose to discuss other collateral topics which have been introduced, but in explanation of my former letter I must say that I never meant to accuse you of giving any encouragement to the enlistment of British subjects in this country to serve in the civil war unhappily prevailing in the United States.

But it is notorious that large bounties have been offered and given to British subjects residing in the United States to engage in the war on the Federal side; and these British subjects, acting in defiance of the laws of their country and of the Queen's Proclamation, have been encouraged by the United States' Government so to act.

A recent and striking example of the open avowal of this course of conduct on the part of the United States' Government is to be found in the correspondence between Mr. Seward and Mr. Stuart with reference to the crew of the Sunbeam, in which, although it does not appear that any bounties were offered, Mr. Seward has treated an endeavour to induce British sailors to enlist in the belligerent service of the United States as affording no ground of complaint to her Majesty's Government.

I am, &c.,
(Signed) RUSSELL.

The regular Government of Tennessee, since Nashville fell into the hands of the enemy, has been located at Chattanooga. Governor Harris, of that State, on the 7th March, appointed General Joel A. Battle, State Treasurer, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of Colonel McGregor.

The Montgomery (Ala) "Mail," of the 28th February, has advices from Arkansas to the effect that there were no Federal troops at that time in the State, except about 2,000 at Helena. Confederate General Holmes, with the divisions of General Hindman, and H. McCullough, was at Little Rock.

AN OLD ENGLISH GENTLEMAN.—Two weeks since we gave some account of the career of Mr. John Gully, who commenced life as a butcher; became a pugilist, a betting man, a member of parliament, and died, occupying the position of a country gentleman. At present we have to record the decease of Sir Tatton Sykes who died on Saturday last at the age of ninety-one years. Sir Tatton was a splendid specimen of the English country gentleman. He was descended from an old family and succeeded to the baronetcy on the death of his brother. From childhood he took an absorbing interest in country sports and country pursuits. His breeding stud was the largest in England, and sixty years ago he was the owner of Telemachus, with which he won at Middlesham. Up to the age of sixty years, he was engaged in training horses for the purpose of riding them himself. He kept hounds until he was seventy years of age; and two years ago, when in his eighty-ninth year, still mounted in "pink." He regularly attended cattle fairs, and was an immense favourite with all his neighbours, rich and poor. He would often take the place of a labourer at a stone heap or slashing a fence, whilst the said labourer was sent to the castle to enjoy a jug of ale. His favourite servant Snarry, had been with him fifty-two years. He was essentially and in all respects a fine old English gentleman.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

Our friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed; that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any date, will be useful and acceptable presents.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives, or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognized at this office.

Our subscribers in the South will have their paper supplied through HENRY HORZE, Esq., the Confederate States' Commercial Agent at London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

Subscription, 20s. per annum—post paid, 30s., payable in advance. All communications on business to be addressed, and Post-Office Orders made payable to, J. B. HOPKINS, 13, Bouverie-street, Fleet-street, London, E.C.

Agency at Liverpool: WM. KNOX, Secretary Southern Club, 55, Brown's-buildings.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, APRIL 2, 1863.

The Contest for the Mississippi.

The threat of Prince Gortschakoff, that he would leave Poland "a heap of corpses and of ashes," has justly earned for him the execration of Europe. Yet it was but a threat. In America, the programme of the most reckless of the Abolitionists is in course of actual fulfilment; not a district, nor a province, but half a continent is given up to the abomination of desolation, and Europe remains blind to the sickening spectacle and deaf to the cry of agonised humanity which rises up reproachfully from the once thriving plains of Mississippi and Louisiana. There is not an English newspaper which has not published the damning horrors of the Polish contest, and hurled its indignant impeachment at the Government which sanctions them. Yet in the South-Western States of the Confederacy there are crimes committed which dwarf into insignificance the cruellest efforts of the most ruthless oppressors of modern history, and they are palliated as legitimate operations of war, and discussed with as much calmness as if they were nothing more than the opening of a new parallel or the construction of a new battery. When the ranting Abolitionist preachers of New England threatened to make the South a howling wilderness, Northern advocates spoke of their ravings as outbursts of fanaticism which would never influence the better feelings of the North. But the folly of the preacher has become the wisdom of the statesman and the general. The war of extermination is being waged with weapons that scandalise humanity, and some of its incidents already transcend, in their malignity of purpose and their wide-spread power of evil, the worst atrocities foreshadowed by the advocacy of a Wendell Phillips and a Beecher Stowe. The North cannot conquer, but it will submerge and drown the South. It cannot face Southern batteries, or stem a Southern charge, but it will sweep every living thing off wide tracts of Southern territory by letting in a great flood of water upon smiling plains and thriving homesteads, upon town and village, on rice fields and cotton plantations, and so convert what was once the garden of the staple of the world's industry into a waste of waters. Let the reader imagine the destruction of the dykes in Holland, and the restoration to the clamorous waters upon the Lincolnshire and Norfolk coast, the thousands of acres now yielding great supplies of grain to our teeming population; and imagine this done by the hand of the invader. Let him picture to himself, that instead of a few thousand acres thus reconverted to their pristine condition of fen and marsh and noisome swamp, 5000 square miles—a territory greater than the United Kingdom—has been flooded by the cutting of the leveés in the States of Arkansas, Louisiana, and the Mississippi, and he will have some faint conception of the mode in which the people of the United States, boasting its intelligence, its lofty purpose, and its higher civilization is, carrying on hostilities against a race that speaks the same language, and springs from the same stock, as Englishmen. The Mississippi in these South-Western States has, as if by an ordinance of nature, piled up on either side of its mighty stream, great banks of mud and sand, which strengthened and assisted by the hand of man protect the surrounding country, stretching away below the level of the river, from inundation. These banks or leveés are now cut through, and the swollen river, carrying with it ruin and destruction, and death, rushes uncontrolled over millions of acres that but a year ago teemed with productions of man's industry. It accords with all we know of the brutal treatment of the black man in the North, that this same desolating tide, which has swept away farm, and crop, and livestock, has buried in its swollen waters hundreds of starved and drowning negroes. And this is the war, this is the cause which has the warm and willing sympathies of Mr. Bright.

Notwithstanding these barbarities, the Northerners make no progress. The latest mails bring tidings of severe, if not decisive reverses in the South-west, and of the continued safety of Port Hudson and Vicksburg. An unsuccessful attempt to pass the former fortress was made by Admiral Farragut on the 17th ult. After a heavy bombardment, the Federal squadron essayed to pass the batteries by night; an engagement took place, and at its close the Mississippi steam sloop was in flames in front of the batteries, and a portion of her crew captured; the Hartford, Farragut's flag-ship, drifted down the river disabled; the rest of the squadron was driven back with severe damage, with the exception of one gunboat, which must by this time have fallen into the hands of the Confederates. There is a report that simultaneously with the bombardment, a land attack was made by General Banks's forces at St. Helena, twenty-five miles in the rear of Port Hudson. But the failure of Farragut's blockade would destroy all hope of the success of the enemy, and in all probability send General Banks back in haste to look after the defences of Baton Rouge and New Orleans. It is hardly likely that Farragut will be in a position to resume the attack by water this season, so that the only hope of the Federals lies in the possibility of their forcing the passage by Vicksburg, or taking the gunboats down to Port Hudson by Lake Providence and the River. The difficulties of this circuitous route would present, we believe, as formidable an obstacle to Admiral Porter's flotilla as the batteries of Vicksburg. Meantime the crippling of the Federal forces at Port Hudson must excite considerable apprehension for the safety of New Orleans. The naval forces of the Confederacy are now by no means to be despised, even by so powerful an adversary as the United States. Admiral Farragut, with his reduced strength, will have enough to do to provide ships for the protection of New Orleans, and for the blockade of Mississippi and Galveston.

Meantime the defenders of Vicksburg still hold out, and the efforts of the Federals to starve them seem to have resulted only in discomfiture to the Federal army. General Grant's force, it is said, is at length compelled to seek higher ground for camping, if not to abandon the siege altogether, after suffering terrible losses from exposure and sickness. The passage of the Yazoo Pass has brought the Federal victories to the confluence of the Yallabusha and Tallahatche rivers, where further progress is barred by Confederate batteries. Yazoo City is not taken. There have been rumours of an evacuation of Vicksburg, and of the transfer of its garrison to Tennessee, but they are most improbable. President Davis's orders were to hold Vicksburg to the last. The condition of Grant's army must have been known to the Confederate commander. It is extremely unlikely that with this knowledge he would have abandoned a position which, once in the hands of the Federals, could be held by them with tolerable security to the end of the war. Nor is there any corresponding advantage to be derived by the transport of the troops to Middle Tennessee. There is a large Confederate force at Knoxville, another at Tallahama, a third on the banks of Duck River. General Van Dorn is on Rosencranz's flank; General Bragg in his front. General Longstreet is mustering, we are told, for an invasion of Kentucky. But even the recovery of the whole of Tennessee would be ill compensated by the loss of Vicksburg and half the State of Mississippi.

On the sea coast of the Atlantic, and on the Rappahannock, in Virginia and South Carolina, the war still languishes. There are rumours that the bombardment of Charleston has commenced, but only rumours. It is reported at Washington that Hooker's army will soon be in motion, but few persons believe it. General Forster's army at Hilton Head is known to be in a state of demoralization which must paralyze its movements. The "irrepressible negro" is the source of controversy and quarrels between generals, commanding officers, and even privates of the same regiment. Arrests are the order of the day, and a state of insubordination verging upon open mutiny, renders the great army which landed two months ago at Hilton Head almost as formidable to the Northern Administration as to the defenders of the Palmetto City. General Beauregard is, however, fully prepared for the attack. The bulk of his army, stationed along the Charleston and Savannah railroad, is ready to start at an hour's notice for any point that may be threatened. And any mail may bring us the intelligence that the assault has been delivered. The failure at Port Hudson and the delay at Vicksburg must increase the impatience of the Northern mob, and compel the Federal commanders at any risk, and even against all hope, to strike a blow at Charleston. Strangely enough, whilst at Port Royal the negro is dividing the Federal army into two almost hostile camps, the experiment of enlisting and arming him in the Federal cause has just been tested in Florida to the great disadvantage of the North. An expedition of negroes starting inland with arms and material to light up a slave insurrection has miscarried, the negroes with their officers having been surrounded and captured. The penalty to the white officers engaged upon this kind of work is deservedly death. It could not be otherwise. But it is to be feared that if the penalty be carried out, it will be the signal for bloody reprisals on the part of the North, and that the war will speedily assume a more terrible aspect than it now wears. Every friend of humanity must desire that the concluding act of the drama may be played out at once, and that defeat, overwhelming and decisive, may attend the last effort of the North to enslave or exterminate a free people.

The Capture of the Peterhoff.

On the 27th of January the British steamer Peterhoff, Captain S. Jarman, left Falmouth for St. Thomas and Matamoras. On the 20th of February, when close to the shore of St. John's Island, and in Danish waters, she was boarded by an officer from the United States' steamer Alabama, who after examining her papers allowed her to proceed, but declined to endorse his visit and examination, alleging that he had no authority to do so. The Peterhoff then entered the harbour of St. Thomas, where she coaled, and about noon on the 25th of February proceeded on her voyage, having on board a cargo of merchandise, seven passengers, and her Majesty's mail for Matamoras. As soon as she was outside the harbour the Vanderbilt was descried coming up under steam, and that vessel, after exchanging signals with Admiral Wilkes's ship, the Wachusett, then lying in the harbour, steered for the Peterhoff, sent an officer on board her who examined her papers, and left the ship, but ordered her to be hove-to until his return. When he came back he said that the papers were not quite satisfactory, requested Captain Jarman to go on board the Vanderbilt with his papers, and added he was authorized to say that if Captain Jarman refused, an armed boat's crew would be sent to take him by force. Captain Jarman declined to leave his ship, or to allow his papers to be taken, but said that the United States' officers were welcome to visit the Peterhoff, to examine her papers, and to search her. The Federal officer then left the Peterhoff, which was shortly afterwards boarded by two armed boats, and Lieutenant Alexander took temporary possession of the ship. Captain Jarman ordered his mate to haul down the British ensign, but Lieutenant Alexander would not allow the order to be executed. Captain Jarman, his mate, and the passengers were then sent into the cabin, and an armed sentry was placed in guard over them. At 9 p.m., Lieutenant Lewis came on board with a message from Captain Baldwin, asking Captain Jarman to give up his papers, that they might be taken on board the Vanderbilt. Captain Jarman refused to do so, but replied that they might be examined on the Peterhoff by any number of officers that Captain Baldwin might send for the purpose. Lieutenant Lewis then left, but returned in an hour with another message to Captain Jarman, to deliver up his ship's papers. The request being again refused, Lieutenant Lewis took possession of the Peterhoff in the name of the United States, and Captain Jarman and the passengers were ordered to remain confined in the cabin. The arms in possession of Captain Jarman and the passengers, consisting of some pistols and knives, were given up on demand and a threat of search in case of refusal, and sent on board the Vanderbilt. Captain Jarman then wrote to Captain Baldwin, requesting him to forward her Majesty's mails to the British Consul at St. Thomas, so that their delivery might not be unnecessarily delayed. To this letter Captain Baldwin sent a verbal reply, to the effect that he did not feel authorized to take any part of the freight out of the ship. On the 26th of February the Peterhoff made sail for Key West, in charge of the prize crew. The British ensign was still flying when she reached Mona Island and spoke the United States' steamer Alabama.

Such are the main incidents in connection with the capture of the Peterhoff, and never was the law of nations more flagrantly violated, or the flag of any nation more grossly insulted. The Peterhoff had no goods on board that were contraband of war. She was proceeding from a neutral port to a neutral port. Her papers were passed in London, Plymouth, and Falmouth. In defiance of international law she was overhauled by a Federal cruiser in Danish waters. Her papers were found satisfactory, and she was allowed to proceed on her voyage. She left St. Thomas after coaling and obtaining a certificate from the British Consul, and was again stopped by a Federal cruiser and ultimately taken possession of by a Federal prize crew. Thus nothing was wanting to stamp the transaction with illegality. The Peterhoff was not carrying goods contraband of war, she was on her way from a neutral port to a neutral port. She was overhauled in neutral waters; having been so overhauled and passed, she was a second time boarded, and ultimately seized by the express orders of Admiral Wilkes, who knew of the former examination. But insult was added to injury. The harbour of St. Thomas is more effectually blockaded by the United States than the port of Charleston, and neutral vessels are watched out of port, and boarded by signal from the United States' Flag Ship lying without the harbour. The request to the British Captain to deliver up his papers was accompanied by an insolent threat. Before the Peterhoff was formally declared to be in possession of the United States the orders of Captain Jarman were countermanded by the Federal officer, and the British Ensign was not hauled down, and was even displayed after the ship was proceeding to Key West under charge of a prize crew. Captain Jarman and the passengers were kept in close confinement, and the reasonable request that Her Majesty's mails, the detention of which might be of serious inconvenience to the commercial community, should be delivered to the British Consul at St. Thomas was not complied with, and they were taken to Key West. We need not recall the persistent attempts to induce the British captain to give up his papers and to leave his vessel, or the petty insults and annoyances to which Captain Jarman and his crew were subjected. It is sufficient to remark that it would have tried the ingenuity of the unscrupulous Wilkes to have made the proceedings more insulting to the dignity and honour of this country.

There is no doubt that the Peterhoff will be released at Key West, as was the British brigantine Magicienne, which had been searched under analogous circumstances. The outrage is not an exceptional act of Admiral Wilkes, but in accordance with the plan laid down by the United States' Government for putting a stop to what they are pleased to call contraband trade. They have not sufficient force to blockade the Southern ports and the Southern coast; so they have hit upon the expedient of blockading those neutral ports and neutral waters that are likely to be touched at or entered by vessels professing to run the Southern blockade. British ships are to be seized, whether justifiably or not, and in such cases as the Peterhoff and Magicienne released after long delays by the prize courts. Is the British Government prepared to submit to this? if so, what will be the result? It may be suggested that British ships unlawfully seized will be surrendered, and compensation awarded to their owners for their detention. Granting for a moment that this will be so in every instance, the scheme of the Federal Government will not prove less fatal to British commerce. The compensation will not enable our merchants to continue their trade, for even their bills of exchange, and their letters, as well as their merchandise, if sent in British bottoms or from British ports, will not be punctually delivered; and their correspondents, in order to ensure the prompt execution of their commissions, will have to transact their business through the agency of merchants, the merchants of New York for example, whose vessels are not subject to unlawful seizure. If then our Government sanctions the policy of the Federals, we must forego our trade with our own colonies, and with those neutral ports that are incidentally the depots for, or are in the line of, the contraband trade. The Washington Government knows full well that the compensation for detention will not protect our commerce, for, as Mr. Seymour Fitzgerald pointed out in the House of Commons, litigation before Prize Courts is dilatory and vexatious, and that many months must elapse before the vessel seized on suspicion is released or condemned. But it happens that, so far from being assured that the United States Prize Courts will deal impartially with the cases submitted to their judgment, we have fair grounds for assuming that their decisions will not be based upon evidence, but will be framed to suit the views of the United States Government. In the United States constitutional freedom has been replaced by irresponsible despotism. Mr. Lincoln has been placed above all law, not only by the suspension of the Habeas Corpus, which gives him full control over the liberty of every citizen in the Federation, but by the Act of Indemnity that in advance permits him, irrespective of consequences to himself or his agents, to trample on every law and the administration of every court. It is a farce to talk about there being a vestige of judicial independence in a country where the sanctity of a court of justice is violated by the arrest of judges on the bench. This being the case with the courts for the administration of the laws affecting the well-being of the citizens, what can we expect from prize courts that are peculiarly, from their functions and constitution, subject to the influence and to the authority of the Executive? True, when cases so palpable as those of the Peterhoff and the Magicienne are submitted, we may be tolerably sure of a verdict in favour of the owners of the vessels seized, not upon suspicion, but because they were proceeding to or from British colonies or neutral ports which it pleases the Federal Government to blockade. But when there is the flimsiest pretext, when there is something like a colourable pretence for suspicion, we may expect that the vessels will be condemned contrary to evidence, or rather in the absence of inculpatory evidence. We do not think that the United States Prize Courts will have many opportunities for so acting, because, as we have already remarked, if our Government gives a tacit sanction to this system of seizing vessels without any pretext for so doing and in defiance of the laws of nations, our merchants will have to abandon their commerce with our colonies and the neutral ports so blockaded by the United States.

There is another point worthy of grave consideration. Unquestionably our Government is most sincerely anxious to avoid war with the United States. We will not discuss the moot points, whether it can be altogether averted, or how long it may be postponed by that generous forbearance, by that liberal construction of international law on behalf of the Federals, which the people of the North ascribe not to our goodwill, but to our pusillanimity; but we tell the Government that by submitting to flagrant insults they ensure war and even precipitate it. Already the masses in the North, instructed by their demagogues, believe that we are craven-hearted, that we fear their power, that we are ready to suffer any wrong rather than go to war with them; and the result of this belief is that they are ripe for, and even desire, a war with England. Let us tamely suffer a few more insults to the British flag, and the cry for war with England will be too loud for the Federal Government to resist, even if it desired to maintain friendly relations with us. Accepting empty apologies for premeditated insults, avowing our determination to maintain peace at any price, even at the price of our national interests and our national honour, so far from securing peace, makes war inevitable.

Lord Palmerston at Glasgow.

Englishmen are not so vain and foolish as to think that their institutions are perfect, though they are not so bad as our Yankeeised demagogues make out. We are always grumbling and growling about abuses, and discussing reforms; and no matter how much we venerate an institution, we are more prone to expose its faults than to magnify its virtues. But let a foreigner presume to interfere,—though it must be confessed we are ourselves rather given to minding our neighbours' business,—and he at once finds himself in the position of a man who intervenes in a quarrel between husband and wife. We are indignant if a foreigner ventures to intimate that our House of Lords is not the wisest assembly upon earth, or that our House of Commons does not thoroughly represent the people, or that our trial by jury sometimes leads to a miscarriage of justice. Now Lord Palmerston is essentially an English institution. Some of us object to his policy, and sharply criticise it, but if a stranger dared to find fault with the noble Premier he would offend, not only his Lordship's political friends, but equally his political antagonists. This is, to some extent, the case with all our public men; and we remember on one occasion hearing an ultra-liberal fiercely defend Mr. Disraeli against the attacks of some German liberals. But our Premier is pre-eminently an institution on account of his long official career, of his wonderful personal popularity, and from the prevailing impression that, whatever may be his political creed, he is British to the backbone. On Monday last, when he was installed as Lord Rector of the University of Glasgow, when a crowd of the magnates of the land of every shade of political opinion gave him an ovation such as no man could receive without emotion and gratification, his Lordship was right in saying, "I think, when I look around at this august and distinguished assembly, when I know how it is composed, I may, without vanity, think that the greeting which I have received to-day is an indication of personal goodwill."

Lord Palmerston is not popular because he is old, but rather that in spite of his age his intellect retains its pristine freshness, and that his mind seems as ready to receive the impressions of the hour as it was when, nearly seventy years ago, he was a student at the University of Edinburgh. The speeches he delivered on Monday are not the effusions of what is conventionally called the "old man eloquent." They are free from the dogmatism that almost invariably marks, if it does not mar, the utterances of long experience. His address to the students upon the well-worn topic of education was animated and instructive, and distinguished by that liberality of sentiment which is so congenial to the youthful mind. He told the young men that education continued throughout life, and did not end with the college course; but he reminded them that they must not therefore neglect first opportunities, or "they would be like the crew of a ship entering upon a long voyage, who have neglected to provide sufficient means of subsistence, and who, in the middle of the storms and tempests they may encounter on their passage, will find their strength failing them and their means inadequate, in consequence of their want of foresight before they quitted the port." His Lordship, after insisting upon the paramount importance of the classics and those studies which have a special bearing upon the future career of the student, counselled the acquisition of general knowledge. "Don't be discouraged by people who say it is absurd to have a smattering of different things—a little knowledge is a dangerous thing." A little knowledge is better than no knowledge at all; learn a little of everything of which you can learn anything. It will be useful to you hereafter; though it may not be in your own line, it will be the foundation upon which you will build up as you go along through life." All this, our readers may say, is very plain and homely advice, but it is not therefore the less valuable. Lord Palmerston is too skilful as a speaker to substitute oratorical flourish for plain and everyday English and appropriate illustrations. Whenever a man becomes a favourite of the House of Commons we may be sure that he is not what the habitués of the platform call eloquent and that, save under very exceptional circumstances, he adopts a conversational style. Platform celebrities fail in Parliament because they insist upon being oratorical. But Lord Palmerston's installation address was by no means commonplace. His reference to religion was managed with consummate tact. He spoke of the science of astronomy, and contended that the wonders revealed by it fostered the growth of religious sentiment. He said nothing that verged on what is technically called preaching, yet what he did say would have been applauded by the Exeter Hall evangelists, endorsed by High Church Bishops, and for all we know, have found favour with the colonial Bishop who has been so strangely converted by the heathen he went forth to convert.

The after-dinner speech was sufficiently political to be interesting to an adult audience, assembled to do honour to the prime minister of the country, but yet a species of cross-bench speaking that could not offend Liberal, Conservative, or Radical. Take as an example one of the paragraphs about America. After remarking that no nation could insult us with impunity (forgetting Admiral Wilkes and the United States), and that we were on friendly terms with all the nations of the world, his Lordship added, "I advert not to those contending parties in America, who sue us like rivals who sue a fair damsel." Of course this sally was greeted with laughter, but it will not bear analysis. First of all, we must protest against the assumption that the Confederate States have ever sued for an alliance, or asked for anything from the British Government, except the recognition to which they think themselves entitled; and then, as to the United States, we were under the impression that that Federation was already in alliance with England. We have Earl Russell's word for it; and, further, that the alliance is so intimate that international law is liberally construed in favour of the Washington Government, and consequently to the detriment of the Confederate Government. However, we do not propose to discuss Lord Palmerston's political remarks; but we would rather congratulate him upon getting out of a difficulty so well. He was obliged to say something political that could not possibly offend anybody, and he could hardly avoid mentioning America. What better could he do than put the belligerents upon an exact equality, and represent them as respectively seeking our alliance? He might be unjust to one or both parties, but his words did not betray the slightest bias. Novelists, before the era of sensation stories of crime, always introduced a flirting gentleman, who played sad havoc even with the armour-plated hearts of coquettes, by muttering sweet nothings that seemed to imply much, but which, when the gay deceiver proved untrue, could not be brought against him as implying any pledge or even hint of affection. Far be it from us to charge Lord Palmerston with political flirtation, but we need not, therefore, ignore his great talent for saying much that means nothing on all political emergencies, and for so tickling the fancy with a feather as temporarily to suspend the functions of judgment. But let it be remembered, to Lord Palmerston's honour, that though, as a politician, he sometimes uses speech to conceal thought, he never uses speech to belie his thoughts. No man who valued character and influence would be guilty of that vulgar offence which has made Mr. Seward the laughing-stock and scorn of Europe.

Long may Lord Palmerston live to wear the laurels he has so fairly earned, but at the same time we have no wish that succeeding Prime Ministers should enjoy his extraordinary personal popularity. Love is proverbially blind, and personal popularity might make the nation fatally unconscious of ministerial shortcomings.

Church Patronage.

The Lord Chancellor proposes to get rid of a part of his ecclesiastical patronage, not because he shrinks from the trouble and vexation incident thereto, but that he finds he cannot dispense it for the benefit of the Church. His Lordship deserves much credit for the introduction of a useful measure, but we must not imagine that he resigns for himself and his successors any patronage that is worth keeping. All the livings in his gift that his friends would think worth applying for, or thank him for bestowing, he retains, and what he offers to part with are the small livings—we might better term them the starvings—of which the incumbents, so far as this world's goods are concerned, may well envy the skilled artisan and the thriving village shopkeeper.

The association between law and divinity in the Church patronage of the Lord Chancellor is the result of our persistent conservatism. When it became necessary to have a lawyer instead of a priest to preside in the Court of Chancery, we modified the change as much as possible, and suffered the office to retain the ecclesiastical patronage, which never would have been bestowed upon it but for its connection with the Church. In the reign of Edward III. the right of the Lord Chancellor to present to all livings under twenty marks was clearly set forth; and about the time of Henry VIII. the terms of the grant were altered to meet the new currency, so that the Lord Chancellor might present to all livings under £20. The right has not lapsed with the increase of the value of the livings, and the consequence is that the Lord Chancellor, besides being the Chief Judge in Equity, the Speaker of the House of Lords, a leading member of the Cabinet, the guardian of all lunatics and idiots, and of wards in Chancery, and the patron of many of the prizes of the legal profession, has, according to the estimate of the Archbishop of York, "to find and place a fit clergyman in a parish once in every ten days." We do not deny the vast ability and extensive learning of Lord Westbury; but though he knows everything better than anybody else, it does not follow that he can discharge a variety of important functions simultaneously and beneficially. It is immaterial that he has not leisure to inquire into the moral and theological fitness of the clergymen he appoints to benefices, for that is not the duty of the patron, but of the bishop. Except with the valuable livings, the Lord Chancellor is less likely to be influenced by family and personal predilections, than is the patron of one or two livings; and, as to politics, it happily matters little whether the nominee is Liberal or Conservative; for the clergy, though taking an interest in public affairs, have the good sense not to mix up party questions with their clerical duties. The real difficulty experienced by the Lord Chancellor has been to find suitable candidates for the small livings—that is, candidates who are prepared by university training to mix with country gentry—the most exacting class in the community. A curate whose stipend does not exceed £70 per annum, must visit the best society in his parish, or his influence for good, even amongst the poor, will be considerably curtailed. Lord Westbury said in reference to this—"All men who have paid attention to the state of the Universities, and observed plainly what is going on there, have been impressed with the conviction that the Church, as a profession in point of worldly advantage, does not offer adequate inducements for young men to enter it." Nor will any augmentation that is practicable of the incomes of Church livings induce young men who are looking to the Senate, the Bar, or India for riches and honour, to seek ordination. Yet it is not true that, compared with other professions, the Church has few prizes. There are more fat livings in the Church than large practices at the bar; but in the Church "parts and poverty" have a slight chance of advancement, and unless a young man has a valuable living coming to him on the death of an aged incumbent, he must not expect to get enough out of the Church to keep his family comfortably, especially as clergymen with particularly small incomes always have particularly large families. The rector with an income of £1,500 a-year will have a French family of two; while his curate, who does the heavy work for £100 a-year, has a lady-like wife, and at least six thriving children. Bishoprics, deaneries, and cathedral stalls are reserved for those who are related to Mr. Bright's "Norman usurpers." Occasionally a clergyman who does not give much heed to clerical business, and who becomes eminent in science, or wins the favour of a Prime Minister, stands a chance of a deanery at home, or a Bishopric in the Colonies. We do not find fault with the system, for it works well, and we have no desire to see the Church made the arena for the absorbing ambition that carries a man from obscurity to fame. The consequence of University men not being attracted to the Church is the admission of "literate"—that is, of candidates who are not members of a University. The scholarship of literates is tested by the examining chaplain of the bishop, and very little Latin and less Greek will pass muster. We have heard of an examining chaplain who, to save himself trouble, used to require all candidates who appeared before him to translate the three creeds into Greek; and his plan becoming known, conscientious tutors could cram young men for the worthy chaplain's Greek examination in a few days, though they were before that entirely ignorant of the Greek language. But if the examination of literates was severe or searching that class of candidates would be practically excluded from the ministry. It is not impossible that the increase of the value of benefices may induce a large number of University men to take orders, though not the men who go out in honours.

Lord Westbury's plan is equally simple and ingenious. He proposes to sell the advowsons to 320 of the Lord Chancellor's small livings, and with the money so obtained to increase the value of those livings. The purchasers will make as good patrons as the Lord Chancellor, and most likely better, because they will probably be resident landed proprietors, who will take a pride and interest in the proper maintenance of their parish Church and Schools, whilst the Lord Chancellor cannot give any heed to the small livings, and the larger ones that he retains do not require such care. He proposes to sell that which is of no value to him to those who will value the right of presentation, and on terms that will attract purchasers; and there are provisions in the Bill which we hope in committee will be made as stringent as possible, to prevent the advowsons being purchased by non-resident speculators. In the House of Lords the measure has met with unanimous approval, and it is, indeed, difficult to imagine any objection to a plan by which the Church is enriched and benefited, and by which no one loses.

The voluntary system—that is, the maintenance and increase of unendowed churches—works very well in towns where eloquent or strong preaching brings in a revenue from pew rents; but it will not do in country districts, where the majority are poor people and cannot contribute to the expenses of public worship. The matter, too, is urgent. There is too much ground for saying that the Church has lost the working population of the towns, though her loss has not been a gain to dissent; and unless some changes are made the Church will lose her hold over the peasantry. Such a result would be deplorable, and the evil can only be averted by having efficient ministers, and the churches and schools supported and upheld by the laity. There is in the Church of England no fear of the patron exercising an undue influence over the minister he presents. When once a clergyman is inducted into an incumbency he is wholly independent of the patron who gave him his place. The patron can appoint an incumbent, but he has no more power to remove him than the poorest parishioner.

English Universities.

Not many weeks ago the columns of this journal contained a few remarks on the Church of England, in which her general system and present condition, power, and responsibilities were briefly discussed, and the conclusion arrived at was that, in spite of many apparent anomalies both in doctrine and discipline, she was better adapted to meet the sentiments and wants of the English people than any scheme that optimism could devise, and on the whole worked better than any other ecclesiastical system on earth. As the bulk of the clergy of the Church of England is drawn from the English Universities, it is a matter of considerable importance that the mutual influence of these two institutions and their mutual relations should be understood, and no complete idea can be conceived of the latter institution until some light has been thrown on this portion of the subject. Now, we do not suppose that it is incumbent upon us to propound a long argument for the purpose of demonstrating that the Universities of England should have an established form of religion. Perhaps it will be sufficient, in view of the fact that at the present moment we are not composing polemical essays against Radicals or Dissenters, but simply endeavouring to furnish information, to appeal to the Constitution of our country, to ask that the analogy between the system of government and that of the Universities which has already been pointed out may be again carefully observed, and to state our opinion that all the arguments for and against the union of Church and State, and the maintenance of a State religion, are strictly applicable to the case of the English Universities. But there is a step beyond this: it has been shown that the system of education pursued at Oxford and Cambridge aims at something more than mere instruction in literature and science, and that it attempts, with success, to mould the minds, sentiments, and characters of those who are subject to its influence. In every Christian country, religion, in its broadest meaning, must inevitably be an ingredient in that process. The admission of the ingredient must of necessity be conditioned on the uniformity of its character; and that uniformity can only be preserved by the exclusion from office and power of those who are not professed adherents of the established form. Indeed, had such a limit as this been placed to the admixture of the ecclesiastical element, perhaps no valid objection could have been raised; but these bounds have been exceeded, and it is impossible to ignore, and idle to neglect, the differences already existing, and the agitations that are assuming no contemptible proportions.

The colleges (and as heretofore, so now in descending to details, we confine our attention to the University of Cambridge) in their infant state, and as they first left the hands of their respective founders, bore, more or less, the monastic stamp. Some, of course, as for instance Trinity College, may be said to have superseded monasticism; but in England, at least, revolutions do not obliterate the past, and the new foundations imbibed the spirit and imitated the usages of their venerable predecessors. Hence the clerical element has always strongly predominated, or, to use plain language, the proportion of clergy to laity among the Fellows of the colleges and the ruling bodies has been and is overwhelming, while the clergy has cherished fondly the spirit of conservatism, common doubtless to all mankind, but which may be, and in this case is, far too zealous in the retention of powers and privileges to which a long and continuous possession gives a specious but not indefeasible title.

Previous to the Act of Parliament of the year 1856, for the reform of the Universities, it was impossible for a Nonconformist to be a member of the University of Cambridge. Undoubtedly, if any person in whose bosom the desire of distinctions and emoluments had prevailed over the ordinary dictates of honour and morality, chose to swallow an oath or to evade by a dexterous artifice the mere material act of kissing the Testament, he might have found a precedent for so doing. An American individual had indeed managed to give in his adhesion to the Established Church at the period of his admission to the University, and no doubt conscientiously; but when the degree of Bachelor of Arts beamed upon him from one side, and the terrible oath of allegiance to the Queen glared at him from the other, he, smiling in return to the one, yet not defying the frown of the other (for a Yankee is more cunning than bold) outmanœuvred honour, integrity, and good faith, passed the Testament unknissed, and became a "Bachelor," "Memento turbinis exit Marcus Dima." On his return, "loaded with dishonour," like Butler from New Orleans, he published an account of his "Five years' residence in an English University," proclaimed his own infamy to the people of New York, and expressed his admiring wonder that his friends at Cambridge abated somewhat of their ancient respect for him after the discovery of the "passage of the book." But, after all, he was a New Englander, and perhaps never quite understood the meaning of Punica Fides. However, as we imagine that the Nonconformist, as a rule, would not be so compliant, he was debarred from the advantages of an University education. It is no longer so. Now he may obtain all the honours which the Senate House can confer. He may find his name placed at the top of the list for excellence in mathematics or classics, he may be a Bachelor of Arts; but that is the boundary of his progress. He cannot be a Master of Arts, for then he would be a member of the Senate, or Lower House of Assembly—the great legislative body of the University. But this is not all. In the ordinary course, the successful candidate for the highest honours in mathematics or classics will be elected a Fellow of his college, the advantages of which position we have endeavoured before to explain. The Nonconformist may be so elected, but then, before inauguration he must declare that he is "a bona-fide member of the Church of England." This he cannot do, and consequently he is debarred from the material benefits usually attached to scientific or literary success.

By an odd coincidence, it has happened twice since the Act of 1855, that a Nonconformist has attained the highest honours in the University, but has been debarred from its best fruits, and therefore the hardship of the case has been put before the English public in a prominent and tangible form. Indeed, it has excited so much attention, that the question of a repeal of the declaration has found its way into the addresses of candidates for Parliament, and has formed a subject of discussion even on the "hustings." We sympathize deeply with those gentlemen whose high attainments cannot be duly rewarded; but individual instances of hardship must not be weighed against the general interest, and we are quite unshaken in our opinion that it would be most injurious to dispense with the declaration, and that the evils consequent upon such dispensation, great and unavoidable as they assuredly would be, far counterbalance the seeming injustice which the present rule creates. But the colleges have gone a step further than this; they have not only taken care that all Fellows shall professedly be members of the Church of England, but they have provided that a very large number of them shall be in Holy Orders. But let us examine a few facts on this point. There are altogether 385 Fellows of colleges in the University of Cambridge. Of these, Trinity College has 60, St. John's College 56, and Emmanuel College 12; so that these three colleges have between them 128 Fellows—exactly one-third of the whole number. Now, the law of these colleges is this, that every Fellow shall enter Holy Orders within seven years from taking the degree of Master of Arts, or vacate his Fellowship. Supposing, then, that, on the average, the Fellows are elected two years before they become Master of Arts, it follows that a layman at these three colleges obtains a Fellowship for only nine years, while a clergyman remains a Fellow for life. It also follows that, as a rule, every Fellow who is more than thirty-three years of age is in Holy Orders, and as the members of a body above that age must be the real rulers, it follows that these three colleges are governed entirely by clergymen. Again, the Fellows who intend to remain laymen must leave Cambridge to cultivate some profession, and therefore are non-residents; hence it again follows that the lay influence in these three colleges is at zero. Matrimony also avoids a fellowship; consequently these three societies may be fairly set down, not merely as ecclesiastical but even as monastic institutions, so far as the ruling members and beneficiaries are concerned. The fourteen remaining colleges place no such sweeping restriction on the tenure of their Fellowships, but they are not entirely free from the clerical bias; for, with two or three exceptions, they stipulate that a certain proportion—about one-third—of the Fellows shall be in Holy Orders. As there is not the slightest doubt that in the absence of such a rule the clerical Fellows will even exceed that proportion, we can only attribute the proviso to the extreme caution of the clergy and the graceful but easy concession of the lay brethren. It is enough to state that seventeen colleges have about 330 "livings" in England in their gift, and that on a vacancy every Fellow is entitled to have the refusal of the empty rectory or vicarage before a stranger is appointed, for our readers at once to perceive that the inducements to take Holy Orders are quite sufficient, independently of any of the above regulations. Of course there is no community of Church patronage between the several colleges, but each possesses its own list of incumbencies. If an example be required to justify this conclusion, we have only to name King's College, which has never employed any such restrictions, but which, with the large number of nearly sixty Fellows, and not an excessive Church patronage, has never found an inability on the part of the clerical to maintain its own against the lay element. Now, we do not fear the accusation of hostility to the clergy, because we are not only innocent, but incapable of such a jealousy; but we are strongly of opinion that a great opportunity has been lost. Since the Act of 1856, the three colleges, Trinity, St. John's, and Emmanuel, have been in a position to abrogate their restrictive regulations. They have declined to do so. The cases in which Trinity has relaxed the rule may be important, but must be too rare to affect the general question. We think that the remaining societies have acted in a wiser and more enlightened spirit: for, after all, on what do the clergy ground their claim to this superior advantage? It is urged that the primary principle of these foundations is ecclesiastical, we refer to the foundation of King's, the work of Henry VI., and ask whether that is likely to be less imbued with the religious spirit than the work of Henry VIII.; and yet the restriction has not existed at King's for some centuries, if it ever practically existed at all. What, too, are we to say of the other thirteen societies who have seen the injustice of such a law? If it be urged that vacancies are quickly created by the rule, then we say that all the Fellowships should be avoided at the fixed time, and that laymen and clergymen should be placed on an equal footing. Once more, if it be said that the clergy must remain Fellows to fill the Church livings as they fall, we say that this difficulty could be easily met by the retention of those claims after the avoidance of the Fellowship. But our business is not to make laws, but to explain them; yet we have felt it necessary to make these remarks, not only in justice to our own sentiments, but also because they may tend to enlighten the uninitiated upon the whole system of college Fellowships.

Whatever may be our judgment on these points, there can be no doubt that these enormous advantages conceded to the clergy entail commensurate responsibilities. We have seen how highly the Church is favoured in her individual members, we have also seen how vast an amount of Church patronage is entrusted to these colleges. There is a grand mutuality in this. The University receives much from the Church, and gives much to the Church; yet that which the former receives by way of trust is greater than that of which she has the beneficial interest.

From all that has been said, is it not a just conclusion to affirm that the University is bound to educate specially for the Church? It is an axiom, and we have in a former article enunciated it, that the University does not pretend, and ought not, to educate for particular professions. She does not turn out politicians, lawyers, or physicians ready-made, but educates men so that they may be convertible into professors of these various arts. But is there not an exception to this rule? and is it not a logical sequence to all we have said, that she has taken upon herself to make men priests? Nay, she pretends to do it. Two hundred men in every year go direct from the University of Cambridge to submit themselves to the "imposition of hands." But when it is asked whether this duty which is imposed upon the great Mistress of "Learning and Religious Education" is fully discharged, it would assuredly be rash to answer in the affirmative. For what is the fact? After taking the degree of Bachelor of Arts, the student has before him, if he wishes to take Holy Orders, an examination in theology, embracing the historical books of the Old Testament, the Greek Testament, the articles of religion, the Liturgy of the Church of England, the ecclesiastical history of the first three centuries, and the history of the English Reformation. The attendance of a course of lectures delivered by a Professor of Divinity is a condition precedent to undergoing the examination. The difficulty of an ordeal of this kind is always matter of controversy. Granted a knowledge of Greek, we think, from a very considerable experience in that line, that it is by no means an arduous task to satisfy the examiners in this theological test; but of one thing we are sure, that a candidate may pass with flying colours and yet be thoroughly ignorant of the first principles of theology. Yet our blame must not be without consideration. All our priests cannot be Hookers, and even if they could, a difficult examination would not secure us from an abundance of ignorance. Stoutly as we maintain that a clergyman is bound to know his profession, and must be wise as well as good, and though we cannot help feeling that an incompetent and unlearned priest stands much in the position of a barrister who looks for business which he knows he is unable to transact, yet we are aware that we must be content with much less. Nevertheless, in an age of emulous wisdom and unceasing inquiry, of knowledge critical and scientific, accumulated with amazing rapidity, our desires refuse to be limited by our expectations. In this emergency we instinctively turn to our Universities, and we ask one plain question: Do the colleges provide any theological instruction to their students, or do they not? We know that one college does: we are not sure that more than one does. We do not wish to drive students to receive such teaching: nay, we do not suppose that any but those who intend hereafter to take orders will receive it. But surely those will. It cannot be said that men do not know that they are destined for the Church. Such a statement is incredible. Moreover, with such an abundance of ordained Fellows, it cannot be difficult to find men able and willing to teach, and we are satisfied that if the week-day be too fully employed, and this we doubt, yet a Divinity lecture would be a relief to the ennui inseparable from a Sunday at Cambridge.

If at the close of a former article we found it necessary to anticipate the charge of undue partiality to the University system, we have now been compelled to point out imperfections, and if, at first sight, these appear to be details too minute to interest the stranger, yet, on closer investigation, they will be seen to bear closely on the questions that agitate the theological and Christian world. All wise men desire that the Church in this crisis should do her duty, not stifling inquiry with a narrow and vain bigotry, but so directing her course as to be a light to lead, and not a cloud to follow, the wisdom of the age. Her priests may be great classical scholars or great mathematicians; they must be theologians, and if the Universities will not supply the want, we know not in what direction the Church is to seek assistance.

of interference with the domestic institutions of the States, and denouncing the agitation of the Abolitionists as a species of moral treason against the Union. It expressed, moreover, a decided disapproval of national banks and protective tariffs.

Texas accepted the proposal of annexation on the 4th of July, 1845; and General Taylor was ordered to protect her frontier; and on the 28th of January, 1846, the American army took up its position opposite Matamoras. On the 11th of May the President announced to Congress that the Mexicans had invaded the territory of the United States, and asked for the means of defence. Ten millions of dollars were voted by immense majorities; but on the preamble of the Act declaring war, a debate took place; many of the Whigs contending that the war had been commenced by the President, in violation of the Constitution. The Act passed, however, and the war was decidedly popular. During its progress discussions took place as to the admission or exclusion of slavery in territories that might be acquired from Mexico; and to one of the Appropriation Bills the House attached a rider, known from its author's name as the Wilmot Proviso, forbidding slavery in such territory. This proviso was rejected by the Senate, and the House yielded the point. The Whigs, as a party, were throughout hostile to the annexation, and to the war which followed it; and thus became more closely than ever identified with the sectionalism of New England; which, seeing that the war was likely to end in an increase of Southern territory, and to redress the balance of power between the two sections, was from first to last bitterly opposed to the policy of the Administration. By thus embittering sectional hostility, and weakening the general influence of the party which, as containing all the statesmen who had weight and authority with the North, and as being led by a man of Southern birth and of the highest political standing, might have been able to control that antagonism of interests and feelings, which arrayed North and South against one another, there can be little doubt that the effects of the annexation of Texas ultimately contributed in no small degree to produce the disruption of the Union.

The other acts of Mr. Polk's Presidency which deserve notice, were the repeal of the Act of 1842, which had abolished the sub-treasury, the passage of a non-protective tariff—carried only by a single vote in the Senate, and the settlement of the Oregon question, by a compromise on the 49th parallel of latitude. The President was charged with having in this case violated the promises which had helped to bring him into power; the fact being, apparently, that he had done what all politicians are too prone to do in countries where the popular will is law, and talked, while out of office, much more violently than he was prepared to act, when the terrible responsibilities of Government, and the choice between peace and war, were actually in his hands. However, there can be little doubt that the people were disappointed in him; and that this disappointment helped to weaken his party, and secure the next election to the Whigs. Mr. Polk obstinately asserted the principles of the Democratic party in regard to internal improvements, and vetoed more than one bill of that character sent up by Congress. After a long contest, slavery was finally excluded from the Oregon territory by the bill for its organization passed in 1848. The Presidential contest of that year was a keen one. A personal quarrel had divided the democracy of New York between the "Hunkers" and "Barnburners." The former adhered to Mr. Cass, the candidate chosen by the Democratic Convention; the latter, uniting with the Abolitionists, initiated the Free soil or Republican party, which nominated Martin Van Buren. General Taylor, though he declined to be considered as a party man, accepted the nomination of the Whigs. The electoral vote stood—Taylor 167, Cass 125; the popular vote was—Taylor 1,360,572; Cass 1,219,962; Van Buren 291,342; showing a very rapid increase in the strength of the enemies of the Union, who at the last election had only polled 64,000 votes.

General Taylor, in his inaugural address, expressed himself in favour of protection and of internal improvements. The disorganization caused by sectionalism was seen in the attempt to choose a Speaker of the House of Representatives. Neither party could concentrate its strength—many Northern Democrats opposing the Democratic candidate as too favourable to slavery, while some Southern Whigs refused to vote for the Whig nominee because he would not pledge himself distinctly against the Wilmot proviso. It was in vain that the President advised Congress to let sectional topics alone; since that time Congress has scarcely been occupied with anything else.

The Whigs were unfortunate in the health of their Presidents, both of whom—alone among those who have attained that rank—died in office. General

Harrison had died a month after his accession; General Taylor, inaugurated on the 5th of March, 1849, died on the 9th of July, 1850. Millard Fillmore, the Vice-President, succeeded him; but the change, occurring at a critical period in the history of American parties, could not but be thought ominous. General Taylor's independence of party ties, and his position as at once a great Southern proprietor, and the President elected by the Whig party might have enabled him to exercise a wholesome influence in mitigating the angry tone of the discussion which had just arisen; and his authority might have secured a better reception and a more lasting effect for the "compromises of 1850," the debate on which was interrupted by the news of his death.

These compromises were advocated by the leading statesmen of both parties; but their original author was Henry Clay, and they were his last achievement in the cause to which his life had been devoted—the maintenance of the Union. They were justly censured by Southern Senators as being, under the name of a compromise, little else than a series of concessions to the fanaticism of New England; but they were, nevertheless, thought likely to postpone, if not to avert, a desperate sectional conflict, and accordingly received the support of all the most moderate men on either side. They arose out of the endeavour of the North to exclude slavery from the territory acquired from Mexico; that is, practically, to shut out the Southerners, by whose blood that territory had been won, from the whole of the vast regions lying westward of the Louisiana purchase; from the Northern part of which they had been already excluded by the Missouri compromise. This endeavour was, of course, indignantly resisted by the South; the North persisted; and when the contest seemed likely to endanger the Union, Mr. Clay came forward with his scheme of compromise. The substance of his proposals was embodied in a report by the Committee of the Senate, to the following effect:—

1. When new States formed out of Texas present themselves, it shall be the duty of Congress to admit them.
2. The immediate admission of California, with the boundaries which she has proposed.
3. The establishment of territorial Governments for Utah and New Mexico, without the Wilmot proviso.
4. The excision from Texas of all New Mexico, rendering therefor a pecuniary equivalent; and the incorporation of this section in the bill for the admission of California, and the organization of a territorial Government for Utah and New Mexico.
5. The enactment of a law for the effectual rendition of fugitive slaves escaping into the Free States.
6. No interference with slavery in the District of Columbia, but the slave trade therein should be abolished under heavy penalties.

The first proposal was intended to exclude the pretensions of the North to refuse admission to new States formed out of Texas on the ground of their legalising slavery. As it was then thought that before long that vast territory would be desirous of subdividing into several distinct States, this seemed the only means of preventing a renewal of the Missouri quarrel under much more dangerous circumstances. This could not be termed in any sense a concession to the South, unless the admission of citizens of one section to equal privileges in the common territory of the Union with those of the other could be called a concession. If, indeed, it were possible to make out a case in favour of the pretensions of the Abolitionists to forbid the formation of new Slave States, we might consider the waiver of that pretension in regard to the territories of Texas as a concession. But it is hardly possible for any honest man to argue that the North had any more right to refuse admission to a new State with Southern institutions, than the South would have had to exclude a claimant because its laws conformed to those of New England or Illinois. It must be remembered, too, that while the South was virtually excluded by the Missouri compromise from the Northern territories, the North was at perfect liberty, if it could, to form Free States south of the line of that compromise; as was actually done in the case of California. The same remark applies to the organization of the territories of Utah and New Mexico without the Wilmot proviso; which simply placed Northern and Southern citizens on an equal footing in those territories. The clause admitting California was of course a simple concession to the free-soil party; as was the last provision, forbidding the sale of slaves within the district of Columbia, where hitherto North and South had met on equal terms, each preserving a right to its own customs and its own property. It may be said that slavery being in itself a wrong and unnatural institution, the territories ought to be preserved from it by law; and, if they had been the dependencies of a single Sovereign Power, the argument might be a perfectly sound one. But it was a necessary consequence of the Union of free and slave States in one Confederacy, that freedom and slavery should be equal before Federal law; and if the Northern States were not prepared to concede this equality, their remedy lay not in a violation of the Federal compact, but in a dissolution of partnership.

The only provision which seems at first sight to bear the appearance of a concession to the South was that for the more effectual rendition of fugitive slaves. This was a measure peculiarly obnoxious to Northern feeling, and of little practical value to the South. It was demanded as the redress not of a grievance, but of an insult. The Federal Constitution provided that fugitives from service should be given up; and this was justly held to be a formal recognition of the right of the slaveowner. The Northern States had in many instances violated and set at naught this law; and had done so in a manner insulting to the institutions and offensive to the pride of the South. There could be no question that they had wronged their sister States by this breach of contract; there could be no question of the propriety of enforcing their fulfilment of their pledges. They might be entitled to annul the compact altogether, but not, while maintaining it, to evade the obligations which it imposed upon them; and the Act which sought to compel them to obey the Constitution could hardly be regarded as sectional concession.

The bills embodying these compromises were all carried by large majorities; both parties, in their preparations for the Presidential campaign of 1852, formally adopted and approved them. But the North, though it had gained far more than it had a right to claim, was enraged that its invasion of the equal right of the South had not attained a further success; and the result was fatal to the Whig party, which "died of an attempt to swallow the Fugitive Slave Law." The Whig candidate, General Scott, received only 42 electoral votes out of 396. The candidate of the Free Soil party withdrew from him 157,000 primary votes, and the Whigs polled only 1,383,000 to 1,585,000 for Mr. Pierce, the choice of the Democrats.

The way in which that gentleman came to be nominated affords a curious illustration of the working of American party organisation.

Originally, the candidates of each party for the Presidency were nominated by "caucuses," or irregular meetings of members of Congress, and sometimes by similar meetings of the Legislatures of New York and Virginia, and were thus the choice of the active public men of the party. But this practice became extremely unpopular with the multitude, as savouring too much of aristocratic usurpation, and the practice was adopted in its place of sending up delegates to a Convention of the party, which was allowed to select its candidate; each State having a number of votes proportionate to its votes in the Electoral College. The only choice practically left to the people was between the nominees of the two parties. The rule finally adopted in these Conventions was to require a vote of two-thirds for the selection of a candidate; and the result of this requirement has been that the real leaders of the party, being almost always obnoxious to some considerable number of the wirepullers and electioneers who formed the convention, could rarely be its candidates. Henry Clay was only once the selected candidate of the Whigs, who on other occasions put forward men like Harrison and Taylor, comparatively little known in political life. In 1852 there was the greatest difficulty in choosing a Democratic candidate. Neither Cass, Buchanan, Douglas, nor Masey could concentrate a sufficient vote to secure election. It was not till the 35th ballot that the name of Mr. Pierce was mentioned; and he then received only fifteen votes. On the 48th he received fifty-five, and on the 49th 283 out of 288. And thus a man previously almost unknown to his countrymen, and quite unknown to the world outside, was selected as the Democratic champion, and was ultimately elected President of the United States.

FEDERAL BASTILES.*

The ready submission of the people of the United States to an unmitigated despotism is not accounted for by the passion for empire, or by the belief that by investing the Executive with supreme power the Union may be restored. A people who can tolerate boastful projects for setting aside the Mississippi, might perhaps suppose that by giving Mr. Lincoln authority to call upon the whole male population capable of bearing arms to enter his service, by giving him a right to issue letters of marque so as to endow him with full naval as well as military control, and by placing at his disposal a credit for £180,000,000 sterling, the Southerners could be exterminated, and the fruitful lands of the South become the spoil of the conquerors. But unless we adopt the theory of national madness, it is inexplicable that the Northerners should have resigned without a sigh their personal freedom, for it cannot help the armies of the United States that Mr. Lincoln is privileged to imprison any citizen he pleases without trial, and that he is encouraged to be tyrannical by an act of Congress indemnifying him and his subordinates for any offences they may commit. But the conduct of the people is not so strange as the conduct of the Government of the United States. We cannot understand the exceeding barbarity of the Federal officials. We know it is prompted by New England, and that the Lincolnites are but the poor tools of the faction that ceases not to clamour for the bloodshed that simultaneously gratifies their malignity and fills their pockets. But the New Englander does not usually suffer any passion to interfere with his gains, or to frustrate the object he has in view, and hitherto he has managed to make fanaticism profitable. From his own point of view it was a stupid blunder to permit the outrages of the Federal soldiery, to sanction the shameful policy of Pope, Hunter, and Mitchell, and not to award swift punishment to Butler, Turchin, and McNeil for their execrable atrocities. But yet more extraordinary is the treatment of the so-called Border States now under the military control of the United States. We might have supposed that in their case, at all events, a policy of conciliation would have been pursued, but we find instead of conciliation, wanton exasperation. Grant that Mr. Lincoln found it necessary to put down the legislature of Maryland, and to imprison Marylanders without lawful warrant or trial, it is not less extraordinary that he should have subjected the men so arrested to treatment that hardly has a parallel even in Mr. Gladstone's eloquent description of the sufferings of the political prisoners in the dungeons of Naples. We presume Europe will not be less disgusted with the cruelty of the Lincolnites than it was with the cruelty of the Bourbons.

Mr. F. K. Howard, the author of "Fourteen Months in American Bastiles," is a citizen of Baltimore, and, from his family connections and other circumstances, occupies a high and honourable social position. On the 13th of September, 1861, soon after midnight, Mr. Howard was roused from his sleep, and a person obtained admission into his house under pretence of having to deliver a private message from a personal friend. Mr. Howard was immediately informed that he was arrested according to the instructions of Mr. Seward; and as the person was accompanied by a band of men armed with revolvers, resistance was not attempted. The house was searched; and while this was going on, Mrs. Howard was shut up in the library, and not allowed to go to her children's room. Mr. Howard was dragged off before the gang left the house, and the wife was not even allowed to send for her father or brother; but of course the Lincolnites would not miss an opportunity of insulting women and frightening children. The only excuse for this outrage was, that Mr. Howard, as one of the editors of the Baltimore Daily Exchange, had contended that the conquest of the South was impossible, that the Union was dissolved if not by secession, at all events by the unconstitutional proceedings of Mr. Lincoln, and that in such case the people of Maryland had the right to decide their own destiny for themselves. But it is not the gross tyranny of arresting Mr. Howard and his compatriots—for at the same time with him were arrested most of the members of the Legislature from Baltimore, Mr. Brown, the Mayor of that city, and Mr. May, a representative in Congress—that we are now concerned with, but the barbarity that was called into requisition to make tyranny more than usually galling and odious.

At 2 o'clock in the morning Mr. Howard found himself at Fort M'Henry, together with fourteen of his friends, "all gentlemen of high social position, and of unimpeachable character; and each of them had been arrested solely on account of his political opinions, no definite charge having been then, or afterwards, preferred against him." Mr. Howard, with three others, was put into a small room, the furniture of which consisted of four chairs, a rickety bedstead, and a filthy apology for a bed, and a mattress. The prisoners, who meanwhile were not allowed to communicate with their friends, were removed from Fort M'Henry, and arrived at Fortress Monroe on the evening of the 14th of September. Here four small rooms were assigned to the fifteen prisoners, two of which were simply vaulted chambers of rough stone white-washed. All kinds of insults were offered them by the direction of General Wool, the commandant, and they were not allowed to leave their casemates for a single instant "for any purpose whatever." At the end of three days the guard closed the window shutters and the Venetian doors, thus making the confinement almost intolerable. Mr. S. T. Wallis addressed the following remonstrance to Captain Davis, the Provost-Marshal, on behalf of the prisoners:—

Sir,—The Sergeant who has charge of my fellow prisoners and myself has just closed the blinds of our front windows and doors, excluding us from the sight of passing objects, shutting out, to a great extent, the light by which we read, and hindering the circulation of the air through our apartments. These last are, at best, damp and unwholesome, and to-day, particularly, in the existing state of the atmosphere, are extremely unpleasant and uncomfortable—so much so, that we have been compelled to build a fire for our mere protection from illness. Some of our number are old men; others in delicate health; and the restraint which excludes us from air and exercise is painful enough without this new annoyance, which the Sergeant informs us he has no right to forego. You are aware of the disgusting necessities to which we are subjected, in a particular of which we spoke to you personally, and you will, of course, know how much this new obstruction must add to our discomfort. I am requested by my companions simply to call your attention to the matter.

The only reply to this was placing bars across the shutters, and padlocking the Venetian doors, and so closing them permanently.

On the 25th of September the prisoners were removed to Fort La Fayette, but the change did not better their condition. Some of them were placed in dark and damp casemates, and others in gun batteries which could not be warmed. The beds were arranged between the guns, and consisted of an iron bedstead, a bag of straw, and a shoddy blanket. Still worse was the condition of the sailors who had been taken whilst running the blockade. "These men had neither beds nor blankets, and were all, or nearly all, in irons. Their situation was wretched in the extreme." The food of the political prisoners—served in tin plates and tin cups—consisted of fat pork and beef of indifferent quality only half cooked; of a muddy liquid, called coffee, of which the predominating flavour was burnt beans and foul water; and soup, of which the only palatable thing was a few grains of rice that could sometimes be fished out of each can. Mr. Howard says, "Over and over again have I seen gentlemen, who had been always accustomed to all the comforts of life, forced to turn away with loathing from the miserable food thus provided for them." Those who could afford it were allowed to board with the Sergeant, who furnished two plain meals daily for a dollar a day. The Yankees were not above making a little profit out of their prisoners, either by fair means or foul. Lieutenant Wood, the commandant, seized some cases of spirits on the plea that the prisoners were responsible for the drunkenness of the soldiers, and when the prisoners left Fortress Monroe the cases of spirits were not forthcoming. Lieutenant Wood also undertook the washing for the prisoners, and charged enormous prices for the work, paying himself out of the money he took from them when they were delivered into his custody.

But Lieutenant Wood was not the only person who made money out of the prisoners. Some New York politicians (!) were allowed to enter the fort, and amongst them was Mr. W. H. Ludlow, who could come when he liked, and see whom he pleased. This individual represented that he had great influence at Washington, and took fees for procuring the release of prisoners. "What he received altogether (says Mr. Howard) I do not know; but I do know that he received two retaining fees, namely, $100 from one gentleman, and $150 from another. From the latter he had a promise of a contingent fee of $1,000. I do not believe he rendered any service to his clients, both of whom were taken to Fort Warren, and exchanged or released nearly four months afterwards." Mr. Seward ultimately repudiated Mr. W. H. Ludlow's proceedings, but this was a mere dodge, for a week or two after the repudiation Mr. Ludlow was made a major, and appointed a member of General Dix's staff at Baltimore.

On the 30th October, Mr. Howard and his companions were taken from Fort La Fayette, and conveyed to Fort Warren, on the steamer State of Maine, which was in a filthy condition, and so crowded as to be in danger of sinking; "the officers of the boat admitted that the vessel was then utterly unseaworthy, and that if a moderate gale should catch us at sea, the chances were largely in favour of our going to the bottom." Pork fat, crackers, and coffee "in dirty looking horse buckets," was the fare provided. Some of the gentlemen were better off, owing to the care of Mrs. Gelston, a lady who had done what she could to help the prisoners in Fort La Fayette, and hearing that they were leaving, had sent them a basket of provisions. For a full description of the privations of the voyage, we must refer to the narrative itself, as well as for the treatment received whilst in Fort Warren. Some of the prisoners were liberated on giving a parole not to aid and comfort the enemies in hostility against the United States; but others refused to make any terms, insisting that "as they had been arbitrarily imprisoned, they would not recognise the right which Mr. Lincoln claimed, to impose upon them any conditions." And heroically was this resolution kept. Mr. Charles Howard, the father of our author, and who was imprisoned with him, was released on parole to return in a certain number of days, in order that he might see his dying child. A few days later Mr. F. K. Howard received a message from his father, "that his sister's end was rapidly approaching." Colonel Dimick then offered to release him on parole, but the offer came too late, and was refused. Mr. Charles Howard was informed that he might extend the time of his stay indefinitely, by simply giving his pledge to return to Fort Warren when so ordered, but he refused to accept any favour, and announced to Colonel Dimick that he would be at Fort Warren on the 3rd December, the day that his parole would expire. Before that date, however, viz., on the 27th November, 1862, the gallant gentlemen who had borne their cruel imprisonment rather than succumb to the tyranny of Abraham Lincoln, were unconditionally released. They had been arrested without offence, and without lawful procedure, and they were set at liberty without trial or condition. "We came out of prison as we had gone in, holding in the same just scorn and detestation the despotism under which the country was prostrate, and with a stronger resolution than ever to oppose it by every means to which, as American freemen, we had the right to resort."

Our notice of Mr. Howard's narrative is necessarily but an imperfect sketch, but sufficient, we trust, to call attention to the work itself. No one can read this simple account of cruel oppression without feeling indignant and disgusted with the Government at Washington, and rejoicing that the independence of the South will check the domination of the most formidable despotism on earth, and save the New World from becoming the prey of New England's rapacity and ambition.

Foreign Correspondence.

PARIS, March 31.

The Polish question, though it must be admitted it has consigned all others to a secondary place, has not distracted the attention of the Government from the American struggle. The Moniteur continues to publish letters from New York (which are believed to be written by M. Mercier, the French Envoy at Washington), which describe in forcible terms the utter lassitude of the public throughout the Northern States, and expose the disorganization of the army, the speculation in high places, the frauds and wholesale swindling of army contractors, and the shifting policy of the Abolitionists, Democrats, and other sects whose love for their country is well expressed by one of their poets, Lowell, in his "Bigelow Papers:—

"—Uncle Sam I reverence, Particularly his pockets."

By diplomatic despatches, by insertions in the Moniteur, by the marked courtesy shown in official circles to distinguished Southerners in Paris, the French Government has expressed and continues to testify its sympathy with the Southern cause in every possible way. Such being the case, why does not the Emperor take the practical step to which his conviction that the independent existence of the South is a fait accompli, inevitably leads? Why does he not recognise the South? That is a question which it is not easy to answer. I can only ascribe it to the peculiar turn of the Emperor's mind, which, as we all know, attaches great value to patience. The non-recognition of the South is inconsistent with the published declarations of the Government, with its traditional policy, and with its avowed sentiments. Therefore I cannot but think that this Polish outbreak has a very great share in the postponement of a decision which, by this time, it was fully expected would be made public. In the event of a European war it is easy to understand that the French Government would not care about being involved in further difficulties with America, but the danger of a European war now seems very remote. If, on the other hand, the Emperor has made up his mind not to act in American affairs without the co-operation of England, we must not look for recognition until the termination of the war.

Of the Polish insurrection all that can be said is that it is not yet put down. Great as is the sympathy felt here for the Poles, it is generally admitted that the insurgents have not much chance now of being able to prolong the struggle. Their gallantry is beyond all praise, but it is a pity that men that behave like heroes in the field of battle should permit the success of their cause to be imperilled and, indeed, ruined by squabbles about precedence which originate only in the inordinate self-esteem of individuals, who, like Mieroslawski, are only notorious. No satisfactory explanation has yet been given of the flight of Langiewicz into Galicia. He appears to have been driven into a corner (not figuratively, but literally) by the Russians, to have beaten them two days running, to have been defeated in a third encounter. He is next heard of as having retired with his female aide-de-camp with the unpronounceable name, across the Austrian frontier—an act which, I am sorry to say, I have seen nothing that can palliate. He had assumed the dictatorship with the assent of the Insurgent Government at Warsaw, and if dictatorial power means anything, it was his duty to have traitors summarily disposed of. The captain of a ship in danger of sinking who abandoned his crew to their fate, under the pretence that his officers were mutinous, would be forever disgraced. I do not mean to say that circumstances may not justify Langiewicz in acting as he did, but we know nothing of those circumstances as yet, and it must be confessed that the conduct of the ex-dictator looks extremely suspicious. I greatly admire Langiewicz, who appears to be a gallant soldier, and heartily hope he may be able to clear away this stain on his reputation. The Poles continue a desultory kind of warfare in other parts of the kingdom, but though they fight well, it is obvious, from the details in the German papers, that they have no chance. They may defeat the Russians in one, or even two encounters, but no sooner has one corps been disposed of, than another rises up like the heads of the Lernaean monster. In all their encounters (see the Czar, the Breslau Zeitung, and other anti-Russian papers) it is ever the same story—in whatever direction they have turned,—

"Lernaean turbâ caput circumstetit anguis."

The canard market has been tolerably supplied during the week. Imprimis, our old friend the Congress canard has once more made its appearance at our political tables. It is a very tough old bird by this time, and not easy of digestion by any means. We have also had a Rhenish canard—stuffed with a queer story about France demanding the independence of Poland, per Grand Duke Leuchtenberg, and a variety of other pretty little romanzetti, which show what a wonderfully inventive race newspaper men must be.

There is nothing startling from Italy, save the arrival here of Signor Rattazzi, with Madame Rattazzi, late Countess de Solms. An ingenious Milan caricaturist has represented that ex-statesman completely extinguished by an enormous crinoline. On dit, that he has applied in vain for an audience at the Tuileries.

The elections here excite a good deal of attention. An empty-headed journalist, M. Haven, the principal proprietor, has made himself conspicuous by his pretensions to contest the seat of M. M. Picard and Ollivier, two of the opposition leaders. He has been subjected to such a bombardment by the Temps and the Presse, that he has been compelled to beat an inglorious retreat.

At the present time of writing, I do not know whether an important change may not have taken place in the French Cabinet. Three or four days ago the Debats and the Patrie published articles vindicating M. Fould against attacks made on him in the Chamber, in the course of which they drew a contrast between his policy and that of his predecessors, not flattering to the latter. Yesterday those papers received a communiqué from M. de Persigny showing that M. Fould had done nothing very remarkable after all, and quoting figures to show that the finances have by no means benefited under his rule to the extent which had been anticipated. This note, not by any means complimentary to M. Fould, and sent to the papers behind his back, led to his tendering his resignation. I do not know whether it will be accepted, but it seems clear that if M. Fould remains in, somebody must go out. Immediately on the fact becoming known, there was a panic at the Bourse, and Rente went down 65 centimes. It is likely that some sort of compromise will be made. M. Fould is a man with whom the Government cannot afford to part.

The "Patriots," who have been plucking the American eagle with so much profit to themselves, are, it appears, in want of raw material wherewith to carry on the war. The Northern papers here insert a despatch from Mr. Seward, calling on the Consul here to supply "emigrants." Great advantages are held out. The whole thing is in the style of "Martin Chuzzlewit's" American experiences. The fact is carefully withheld that the "emigrants" are wanted for "chair à canon." Mr. Seward undertakes to "provide" for the "emigrants" who may be seduced across the Atlantic; but he omits to say that the only thing he is able to guarantee is an unlimited supply of hot lead and cold steel, and six feet of American ground. So far as France is concerned, however, the appeal is not likely to be successful—but that makes the attempt none the less a piece of flagrant political immorality.

(EXTRACT.)

ST. THOMAS, March 15.

The Yankees are still coming in and out. The Vanderbilt, with Admiral Wilkes on board, returned yesterday, and I learn that the Peterhoff was actually captured (as surmised in my last), and sent to Key West.

The Yankee officers openly state that they intend to capture both the Pet and the Aries (British steamers now in this harbour), just as soon as they get outside, and that their only object in remaining is to wait for these two vessels to sail. The English frigate Phaeton came in here on the 9th instant, to participate in the demonstration made on the 10th, in honour of the marriage of the Prince of Wales. She goes out as soon as she gets the Bermuda mail, expected to-day, and the two English steamers referred to above will go out with her. All that the captain of the Phaeton says he can do, is, when the Yankees board the vessels, to send an officer on board to see if no contraband is found, no capture is made. After that, the vessels must do the best they can for themselves. Captain Tatham, of the Phaeton, told me that, from representations made, he thought an English man of war would be sent here to look after British interests. That the capture made by the Yankees of the Pearl and Peterhoff were illegal, and that they would have to be given up with heavy damages—but that he had no orders to interfere in any way. The Wachusett, Admiral Wilkes's Flag ship, has remained in port since her first arrival, but her steam has always been up, ready to start at any moment.

Yesterday afternoon the Aries moved from one side of the harbour to the other, so as to be near the Phaeton; the moment she began to move there was a great stir on board the Vanderbilt and Wachusett; awnings removed, anchors run up short, and strong "firing up"—in fact, every preparation was made for an immediate start. The Yankees have got things so much their own way here, that they now keep some one on the top of the highest hill that overlooks the town and the sea on the other side of the island, and keep up a regular system of signals. They thus get early information of every vessel's appearance in the offing, and run out to inspect at their leisure. I don't think this would be allowed in any other port in the West Indies, but the Danish Government is weak, and the Yankees do what they please. Their acts have been brought to the Governor's notice, but I don't know that he has ever protested against them.

[The Pet is a steamer from Liverpool, bound for Nassau. The Aries has discharged a cargo of cotton after running the blockade at Charleston.]

FEDERAL WARFARE.

(From the Times, April 1.)

An ancient rhetorician wrote about Xerxes that he turned dry land into sea, and sea into dry land, making a canal through Mount Athos, and building a bridge across the Hellespont. The American Republic seems to partake much more of the violence and extravagance of the Persian monarch than of the wise counsel and well-combined action of the Federation of Commonwealths which opposed him. Excited by a tremendous war, and all the portents of approaching revolution, the imagination of the American Democracy seems to have run riot. Not satiated with all the destruction which modern science has enabled mankind to wreak upon each other, the North has called to its aid the mighty agencies of nature, and seeks to ruin and mutilate half a continent in the vain hope to overthrow or intimidate its inhabitants. In vain has nature, after a series of tremendous convulsions, settled herself down into something like order and regularity, indenting the coast with bays and harbours, and draining the vast area of a continent through the agency of enormous rivers. The rage of man frets against these natural and beneficent ordinances, just as Xerxes flung fetters into the sea and lashed the winds that were rebellious to his commands. By the aid of the "stone fleet" the United States have blocked up the entrance to several much frequented harbours, and now, with less labour and far greater success, they seek to drown the land which they cannot conquer. It is calculated that, by the action of the Federals in cutting the levées, or dams, which keep the Mississippi in its course as it runs through the level lands towards the sea, a district as large as Scotland has been drowned in the State of Mississippi, and 5,000 square miles in the State of Louisiana.

Had some enormous strategical advantage been obtainable by this proceeding, mankind must have deplored the harsh and dreadful necessity which, in a continent so small, a portion of which has yet been reclaimed for the use of civilized man, drove the Federals to lay waste and devastate so considerable a portion of its surface. But there is no reason to suppose that any advantage in the least degree commensurate with the amount of wanton and cruel destruction which has been perpetrated could anyhow have been obtained. Most certainly no such advantage has been gained. The expedition from Yazoo Pass, so far from reaching its destined point near Vicksburg, has been encountered and defeated by Confederate batteries, and driven to take refuge in another river to avoid further injuries. The act, therefore, stands out in all its naked deformity. Those who have called the mighty Mississippi to their aid have proved themselves unworthy of their potent ally, and, powerful only for mischief, have been singularly discomfited in the endeavour to profit by their new and singular enterprise. We have all read how the Dutch, the mighty precursors of the United States, a people as conspicuous for doing much with small resources as the American Union for doing little with great ones, when they found themselves reduced to the two small States of Holland and Zealand, with which alone they had to make head against the powerful monarchy of Spain, in the extremity of their despair and desolation cut through the dykes which protected their fields and gardens from the ocean which roared above their heads, choosing rather to give their native land to destruction than to see it in the grasp of a tyrant or a persecutor. This courage, prepared for everything except submission—this noble fortitude, which the extreme of ill fortune could not subdue—forms one of the brightest pages of history, and invests the sieges of Haarlem and of Leyden with an interest second to nothing in the annals of mankind. But in proportion to our admiration of those who called in the waves of the German Ocean to protect their faith and their freedom must be the abhorrence inspired by acts so wanton and so ferocious as that of letting loose the waters of the Mississippi over the plantations of the South, and overwhelming under the waves that which it is found impossible to subdue.

At the beginning of the war the North went forth to battle in all the presumption of overweening strength and numbers. Their notions of success were thoroughly Oriental. They had the largest number of men under arms, and doubted not of the victory, especially as they had the largest resources to feed, arm, and recruit them. Received in the field by troops far less numerous than their own, they found to their astonishment how little the leaders of the South had to dread from them in the open field. From that time the whole aspect of the war has entirely changed. In proportion as success has become more difficult the means employed for its attainment have been more odious and cruel. Every effort has been made to light the torch of a servile insurrection, and, as if this was not dreadful enough, water has been called in to supplement the tardy vengeance of that fire which, kindled by the hands of slaves, would, if the pious and decorous North could have had their will, wrap in one mighty conflagration the labours of a hundred years. Men may wrangle and dispute about the causes, the rights and the wrongs of this great quarrel, but as to these measures posterity will have but one verdict to pronounce—a verdict of horror and execration. And this cruelty and ferocity, surpassing so far all that is recorded of the wickedness and barbarity of man in former wars, has been called into action, not for the purpose of meeting foreign invasion, but for a war avowedly intended to restore a Federal Union, which unhappy differences have partially interrupted. The men who are thus letting loose at the same moment fire and water united in an unnatural compact against their adversaries, are never tired of repeating that they fight for the maintenance of the Union, and look forward with unshaken confidence to the time when their great Federation shall be restored, and the brethren so long estranged from each other shall once more unite together in harmony and peace. It is difficult to say what time, what interest may not effect. Nations have shed each other's blood like water on fields of battle. They have covered the ocean with the wrecks of their naval engagements and the bodies of their seamen. These things may be expiated, may be forgiven, may at last be forgotten; but deeds like those by which the Northern States are making their present war with the South singular and execrable among the worst and bloodiest annals of mankind can never be forgiven or forgotten. The moment any idea of reconciliation is entertained these dreadful memories will rise up like a spectre between the two parties, and forbid every attempt at reconciliation unless founded on absolute independence on the one side, and complete renunciation of every claim to obedience on the other.

It is curious to remark how utterly paralyzed for the purposes of legitimate war are the very persons who are anxious to wage it with such extremity of ferocity and fury. The army of the Potomac remains inactive; nay, there is much reason to believe that Washington owes her safety at the present moment to prudential and political, rather than to military considerations, and that the capital of the Northern Confederacy, though able to effect the easy and fruitless crime of drowning whole provinces by breaking down the bank of a mighty river, is incapable to defend her archives, her public buildings, and the seat of her Government. The promised vengeance against Charleston languishes and evaporates in empty threats. Savannah, taken with so much ease by the British in the War of Independence, resists firmly and effectually. Port Hudson has repulsed an attack, and the Mississippi itself has turned traitor, and, by way of set-off for the inundation of Southern territory, has filled up and rendered useless the canal which was to carry the Federal gunboats to the other side of Vicksburg. The Confederates threaten Fort Donaldson, and a new invasion of Kentucky is seriously apprehended.

Under these gloomy auspices the month of March has closed, and the period will shortly arrive when the summer heats will again lend their powerful co-operation to the cause of the North. No one can presume to say what are the reverses and vicissitudes which fortune, not yet satisfied with the sufferings of the American people, has in store for either party. But the information which has just reached us makes it abundantly evident, if it were not so before, that the choice henceforth for the South is between victory and extermination, for the North between peace and ruin—ruin certain if the war be protracted, as it easily may be, to a point which will leave the President without a revenue and without an army—ruin still more certain and complete if the wicked aspirations of fanatical hate be accomplished, and the Central Government, already triumphant over the liberties of the North, shall obtain as the prize of success the unenviable duty of holding down, under the heel of military despotism, the struggling and palpitating remains of what were once the Southern States.

PRIVATE LETTERS FROM THE SOUTH.

The following extracts from private letters, though they contain no important information on political and military matters, are yet valuable as affording an unscreened view into the private life of the Southern people, and a lively picture of the feelings which animate them in this heroic war for national independence. The only alterations made in these extracts are such as were necessary to conceal the authorship of the letters:—

Alabama, February, 1863.

Amid these familiar and peaceful home surroundings, where we pursue our usual avocations, it is difficult to realise that war wastes our beautiful land, and that its soil is invaded by an enemy whose tender mercies are always cruel, who makes homes desolate, and causes the widow and the orphan to cry unto Heaven for redress. Here, in this old homestead, we, a family of women, are gathered; patiently and hopefully awaiting the end; husbands, sons, and brothers gone forth with our blessings and prayers to do and die. The only son, who, as you know, has been reared in every indulgence, entered the army a year ago as a private. We tried to persuade him that he was too young and too delicate, and would not be able to endure the fatigues and privations incident to the life of a common soldier; but he replied that if he had the certainty of death before him he would go, and that he could never hold up his head again among his compatriots, or consent even to live in this country when its liberties should be secured did he not bear his part in achieving them. Such arguments being unanswerable he went, has served through the whole Western Campaign, during which he marched two thousand miles and suffered extreme hardships, and has since been elected Lieutenant of his company. Do not think I am egotistical in thus dwelling on those in whom I am so deeply interested. The picture, though personal, is applicable to every household in this afflicted land. Women waiting, watching, and praying at home with breaking hearts, while men are enduring, fighting and dying on distant battle fields. I must tell you an anecdote of our great Lee—the Washington of this revolution—which has not been given to the public. At the battle of Sharpsburg, a company of artillery, in which General Lee's youngest son is a private, was in a very exposed position, and after losing the greater part of its men retreated. As they were leaving the field General Lee met them, and asked, "Why do you leave your post?" One replied, "General, our men were being sacrificed." "Can you not fire one round more?" "Oh, yes, we have ammunition for two or three rounds," was the answer. "Then return to your position," said the General. "Oh, Father," appealed his son, "you will not send us back, under that murderous fire again." "Yes," my son, "go back and do your duty to your country." They returned and fired their last rounds. . . . Spite of the infamous proclamation our servants are still loyal, and never rendered more cheerful obedience; indeed, their interest in our soldiers and anxiety for the return of peace seems as great as our own. During the Christmas week we had two thousand soldiers passing through this place daily, and we undertook, in conjunction with our neighbours, to give them a Christmas dinner to remind them of home. This, of course, involved much extra cooking, and it being the servants' holiday we were much distressed that our charity should infringe on their privileges. We, therefore, determined to remunerate them for their trouble, but when I offered them the money they seemed quite hurt, and said, "that they wanted to do their part for our soldiers, and not having any money, could only give their time." The scene of "feeding the soldiers" was a novel one. We had a long rustic table spread in the open air, around which the dirty, rough, and hungry soldiers crowded eagerly, and they were waited upon by ladies, who felt it an honour to serve them. Dirty and ragged though they were, not a rude word or lewd jest was heard, and when crowded two or three rows deep at the table, the first ranks I observed, never forgot those in the rear who could not reach for themselves. We are now daily receiving the wounded from Murfreesboro, and when they are willing we stop them to have their wounds dressed and to procure some rest, before proceeding on their journey to their homes. Such are the occupations of Southern women, and their zeal and enthusiasm know no bounds. . . . Mrs. Bragg, wife of the General, recently passed through Mobile, after leaving her despoiled home. She was absent at her mother's, some few miles distant, when the Vandals reached her plantation, and was quite unconscious of what had passed when she drove up to her house on her return. A Federal officer met her at the door, and said, "Mrs. Bragg," I presume. "Yes," she replied, "and a pretty scene of desolation greets Mrs. Bragg." "Oh," said the pert Yankee, "this is nothing to what you will see a little later." The shrubbery had been torn up by the roots, marble mantle-pieces taken down and broken into fragments, mirrors shattered, and her clothes and jewellery stolen. In fact, every conceivable outrage had been perpetrated upon their property. . . . God grant that the days when we shall once more be able to sit in peace and safety under our own vine and fig tree may not be far off!

Mobile, February, 1863.

You would be shocked to see how shabby we are in our house; without carpets, which have been sent to the army. Wood at $16 a cord, and coal not to be had at less than $80 a ton. Everybody has gone a-soldiering, and no one is left to work the mines. I heard there was an order given yesterday to keep the coal for Government use, but that will make little difference, for I have not even thought of it at such a price. I had eggs offered me yesterday at $1 75c. a dozen, which is 25c. cheaper than they have been selling. Everything is at starvation prices. — wrote me saying they were going to raise the board at the Percy House to $60 a month, exclusive of fires and lights. . . . If the Yankees drive us from here I do not know what will become of us; "but," as Micawber said, "I hope something may turn up." The most agreeable thing that could turn up now, would be peace, for which we pray daily and hourly. Notwithstanding all our privations you would be surprised to see how cheerful we are; all we want to compensate us is a victory every now and then. From Northern accounts we are to be crushed in twenty days. It is true that they are making gigantic preparations, and have greatly the advantage over us in numbers and war material,—but Southern boys are not easily crushed; their valour and bravery are the admiration of even their enemies. In the battles of Sharpsburg and Perryville thousands had bare and bleeding feet, yet not a murmur escaped their lips, all being eager and anxious to meet their vile foes. I am glad to say that our soldiers are better provided now. Carpets have been taken from our floors and converted into blankets for their use; in fact, it is only necessary to say that the soldiers are in want, for our people to give all they can find which may contribute to their comfort. My dear son is with the army of Virginia. He has been very fortunate so far. He has been in many battles, the last of which was at Boonesboro, where he fell from his horse from sheer exhaustion, and, but for the assistance of two of his men, would have been captured. He had been in the saddle for a week without change of clothes. While the battle of Sharpsburg was raging he was in a house, ill, when a tremendous shell fell within five feet of his bed, but fortunately did not explode.

At the battle of Seven Pines he was knocked from his horse by a spent ball, which occasioned the report of his being killed, and gave me many anxious hours. May God continue to cover his head in the hour of battle. . . . Our people are busy strengthening and fortifying our city, and the obstructions near the city look very formidable. Admiral Buchanan, the hero of the Virginia, or Merrimac, is in command, and expresses himself well pleased. We are very fortunate in having so able a commander. There are a great many naval officers stationed here, most of them Marylanders and very agreeable gentlemen.

Petersburg, Virginia, February, 1863.

You would be surprised to find how little Petersburg has been changed by the war. Things apparently go on just the same as before the war. Ladies walk about the streets dressed as finely, perhaps even more finely, than formerly; almost all the stores are open as usual, and contain far more goods than you would imagine; waggons and carriages are flying about the streets as usual; money is very plentiful, and there is no suffering among the people. Everything is enormously high; for instance, ladies' shoes are selling at from $20 to $25 per pair, calico at $2 25c. per yard, cotton goods at $1 75c., pins at $1 50c. per paper, and everything else in proportion, except catables, which have not advanced so much. Flour is selling at $20, meal at $2 50c. per bushel, beef at 25c. per lb., and bacon at 62c. per lb. Turkeys, chickens, and eggs are very high just now, this being Christmas time. You will say or think, no doubt, how can the poor get along at these prices without suffering? I must therefore explain the matter. In the first place, the army takes so many of our people that there is plenty of work, at the very highest prices, for those who remain at home. Many of the women, also, get employment in sewing for the Government, and are thus enabled to support themselves. The city, moreover, owns a great many shares in railroads, cotton mills, &c., and as these are now paying enormous dividends, it is able to support the soldiers' families without taxing the people at all. Lastly, we are all united in our determination to suffer anything and everything rather than again become citizens of the same country as the cowardly, bragging Yankees, who imagined they could subjugate a brave people by mere force of numbers.

GENERAL "STONEWALL" JACKSON ON THE OBSERVANCE OF THE SABBATH.

The following letter has been forwarded to us for publication:—

Guiney's Department, Caroline Co., Va.,
December 10, 1863.

My dear Colonel,—Yesterday I heard that Governor Letcher and yourself were coming to visit the army, but the arrival of the cars without you doomed me to disappointment. I hope you will come before long.

Please give my kindest regards to the governor, and remind him of his long-standing promise to visit me. Colonel Linde says he heard distant artillery, and others agree with him. The direction is towards Port Royal. I have read with great interest the report of the Congressional Committee, recommending the repeal of the law requiring the mails to be carried on the Sabbath, and I hope that you will feel it a duty, as well as a pleasure, to urge its repeal. I do not see how a nation that thus arrays itself by such a law against God's holy day can expect to escape His wrath. The punishment of national sins must be confined to this world, as there are no nationalities beyond the grave. For fifteen years I have refused to mail letters on Sunday, or to take them out of the office on that day, except since I came into the field; and, so far from having to regret my course, it has been a source of true enjoyment. I have never sustained less in observing what God enjoins, and I am well satisfied that the law should be repealed at the earliest practicable moment. My rule is to let the Sabbath mails remain unopened unless they contain a despatch; but despatches are generally sent by couriers, or telegraph, or by some special messenger. I do not recollect a single instance of any special despatch having reached me since the commencement of the war by the mails.

If you desire the repeal of the law, I trust you will bring all your influence to bear in its accomplishment. Now is the time, it appears to me, to effect so desirable an object. I understand that not only is our President, but also most of our Colonels, and a majority of our Congressmen, are professing Christians. God has greatly blessed us, and I trust He will make us that people to whom God is the Lord. Let us look to God for an illustration in our history, that "righteousness exalteth a nation, but sin is a reproach to any people."

Please send me a copy of the staff bill, as I may wish to say something respecting it in my letter to Colonel Miles.

Very truly, your friend,

T. J. JACKSON.

Col. A. B. Boteler, Richmond, Va.

THE BLOCKADE.

(From the Richmond Enquirer, March 9th.)

On the appearance of the official announcement that the blockade of the port of Charleston had been raised by the dispersion of the Yankee squadron in the dash of our iron-clads under Captain Ingraham, we expressed the opinion that the transaction on that occasion would not be held to be a raising of the blockade, either by the Federal Government or by "neutral" powers. And, therefore, that whatever might be the law of the case, the blockade was not raised in fact. It was plain enough that England, having recognised the illegal blockade at first, would find good reasons for recognising it to the end, or at least until such time as her own interest and convenience should induce her to disregard or break it. That the Yankees, who know no law in their dealings with "rebels," would take the same view of the matter, was equally indubitable. They gave no sixty days' notice in forming the blockade at first; and supposing it even raised at the time in question, they were not likely to hold themselves bound to any greater formality in renewing it than they had observed in forming it. There is no law for us, as yet, either in America or in Europe.

These views and anticipations were correct. The Federal enemy of course ignored the act of dispersing their blockading squadron, and immediately sent a stronger force than ever before to cruise off the harbour. The latest advices from England inform us that in England also the blockade is still accounted a good enough blockade for us. In other words, the interest of England (for that is her principle) does not yet call for action in the matter. It serves us no purpose to affirm and to prove that the blockade was legally removed; so it was, perhaps, but there it is in fact, and stronger and more vigilant than ever. Still less does it avail us to proclaim formally to the outside world the fact that the blockade no longer exists in law. The outside world does not know us, and in all matters (whether of law or of fact) relating to our affairs, the world takes the word of our enemies at Washington, who are still our rulers in its estimation. Those emphatic declarations of public speakers and members of Parliament which are accepted here as so great a comfort—that the "Union" is broken for ever, and that a new nation has been actually created on this continent, signify exactly nothing. Mr. Adams is still our official representative at the Court of St. James's; and whatever representations Mr. Adams may choose to make as to the state of blockade or non-blockade of one of his own ports, are received, of course. Charleston is still one of the Yankee ports, officially and diplomatically speaking; and General Beauregard and our Secretary of State may say what they please—their voices are not heard. Not that the English are dead like Sir John Falstaff, it is the disease of not listening, the madness of not marking, that they are troubled withal. They will be exceedingly keen of hearing the very moment that their interest whispers in their ear.

And their interest does not yet plead in our behalf, whatever our good Confederates may calculate and speculate. It is of little use to prove to the meanest capacity that England must perish for lack of our cotton, and might, would, should, must clear away the blockade to procure it. We demonstrate all this; and the blockade is still there. The policy of England is far more complex and multiplex than we are usually in the habit of considering it; and the Government of that country, rather than do any single act tending to shorten our war, would consent that not one fibre of cotton should ever cross the Atlantic Ocean again until the end of the world.

As to the blockade we were always well persuaded that England would find law for respecting it while it suited her; and law for raising it when it incommoded her. Accordingly it did not surprise us to learn that the London Post, special organ of the administration, and the Times, general organ of everybody, declared that the blockade was not raised; that the Federal Government was not bound to give sixty days' notice before renewing it, nor any notice at all; and that the British Government would not require any such formality. In fact, Mr. Adams informs them officially that there is no blockade—that the Federal Government is merely closing some of its ports for a temporary purpose; but that other of its ports, New York and Boston for example, are still open to commerce, and will be happy to receive cargoes and consignments.

Such is the position in which we stand, and shall stand, until we have won a few more battles from our Yankee enemy.

THE NECESSITY OF SELF-SACRIFICE.

(From the Richmond Enquirer, March 9th.)

Our people have not yet learned the duty of economy, and until this duty to their country is thoroughly learned and sternly practised by the families of the land, the cause for which we are now battling will continue to be in peril. The gallant army that stands an impregnable wall between us and the foe, demand that those they protect should bear burdens at least as great as they are suffering; and among these burdens the self-denial of a rigid economy is painfully prominent. If every householder will rigidly see that no inmate in his house shall consume more than a quarter of a pound of meat a day with such vegetables as the season will supply, and strictly carry into execution such a plan of economy, our present supply of provisions can be made to support the people. The custom of three meals a day should be abandoned; two are amply sufficient; it is a habit—this eating three times a day—and, at present, a bad habit; we can accustom ourselves to two meals, and to two light meals at that, and it is a duty we owe to the cause. It is nearly as bad to grow fat as to get rich while this war is being waged.

Our people have so long lived in plenty that they do not know how to economize; but before they see the end of this war, we greatly fear that they will have learned the lesson from that hard teacher, necessity. Neither the individual nor the nation know what they can do or suffer until the occasion; that call for noble action and heroic suffering are upon them. We would urge our people to begin now to practise economy, to seek substitutes, not for the army, but for their tables; to change their style of living; to come down to the plainest fare.

When the French army were besieged and blockaded in Genoa, they not only practised economy, but the substitutes adopted for the fare they could not obtain may cause some of our readers nausea to read of.

The subsistence issued from 30th Germinal to 29th Floreal, was daily 12 ounces of bread, 4 ounces of flour of millet seed, with oil or cheese alternately, instead of fresh meat, and a half pint of wine—vin ordinaire.

Fresh meat being exhausted, they substituted horse flesh, "8 onces de viande de cheval."

They made flour from a mixture of cocoa, linseed, oats, beans, rice, starch and bran.

Upon such compounds the French army lived, rather than stain the honour of France by a surrender; but we have honour property, life, all at stake, and for these we, too, if necessary, must eat horse flesh, aye—mule flesh; let us take care of the horses and mules; they may become our "vians de reserve."

We cannot want if we do not waste; we have sufficient for all our necessities, if we will only economize it; and let every man who has land cultivate it in wheat, corn, beans, potatoes, &c. &c., and not let a tobacco plant be found upon his plantation. Look well to the stock; don't eat veal, let it grow to beef; increase the stock of hogs; multiply the poultry; devote time and care to the production of every article that enters into the staff of life. And, above all things, use economically every article of food. The supply of provisions is now nearly exhausted, in some parts of the country, because of the difficulty of transportation for its proper distribution. This, we hope, will be remedied by the Government; but let every garden and "truck patch" be well planted and carefully cultivated. The exempt must cultivate the soil and support the country; the Government will not, and ought not, to permit our army to want provisions. The people must look out for their own support, and they must look out for the support of the army also. The spring is opening, and we hope that all will go to work, digging, ploughing, hoeing and planting, while the army is marching and fighting.

THE ELOPEMENT:A TALE OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES OF AMERICA.

By L. FAIRFAX.

It is only after two years of the most bloody warfare between these contending States, that European nations see the injustice of their previous belief concerning a noble, brave, and Christian people, and this through the realities of war and the agency of incontrovertible facts. But there are many who have not been affected by these, yet who may be readily reached through the easier and more pleasing path of fiction.

The time has at length arrived when a tale intended to sketch one of the causes which have resulted in disastrous conflict, will be received with impartiality. The writer is conscious of labouring in an honest spirit, to overthrow fictions based upon error, by means of a tale having a solid foundation in the truth.--Extracts from Preface.

AMERICA.

The Federal accounts of the engagement at Port Hudson are absurdly conflicting. The telegraph in the hands of the Yankee is the most inconsistent fabricator in the world. It seems that the first intimation of the attack was conveyed to Washington in a telegraphic despatch to Colonel Stager from C. S. Bulkeley, Assistant Superintendent of the Military Telegraph. This communication is dated South-West Pass, Louisiana, March 15, and is an admirable specimen of Federal reports. Mr. Bulkeley says:—"Commodore Farragut, leading in the Hartford, attacked the Port Hudson batteries last night, at 11 o'clock, with his fleet. The steamer Mississippi ran aground, was abandoned, and burnt. The firing on both sides was rapid and severe. The army is within five miles of the enemy's works, in good spirits, and bound to win. Cavalry skirmishes have been the only fighting as yet." Here, it will be observed, there is a marked reticence as to the result of the engagement, except that it is admitted the Mississippi was abandoned and burnt. Mr. Bulkeley did not think the fleet had got past the batteries, or he would have notified it in his message, instead of having to content himself with the flourish about the army being "bound to win." Curiously enough it was rumoured on the 24th of March in New York and Washington, on the information derived from the message we have quoted, that "Commodore Farragut's fleet passed Port Hudson at 11 o'clock on the night of the 14th instant." This is a fair specimen of the way in which military reports are edited by Federal authorities. Next day, the 25th of March, it was officially reported from Washington that the Confederate accounts were confirmed, that the Mississippi was burnt, that the Hartford alone passed Port Hudson, and that the other Federal vessels were driven back. On the 26th of March the New York papers informed their readers that, "The very latest reports from Cairo state that seven of Commodore Farragut's steamers have run the Port Hudson blockade." Perhaps this "very latest" was got up especially for the European steamer, for the telegram dated New York, March 27, informs us, "It is still doubtful how many of Admiral Farragut's vessels passed the Port Hudson batteries;" and the telegram of the 28th of March informs us that "The latest reports from the Mississippi do not mention any other vessels than the Hartford and the Monongahela as having passed Port Hudson." This uncertainty, fourteen days after the engagement, is strong evidence that the Yankees were badly beaten. Though the army was "bound to win," we hear that

"General Banks had fallen back to his fortified camp, and manifested no disposition to advance." The Northern report, that Admiral Farragut's vessels have recaptured the Indianola without resistance, may be true, but requires confirmation. The probability is that they did not capture the Indianola, at all events without resistance.

The news from the Yazoo is described as "contradictory and unintelligible;" but it may be explained by the forced inactivity of the Federal expedition and the necessity of the Federal Government keeping up the spirit of its subjects by reports of an advance. Fort Pemberton has been bombarded by the gunboat Chillicothe without result—which means that the gunboat was repulsed. And the latest advices from Southern sources, via New York, confirm this view, for they state that the Federals were driven back from Fort Pemberton, and were in full retreat from Yazoo Pass. This is an amusing commentary on the Northern assertion we chronicled last week, that the Yazoo expedition was a brilliant success, and that Yazoo City had been captured. The Federals, as usual, heralded the news of a repulse by the announcement of an imaginary triumph.

A Confederate force under General Longstreet has entered Kentucky and taken possession of the towns of Mount Sterling and Danville. General Rosencranz is threatened by a large force, of which it is reported General Joe Johnston will take the command. There is frequent skirmishing at Murfreesboro'. We must wait for the details of the movements before we can judge of their importance; but they cause considerable uneasiness in the North. The Federal commander in Kentucky has published a letter, in which he says:—"The political status of Kentucky is by no means secure, and I deemed it sounder policy to arrest at once the organization of this rebel element before it obtained such impetus, strength, and character, as would demand, six months hence, the exercise of force to retain the State in constitutional obedience."

The following circular, addressed to the consular agents in the Confederate States, has been published in the Richmond papers:—

Department of State, Richmond, Feb. 7.
Sir,—I have again to inform you of the raising of the blockade of two Southern ports by superior forces. This Government is officially informed of the total dispersion and disappearance of the blockading squadron recently stationed off Galveston harbour by the combined attack of land and naval forces of the Confederacy. In this attack the enemy's steamer Harriet Lane was captured, and the flagship of the squadron, the Westfield, was blown up and destroyed. The blockade of the port of Galveston is, therefore, at an end. The armed river boats which raised the blockade at Galveston then proceeded to Sabine Pass, where they again attacked the enemy's blockaders, captured thirteen guns, a large quantity of stores, and a number of prisoners. No blockading fleet now exists off Sabine Pass, and the steamers of the Confederacy were, at the last accounts, cruising off the Pass with no enemy in sight. This information is given for the guidance of such of the merchants of your nation as may desire to trade with either of the open ports of Galveston or Sabine Pass.

Respectfully your obedient servant,
J. P. BENJAMIN, Secretary of State.

Whilst the South is preparing for a long war, and the Southern press declare there is not the slightest prospect of peace, there are signs in the North of dissensions, which may lead to complications that will increase the difficulties of the Yankees in carrying on the war. There is not that unanimous support of the Lincolnites that the Federal Government is striving hard to make the world believe in. A meeting of the Democratic General Committee has been held in New York, at which some resolutions strongly denouncing the policy of the Federal Government, were passed by acclamation. The "loyal leagues" were described as mere jobs. "We denounce the meetings recently got up in this and neighbouring cities, with the money and by the agency of office-holders, or would-be office-holders, under Republican patronage, together with contractors, jobbers, and agents for Government plunder, for the purpose of organising 'loyal leagues.'" The resolutions as to the impolicy of continuing the war were very emphatic. They state "that the masses of the American people throughout this whole land are now offering up their daily and heartfelt prayers for peace, and demanding that this most unnecessary, most ineffectual, most devastating, and most cruel war of modern times shall be brought to a close; that the Government at Washington must, before long, find itself powerless to continue a conflict which the awakened judgment of a Christian and civilised people emphatically condemns, and upon which the displeasure of Heaven would seem to have fallen; that, in order to produce even a seeming and temporary unity of public sentiment at the North in favour of coercive war, it required the suppression of newspapers, the intimidation of the weak, and the lawless imprisonment of brave and consistent tribunes of the people in military bastilles, along with an unexampled profusion of the official favours of a corrupt administration, a lavish distribution of civil and military honours, and the shameless plunder of millions from the public treasury; but now, after two years of this terrible fratricidal struggle, when hundreds of thousands of our best and bravest youth lie in their bloody graves, and the land is filled with mourning and suffering, while bankruptcy and grinding taxation are pressing upon us, and the declared object of the war has long since been lost sight of and abandoned, we recur to the words which Abraham Lincoln uttered on the day of his own ill-omened inauguration, when he said, 'Suppose you go to war? You cannot fight always; and when, after much loss on both sides and no gain to either, you cease fighting, the identical questions are again upon you.' That the policy of war having had a fair trial for two long, miserable, bloody years, and having failed to bring us, to all appearance, a single step nearer to the restoration of the Union, the people insist that a policy of peace should now be undertaken and attempted; and that a convention should be called, as contemplated and provided for in such exigencies by the Constitution of the United States, at which convention all the States which were adhering to the Union on the 1st day of November, 1860, should be invited to be represented by delegates elected from their people, and that such convention should be held at the earliest possible day, for the purpose of devising means for a reconstruction of the American Union and the restoration of peace."

Nothing stronger can well be said in favour of a termination of hostilities, and the resolutions we have quoted are noteworthy as the first out-spoken protest of the Democratic party against the so-called war-democrats. John Van Buren and James Brady were condemned as recreants from their party, and a mass meeting of the Democracy was called for the 3rd of April.

Not only is the Democracy of the State of New York opposed to the Government, but the Democratic members of the Indiana Legislature have issued a manifesto to the people of that State, complaining of the injudicious measures adopted for the suppression of the rebellion and of the despotic conduct of the Administration, and the Federal Government is so alarmed that it has ordered a seizure of all the arms in the possession of the citizens of Indiana.

Further, the Federal Government has prohibited the public sale of arms in Cincinnati.

Such facts as these, and there are many of them known, and many more, we may be sure, kept from the public, dispose of the ravings of the paid agents of the Lincolnites about the unity and war fervour of the North.

It is reported in New York—not for the first time—that the Confederates are about to abandon Richmond as their capital. If they do so, it will not, at all events, be from any fear of the Federals taking that city.

The difficulties of the Federal Government are increasing. We are informed that since the beginning of the war there have been 130,000 deserters from the Northern army, and the new levees have to be taken to camp as prisoners. Then, again, there is the negro dispute. The Northern soldiers, in many instances, refuse to fight with the impressed negroes. According to the Portland (Maine) Argus, there is complete insubordination on Ship Island, in consequence of the negro soldiers and officers there. "One of these drew a pistol on a white soldier, and the negro officer was found the next day in the drink with too much water in him; and others may go the same way." The Newburyport (Massachusetts) Herald says:—"A disorderly spirit is reported to prevail among the Federal troops at Ship Island, in consequence of the arrival of a coloured regiment. The whites will not associate or act with the negroes. If the negro is the only saviour of the country, they would say, 'We'll not be saved then.' Indeed, the negro is getting rather badly off. The New Jersey Assembly, by a vote of 33 to 19, has passed an Act for the imprisonment and transportation of every free negro who shall hereafter come into the State and remain ten days. Perhaps, under these circumstances, we ought to regard the drowning of a few hundreds of the helpless negroes by cutting the levees as a humane proceeding. The strikes for higher wages have lately been embittered by the Erie Railway Company employing negroes, who were driven from their work, and would have been badly used but for the interference of a guard. The negro must not come near the free North, and the best thing his warm friend General Hunter offers him is garrison duty in peculiarly unhealthy stations. The Christian philanthropist may well feel devoutly thankful that there is not the most distant prospect of the negroes falling under the dominion of the Yankees, and that only a small per-centage of them are likely to suffer from Yankee hatred.

The Lincolnite faction is sparing no pains to increase the ill-will towards this country. The New York Times calls upon the Administration, "if it have a drop of American blood in its veins," to issue letters of marque against English merchantmen if another pirate leave our shores; though, by the way, it has been decided that a bond given to a Confederate officer for vessel and cargo must be held valid in the Federal courts. Meantime, the Confederate vessels continue to play havoc with the Yankee merchantmen. Much excitement is "got up" in New York because the Florida arrived at Barbadoes "in distress" and was allowed to repair damages and to coal. According to Northern reports Captain Mallit had an ovation, and was loudly cheered by the negroes as well as the white people. The negroes are evidently not such fools as the Yankees think them. The Federal representative, Mr. Trowbridge, is reported to have had an interview with the Governor, and said:—"My Lord, I hereby, in the name of the President of the United States of America, warn you from supplying or permitting any of your people aiding and abetting the rebels. My voice is raised without power to back it; but the consequences will one day or other show themselves to the British Government. Calling upon all loyal citizens to take notice of my declaration, my lord, I take my departure." The Florida, after leaving Barbadoes, is reported to have burnt three vessels. One of the vessels was a valuable guano ship. The Florida was chased by a Federal war ship, but the Federal commander was too discreet "to catch a Tartar."

Admiral Wilkes, who is a very discreet bully, and knows how to eat humble-pie when he is opposed by any force that may give him trouble, threatened, about the 16th of March, to seize the Aries and another vessel, if they left the Port of St. Thomas. The captain of the Aries applied to the British steamer Phaeton for protection, which was granted. Upon this Admiral Wilkes sailed out of the port in the Vanderbilt, to which he has transferred his flag. The threatened ships left the port under the convoy of the Phaeton. The commander of the Phaeton is reported to have communicated with Admiral Wilkes respecting the capture of the Peterhoff. The Peterhoff has arrived at New York.

The Confederate steamer Parallel has been burnt to prevent her falling into the hands of the Federals, and the British steamer Nicholas has been captured in endeavouring to run the Wilmington blockade.

The Federal General Sumner is dead.

There has been a further decline of gold at New York, "not justified by any cause within cognizance of the public." On the 28th gold was 42½ per cent. premium, and fluctuating hourly. The Times of yesterday thus refers to the reaction:—

The private commercial advices to-day from New York contain the important statement that two well-known merchants, one from Boston and one from New York, have been commissioned by the Washington Government to proceed to London on financial business. The former sailed from Boston by the steamer which arrived last week, and the latter was to sail in the present steamer, the Australasian. It was understood that they are instructed to dispose of £2,000,000 of six per cent. bonds, with which they are furnished, and that they also have authority to negotiate a further sum of £10,000,000 to £20,000,000. With regard to this it is remarked, 'If Englishmen know the feeling that is entertained towards them here and at the East and West, it is not very likely they will buy a single bond.' The Commissioners in question are expected, it is also said, to employ part of the £2,000,000, of which they are instructed positively to dispose, by buying up 'the gun-boats now building in England for the rebels,' a device which seems to have excited great admiration and confidence among the mercantile community of New York. These circumstances, which had been assumed almost as accomplished facts by the ignorant and credulous multitude, will, in a great degree, account for the fall in the premium on gold, especially as the Government had made a general effort through the press to strengthen the chances of the proposed loan negotiations by simultaneous representations in all parts of the Union that the war is now undoubtedly to be brought to a close forthwith. A late 'report' from Cairo, contradicting the official news received the previous afternoon of the repulse of the Federal fleet at Port Hudson, is thought to have been created as part of this arrangement just in time for the present steamer. Sanguine predictions were put forth that the premium on gold would decline to 40, and then to 20, if Vicksburg should be captured, but in better informed circles the opinion is evidently prevalent that before July next it will be higher than ever. Very little gold, it is said, is coming into New York, either from the country or from California, so that the shipments to Europe on their present scale will soon absorb all the available stock. That they will continue large is rendered certain by the fact that at the present quotation of exchange every article of produce is too high to ship to Europe at a profit. The total exportation of specie from the 1st of January had already amounted to £2,820,000 against £1,600,000 in the corresponding period of last year. This is apart from the amounts now sent direct to England from San Francisco, and the recent magnitude of which will help to account for the reaction in the premium on gold at New York, since they lessen the pressure of the demand at that point.

The fall in gold has caused a panic in all the markets.

ENGLAND.

According to the returns of the Poor-law Board, there is again an increase in the number of paupers in the manufacturing districts. But Mr. Farnall, in his report to the Manchester Executive Committee, states that serious errors have been committed in regard to these returns; and the figures which he gives show a considerable decrease. We cannot pretend to explain the discrepancy. This only is certain, that there has been no material amendment in the prospects of the cotton trade, or in the condition of the operatives; and that no one seems to entertain any hopes of such amendment, while the present war continues. The promises of an abundant supply of cotton from India have proved altogether deceptive; and it is to be feared that there will be no more mills opened this year than last. Under these circumstances, the resource of emigration naturally engages the thoughts of the operatives. Many of the colonies are not only willing but anxious to receive them; and already one hundred persons have left for Queensland, Australia, at the expense of the Colonial Government. They may not be the best possible colonists; but it is probable that their intellectual aptitude and high character will more than compensate their inexperience of out-door labour. The returns of the revenue for the years 1861-62, and 1862-63, have been laid before the country. There is a marked falling-off in the Excise, which is the most sure test of the general prosperity of the people. The income-tax is as yet little affected by the cotton famine and the interruption of American trade; but this is owing, not to any compensation for the losses sustained thereby, but to the peculiar method in which the tax is levied on those incomes included in Schedule D. During the financial year now closed, merchants have been paying on the profits of a Triennium, including 1859 and 1860—two of the most prosperous years which the cotton trade had ever known. We expect that next year there will be a serious falling-off. The following comparative tables are worth examination:

	Year ended March 31, 1862.	Year ended March 31, 1863.
Excise	18,332,000	17,155,000
Stamps	8,599,945	8,994,000
Taxes	3,160,000	3,150,000
Property Tax	10,365,000	10,567,000
Post Office	3,510,000	3,650,000
Crown Lands	295,000	300,000
Miscellaneous	1,747,534	2,753,561
Totals	£69,674,479	£70,603,561

The Customs increase, as usual; the cessation of the cotton supply not much affecting them. For Customs duties are levied chiefly either on the luxuries of the rich, or on those great articles of general consumption which, next to bread, are treated by the poor as necessaries—on tea, coffee, sugar, and tobacco. The consumption of articles paying duty at the Customs is, therefore, little affected by distress. The Excise, falling on the luxuries of the poor, and chiefly on beer and spirits, is immediately reduced by any serious reduction in the means of the working classes. Grumblers attribute the increase in the yield of the income tax rather to extortion than to prosperity. The Economist notes that it is due merely to the unusual deficiency in the collection of the quarter ending March 31, 1862; and the Economist is generally right on a question of this kind. The increase in the Miscellaneous revenue exceeds the whole net increase. But for this there would have been an inconsiderable falling off; and it is necessary to remark that this increase is never more than incidental, and in the present case is merely a matter of account; £730,000 of Indian repayments being included in the accounts of this year (on both sides) which has been hitherto omitted. In the real revenue, therefore, there has this year been no increase.

The following is the comparison between Mr. Gladstone's estimates and the actual result:—

	Estimates.	Actual Income.	Excess.	Deficiency.
	£	£	£	£
Customs	23,550,000	24,034,000	484,000	—
Excise	18,340,000	17,155,000	—	1,185,000
Stamps	8,625,000	8,994,000	369,000	—
Taxes	3,180,000	3,150,000	—	30,000
Income Tax	10,100,000	10,567,000	467,000	—
Post Office	3,650,000	3,650,000	—	—
Crown Lands	300,000	300,000	—	—
Miscellaneous	2,445,000	2,753,000	308,000	—
Totals	70,190,000	70,603,000	1,628,000	1,215,000

The two points noticeable in this table are, first, that Mr. Gladstone under-estimated the probable yield of the Customs under the working of his new system; and, secondly, that the deficiency in the Excise justifies the gloomy vaticinations of his opponents, who warned him that he must expect a serious falling-off in this direction. But Mr. Gladstone may fairly congratulate himself that, in one of the most trying years the country has ever known he has contrived to restore the balance between income and expenditure; and may rightfully claim credit on this account for the successful working of the financial policy inaugurated by him in 1860.

The following remarks from the Economist, on the financial prospects of next year, deserve attention:—

There is no doubt that our finance is in a satisfactory state. Our real revenue has been .. £70,603,561
Our estimated expenditure was .. 70,040,000

Surplus £563,561

If we have not spent more money than we intended. This is not the surplus, as our readers well know, on which Mr. Gladstone has to operate. This is what we may call the historical surplus,—that which is the result of the actual accounts of last year. The surplus on which we remit taxation is the anticipated surplus of next year. We say we are going to expend such moneys next year; we must have these moneys, and a fair surplus over; if our existing revenue gives more than that fair surplus, we reduce taxation. Now, the Army and Navy Estimates are together £2,000,000 less than they were last year, and £500,000 for the old Chinese war will not be required now. If we calculate on the same revenue this year as last, the account will stand:—

Anticipated revenue £70,603,000
Anticipated expenditure 67,504,000

Surplus of next year £3,063,000

But it may be as well to observe that there is an Exchequer bond for £1,000,000, payable on the 8th of May next, which should not now be renewed if it is ever to be paid, and which the public balance may not suffice to pay without intrenching on the surplus of the year.

The annual field-day of the Volunteers at Brighton came off with exceeding success on Easter Monday. The spectators always complain on such occasions—first because they cannot see; and secondly, because they cannot understand what is going on. But as the object is not to amuse a holiday-making crowd, but to supplement the training and display the efficiency of the Volunteers, such grumbling is of little consequence. Last Monday the spectators were permitted to be very troublesome, crowding upon the regiments as they passed the general in command, and not a little impeding their movements, and marring the effect of their discipline and good order. The day was spent, after the ceremony of marching past was over, in a general sham fight, in which the Volunteers acquitted themselves with great spirit and skill, and went through the complicated manœuvres in a manner which would have done credit to any regiment of the line. The Inns of Court, (composed of lawyers and law students, and familiarly called the Devil's Own), attracted the especial approval and admiration of the general in command. After all, gentlemen and men of education make better soldiers, as well as more useful citizens than others—it would be shame to them if they did not.

Lord Palmerston has made some more speeches in Scotland, and enjoyed a continuous ovation throughout his journey. It would be difficult to find a subject on which Lord Palmerston would not be heard with pleasure, or a place in which he would not be received with enthusiasm. And yet he is not a brilliant speaker, and, if it were not for his personal reputation, would be altogether eclipsed as an orator by any one of the five or six foremost of Parliamentary speakers. It is first to the extraordinary popularity achieved by his personal character and political conduct, and secondly to his quick appreciation of and sympathy with the temper of his audience, that he owes his wonderful success as an orator, both in and out of the House of Commons.

Her Royal Highness the Princess Alice (Princess Louis of Hesse) gave birth to a daughter at Windsor Castle, on Easter Sunday, at 5 in the morning. The medical bulletins reported favourably of the health of her Royal Highness and her child.

About noon, on Sunday, Mr. E. Morgan, one of the Customs' surveyors, acting under instructions from the Board of Commissioners, went on board the small wood-built screw steamer Alexandra, recently launched from the building-yard of Messrs. Miller and Sons, and now being fitted for sea in the Tockth Dock. No official intimation was made by the officer as to the grounds on which he acted. He merely went on board, marked a "broad arrow" on one of the masts, and remained on board, keeping the vessel under surveillance. No official reason had been intimated as to why the Alexandra had been put or was kept under surveillance, but it was believed to be in consequence of information communicated to the authorities that she is built as a gunboat, and is meant for the American Confederate Government. She is a fine, tidy-looking craft of 265 tons builders' measurement, is nicely coppered and copper fastened, and presents the appearance of possessing great speed and comparatively considerable power. It is said that a legal investigation will be immediately made into the circumstances connected with the building and outfit of the vessel. It may be worth mentioning that the Alexandra has no gunports, has no magazine, and is not provided with a shellroom, or any other similar arrangement ordinarily pertaining to a war ship, and has no engines on board. In short, she presents merely the appearance of a fast schooner-rigged steam yacht.

A meeting of the friends and admirers of President Lincoln and General Butler was held at Manchester on Monday evening. It was addressed by four gentlemen, all notorious in their way as advocates of ideas which the English nation regards with abhorrence, and which most sane men and all sober statesmen treat with profound contempt. There was Mr. Goldwin Smith, who advocates the abandonment of Canada and the cession of Gibraltar. There was Mr. Samuel Pope, the champion of the Maine Liquor Law. There was Professor Newman, chiefly known by certain scholarly and sentimental works against Christianity. These three gentlemen spoke, on the whole, in the ordinary language of respectable English Radicals. But of argument there was an amazing lack, and denunciation had to supply the void. Mr. George Thompson, chartist agitator, denounced the Alabama and her country in the style of Sumner and Cassius M. Clay, and spoke of the Southern leaders as "that felonious and traitorous conspiracy that for the present rules despotically the so-called Confederate States." Yet his respectable associates did not protest or withdraw. Abolitionism, like misery, makes men acquainted with strange bed-fellows.

Class 3 of the civil service estimates, published on Tuesday, shows a net increase of £17,053 on the estimates for law and justice—that is, the maintenance of law courts, salaries to public officials connected with them, &c., and the expense of prison and convict services at home and abroad; the total of the vote for last year having been £2,763,808, and the estimate for next year being £2,780,841. The estimate for England is £928,038 (last year £901,573); for Scotland, £134,738 (last year £136,310); and Ireland, £905,131 (last year £957,218), while prison and convict services are to cost £812,434 (last year £768,207). In addition, the following sums connected with law and justice are chargeable on the Consolidated Fund:—England, £129,411; Scotland, £111,716; and Ireland, £149,126—total, £690,253, which makes the total expenditure for this branch of the public service amount to £3,470,594.

EUROPE.

The Courrier du Dimanche, a Paris weekly newspaper of considerable reputation, as well for its ability as its want of favour with the Ministry of the Interior, has published, in a French translation, a despatch addressed by Earl Russell to Lord Napier, urging upon the Russian Government concessions to Poland, and the circular to the English diplomatic agents at foreign courts, instructing them to communicate the despatch to the Courts to which they were respectively accredited, and urge them to address notes to the same effect to St. Petersburg. The version of the Courrier du Dimanche appears to be correct. The organs of the English Government have reprinted it without suggesting any doubt of its genuineness. Earl Russell commences by expressing the concern with which her Majesty's Government view events in Poland; he points out that, although the suppression of the insurrection is the natural and probable result of the struggle, still it will only be obtained by a deplorable effusion of blood and material calamities of every description, the effect of which would make themselves felt for many years to come, and must breed feelings of hatred which will embitter the future relations of the Russian Government with Poland. Nevertheless, his Lordship goes on to say her Majesty's Government would not have deemed it advisable to express officially their views upon the subject, if special circumstances had not placed them with regard to Poland in an exceptional position. His Lordship then refers to the treaties of Vienna, and the engagements made by Russia. Great Britain, he says, as a party to these treaties, and deeply interested in the peace of Europe, considers herself justified in making known her opinion on the events of which Poland has been the scene, and does so with the most friendly disposition towards Russia, and the sincere wish to contribute to what may be most advantageous to all the parties interested. "Why should not his Imperial Majesty, whose benevolent intentions are universally known, put an end, once for all, to this sanguinary struggle, by generously proclaiming an immediate and complete amnesty, and announcing his intention to restore, without delay, to the kingdom of Poland the civil and political privileges granted by the Emperor Alexander, according to the stipulations of the treaties of 1815? A diet and a national administration would very probably content the Poles, and at the same time give satisfaction to public opinion throughout Europe." Earl Russell's despatch is dated the 2nd of March, and his circular the 4th of March.

The excellence of the Foreign Secretary's intentions will be generally admitted; and the mode in which he has urged concessions upon Russia is conciliatory enough. But we fear that no hope can be entertained that Russia will yet make concessions which she will esteem so great; whilst it is quite certain that the Poles would not be satisfied with concessions they would deem so small. Indeed, as the strength of the insurrection at the present moment lies in Lithuania, it can scarcely be expected that the promise of national institutions to Congress Poland would allay it. The Poles have taken care to declare that they will be content with nothing less than the independence of the whole of those parts of Poland which are in the possession of Russia. They will have to yield; but no promise of national institutions will hasten the surrender. The concession of national institutions when the insurrection is completely overcome may conciliate the Poles, because they will then have every reason to believe in the sincerity of the offer.

France has not been idle in this Polish business. The Emperor, who seems with reason to attach much importance to the co-operation of Austria, has at last succeeded in obtaining the despatch from that Court of a note identical with those despatched from Paris and London, apparently differing somewhat from the original note of the 2nd of March, summarised above. The exceptional relation of Austria to the Polish question seems to have rendered the arrival at this understanding a matter of considerable difficulty. Still the weight of her co-operation will amply repay the trouble spent in procuring it; and (if diplomacy can profit the Poles at all) the identical notes of Austria, France, and England are the most efficacious instruments which it can employ.

There is no intelligence from Poland which is at the same time reliable and important. Two important announcements have been made—the one from Warsaw and the other from Cracow—but although each may possibly be true, neither is deserving of credit. From Warsaw via Danzig came the story that a body of insurgents had disbanded by the direction of the Warsaw Revolutionary Committee, which had come to the conclusion that it was useless to continue the struggle, and that by the order of the same Committee the recruiting agents of the revolution had ceased enlistments. This would have been good news indeed, inasmuch as no one can now believe in the success of the insurgents, and a continuance of the struggle will be so much wanton butchery; but it was very improbable in itself, as the revolutionary leaders still hope for something from foreign intervention, and the men who have taken arms have so little confidence in Russia that they will only give up the struggle with their lives. The statement has been vehemently denied, and the contradiction, no doubt, deserves acceptance.

The other piece of information comes from Cracow. According to telegrams from that city, an insurrection has broken out throughout Samogitia from Poniewiez to Polangen on the Baltic, in which the peasantry, nobility, and middle classes have joined en masse. Prussia, alarmed at the outbreak, sent troops to Memel, and Russia sent a regiment of the Imperial Guard from St. Petersburg to Riga. This statement may, as we have said, be true, but the quarter from which it comes is not worthy of much credit. Cracow is at the extreme south-west of the kingdom of Poland. Samogitia, to adopt the ancient name, is a province which borders the extreme north-east of the kingdom. Is it credible that we should first have this intelligence from Cracow when the frontier of Eastern Prussia borders the provinces said to be in insurrection; and is it moreover likely that they would know at Cracow that a regiment had been despatched from St. Petersburg to Riga, a place which assuredly has little or no communication with Cracow? The truth, we may safely say, is that the whole story is an invention of the ardent patriots of Cracow, to induce Europe to believe that the insurrection is still making progress.

It is quite true that there is discontent in the Government of Kowno, and that in Lithuania generally a kind of partisan warfare is carried on, but the statement that a revolution en masse of the whole population is a gross fiction. In the South-east several bands still make head against the Russians. This kind of warfare will go on for a long time.

A telegram from Breslau announces that great agitation prevailed in Kalisch—on the frontier of Posen—on account of the approach of the insurgents. If this news be true, the insurgents must be in considerable force in this district, as Kalisch is the capital of the district of that name, and is held by a large Russian garrison.

The nobility of the Government of St. Petersburg have voted unanimously an address to the Emperor, in which they express their devotion to him, their indignation at the pretensions put forward to Russian territory, and their resolution not to shrink from any sacrifices to preserve the integrity of the Empire. An address like this has, of course, very little significance. It may have been a genuine expression of feeling—it may just as likely have been made to order.

An attempt of the Polish refugees here to succour their countrymen has failed. It seems that, in spite of the provisions of the Foreign Enlistment Act, the Poles, aided and assisted, it may be safely asserted, by some of the persons who complain most loudly of the equipment of the Alabama, hired a steamer belonging to the Hartlepool Steam Navigation Company, the Ward Jackson, and that about two hundred of them, with a large cargo of arms supplied by the contributions of the committee of which Mr. Stuart Mill is a member, got clear from this country on their way to some point—we must suppose, on the Baltic coast, in the province of Wilna. Somehow or other the English crew left the vessel. One statement given is that they abandoned her on account of the neighbourhood of Russian cruisers, and the vessel was carried into Malmo, where the Swedish Government laid an embargo upon her. And so has ended the expedition.

At last the sanguine navigators upon the dreary Schleswig-Holstein sea fancy that they catch a glimpse of land. It may be but another mirage which gladdens their eyes, but there is this circumstance, at least, in favour of their assumption, that the ship is decidedly put in the right course. The King of Denmark has issued a proclamation in which he abandons all attempts to establish a common constitution, and accepts the Eyder-Danish programme. Referring to his proclamation of January, 1852, in which he announced his intention to combine the different provinces of the Monarchy by means of a common constitution into one single well-regulated state, he points out that all his attempts to effect that object have failed through the interference of the Federal Diet in the internal affairs of the Monarchy, and their persistence in putting forward demands incompatible with the independence of the Crown and the privileges of provinces with which the Diet could have no concern. The States of Holstein have rejected every proposition for the establishment of a common constitution based upon common representation. This discord has, for ten years, paralyzed the independence of the kingdom, and the King, therefore, considers it his duty to settle the position of Holstein to the monarchy in accordance with his Federal duties. That position is an isolated and independent one. In future the King of Denmark will govern Holstein as its Duke, without any reference to his Danish Ministers or his Danish Parliament. Holstein is to have its own army, to be regulated by the Duke and the Estates. It is to contribute a proportional sum to the normal budget for the public debt, the navy and the foreign department; to contribute and receive, in a fixed proportion, for customs, ports, telegraphs, and to grant or refuse, as it pleases, any additional sums which the exigencies of the Government may compel it to ask. The Duke of Holstein will govern the duchy, not from Copenhagen, but Itzehoe, in conjunction with the Estates of the Duchy. Its position towards Denmark and the German Diet is to approach, as nearly as possible, to that of Luxembourg towards Holland and the Diet. This, at least, is what the King, in his proclamation, promises.

It seems a radical settlement of the difficulty, and would undoubtedly at once prove so, if the professed aims of Holstein and of the German Diet were their real ones. It gives Holstein and the Federal Diet more than they have the right to ask, or have ventured to ask, but not what they have desired. The object of the Holsteiners has been to renew the old connexion with Schleswig, and to obtain a veto over the whole policy of the Danish Government. The object of the German Powers has been to weaken, or, as the King puts it, to paralyze Denmark by sustaining these demands. They have together prevented the King from fulfilling his promise of giving a common constitution, by refusing every proposal which did not give to Holstein, Lauenberg, or Schleswig this right of veto, and consequently establish the rule of the German Powers over Denmark; and now that the King, yielding to force, admits the full power of the Diet to determine his position to Holstein, they will insist upon the common constitution, which they know cannot be granted, and revive the pretension to a union with Schleswig, the invalidity of which they have solemnly acknowledged. Fortunately Prussia, the chief agent in this most disgraceful conspiracy, is not now in a position to interfere with Denmark, and if the Danish Government pursues resolutely the policy it has inaugurated, we may hope that it will settle the question. No doubt the separation of Holstein from the rest of the monarchy involves a sacrifice which so small a state can ill bear. No doubt, too, the danger of a conflict is incurred, but the question imperatively demanded a settlement; and as the sacrifice puts the right entirely upon the side of Denmark, we may hope that the conflict will be averted, or that it will result in a signal triumph of Danish policy.

Again a hitch about the throne of Greece. It seems that the consent of Prince Christian to the candidature of his son was not an absolute one. He assented generally, but reserved to himself the right to consider the matter at his leisure in Germany. Upon that consideration he formulated certain conditions, to which it is said the English Government is unable to give its consent, and so the matter at present stands. The Danes seem disposed to make some political capital out of the matter. The Dagbladet insists that as Denmark will lose by the elevation of Prince William to the Greek throne one of the heirs to the Danish throne, she has a right to ask as the consideration of her consent a guarantee from the Great Powers for the integrity of the Monarchy and, in point of fact, a settlement of the Schleswig question according to her own views. This is, however, asking a great deal too much, as the Danish Government, if it should be ill advised enough to make the demand, will find to its cost. It has a right to insist upon an arrangement which will give it back to Prince William if other heirs to the throne fail. More than this, it has no business to claim.

The Sultan has arrived at Alexandria. Troubles are brewing between him and his tributaries. The three principalities of the Danube are in a ferment which must soon lead to an explosion; and his Majesty, with a providence somewhat foreign to Mussulmans, intends to strengthen himself for the conflict by borrowing money from the Giaour.

THE EAST.

The telegraph brings very unsatisfactory news from the East. The Imperial forces have sustained a severe defeat in the neighbourhood of Shanghai, and the defence of that port, we may presume, will now devolve upon the British forces in China. The Japanese have blown up the house of the British Legation at Jeddo—about the third or fourth notice they have given it to quit. This will bring affairs to a crisis. The British Government must either withdraw its Minister and Consuls, or take some violent measures to ensure the protection of its representatives.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, April 8.

Our cotton market this week has exhibited no new feature of interest, and with a fair trade demand from day to day prices show no variation from our last quotations.

On Thursday the sales reached 7,000 bales at steady prices; on Saturday, the day after Good Friday, the market was closed. The business done on Monday was again to a fair extent, the sales reaching 8,000 bales without change. Yesterday, in sympathy with Manchester, our market was quiet, with sales of 4,000 bales. To-day, 6,000 bales have been sold at steady prices, and we quote Middling Orleans 22d., and Fair Dhollerah and Omrawuttee 17½d.

The accounts of the Indian cotton crop received by last mail are very discouraging; it was generally believed that the shipments to England from Bombay this year will not exceed those of last, whilst, from the lateness of the crop, less cotton than usual will be shipped before the monsoon, and a larger proportion come forward in the latter half of the year. The first arrivals of Omrawuttee cotton were very inferior, much stained and discoloured through late rains.

A continued good business was still doing in the Indian goods and yarn markets by latest advices, and prices were again higher.

These accounts give confidence in Manchester, and spinners getting a ready sale for their yarns, have been induced to buy more freely here, their consumption of cotton is now on the increase.

MANCHESTER, April 7.

Although the amount of business done in yarn and cloth during the past week has not been quite so large as during the previous week, still it has been of considerable extent, and quite of a legitimate character, speculators keeping entirely out of the market.

India qualities have been the principal staples inquired for, and the extreme rates of last week were paid for them readily.

Spinners of Nos. 40s, 50s, and 60s, mule yarns in bundle are now pretty well in order, which will find work for some mills for three months to come, and such is the favourable tenor of the India advices as regards these sorts, that shippers are offering orders at such prices as are inducing more mills to commence running again.

The Bolton spinners of from Nos. 60s upwards, are also well in order, spinning for manufacturers of India jaconets and green end mulls, at very good prices.

Blackburn descriptions of yarns, such as Nos. 32s to 50s twist and pincops, are in steady demand, and for which extreme prices are paid.

In cloth the demand is principally for 6lbs., 7lbs., and 8½lbs., shirtings, also jaconets and mulls for shipment to India, the lighter weights being now made to order, as stocks have been pretty well cleared off lately.

To-day our market has been very steady, although very little business has been transacted, owing, in a great measure, to spinners and manufacturers having sold freely the last three weeks, and not feeling much inclined to enter into further transactions for the present.

Altogether our market may be said to be in a much more healthy state than has been the case for many months past.

THE CASE OF THE PETERHOFF.

The following correspondence on the seizure of the Peterhoff by Admiral Wilkes has been published:—

London, March 26, 1863.

My Lord,—A few months back my firm made arrangements for despatching a line of steamers between this country and Matamoras, in Mexico, and advertisements have appeared in the daily papers for freight by such vessels.

The first vessel despatched was the Gipsy Queen, which vessel has made the voyage out and home without any interruption.

The second vessel despatched was the ship Peterhoff. She left this port on the 7th day of January last, with a general cargo, containing, however, nothing contraband, and having a regular British and Mexican clearance, and carrying her Majesty's mail, as well as despatches for the Mexican Consul. She was to call at St. Thomas for coals.

On the 21st of February last, and when within three miles of St. Thomas, the Peterhoff was boarded by an officer from the Federal war steamer Alabama, who, after examining the ship's papers, left the vessel, having expressed himself perfectly satisfied.

The Peterhoff coaled at St. Thomas, and left on the 25th of February.

By advices received by the West India mail, just arrived, I am informed that on the Peterhoff leaving St. Thomas, and when within sight of the port, the Federal war steamer Vanderbilt hove in sight, and, having communicated with Admiral Wilkes, went in chase of and stopped the Peterhoff, putting an armed crew on board.

By advices received from the United States to-day I learn that the Peterhoff has been taken to Key West for adjudication as a prize.

I hold myself at your Lordship's disposal to submit the manifest of the Peterhoff's cargo and any other documents which your Lordship may desire to see in proof of the above facts.

A third vessel, the steamer Sea Queen, is nearly loaded and about proceeding to Matamoras, and a fourth vessel will shortly commence loading, cargo having been already engaged.

It is scarcely necessary to point out to your Lordship the illegality of the capture and the unwarrantable proceedings of the United States' officers.

I hasten to bring the subject before your Lordship, with a view of soliciting the intervention of her Majesty's Government in taking the requisite steps to ensure the immediate restoration of the Peterhoff, with such damages as the owners of that vessel have sustained.

I also avail myself of this opportunity to ask your Lordship to take whatever measures may be requisite to prevent a repetition of such a proceeding by the United States' officers, in order that the mercantile community of this country may be assured their property and interests will not be subjected to similar consequences, and as the owner of the Sea Queen, about to sail, having come under engagement with the shippers of cargo, I trust your Lordship will not consider I am asking too much in soliciting your Lordship's assurance that the ship and cargo will receive due protection from her Majesty's Government.

I have the honour to be,

Your Lordship's obedient servant,

JOSEPH SPENCE,

Of the firm of Pile, Spence, and Co.
To the Right Hon. the Earl Russell, her Majesty's
Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

Foreign Office, March 26, 1863.

Sir,—I am directed by Earl Russell to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of this day respecting the capture, by the United States' steamer Vanderbilt, of your steamer Peterhoff, on her voyage from this country to Matamoras; and I am to acquaint you that the matter will have his Lordship's immediate attention; but, as it will be necessary to lay before the law officers of the Crown the fullest details respecting the case of the vessel, I am to request that you will immediately forward to me every document in your possession throwing light upon the destination and cargo of the vessel, her voyage and capture, including any reports or protests made by her master. To save time these documents may be forwarded to me in original, and I will afterwards request you to furnish me with copies of such of them as it may be necessary to retain for the records of this office.

I am, Sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

E. HAMMOND.

J. Spence, Esq., 2, Cowper's-court, Cornhill.

2, Cowper's-court, Cornhill, E.C., March 27.

Sir,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of yesterday, and in reply beg to enclose the following documents relating to the Peterhoff steamer, the subject of my communication of yesterday:—

1. Copy agreement, dated the 27th of October, 1862.
2. Advertisements for cargo which appeared in the Times and Shipping Gazette.
3. Certified copy manifest of the cargo of the Peterhoff.
4. File of bills of lading of cargo.
5. Four original policies of insurance on Peterhoff from London to Matamoras, and back to Liverpool.
6. Copy private instructions from myself to Captain Jarman, master of the Peterhoff.
7. Original letter from Captain Jarman to Messrs. Pile, Spence, and Co., dated St. Thomas, the 24th of February, 1863.
8. Extract of letter from Messrs. Lamb, Ball, and Co., St. Thomas, dated the 2nd of March, 1863.
9. Extract of advice from Lloyd's agent at Key West, to Lloyd's, London.

With reference to your inquiry for reports and protest by the master of the Peterhoff, I beg to say that no communication has been received from him since his above letter of the 24th of February, when he was about leaving St. Thomas, and for the reason that there has not been at present sufficient time for him to communicate with England. There cannot, however, be any doubt of the fact of the Peterhoff having been captured by the United States' naval officers at St. Thomas, for we learn from Captain Weller, of the West India mail steamer La Plata, recently arrived at Southampton, that he was an eye-witness to the capture, and herewith you will find extract of a private letter from Captain Weller to Captain Wake.

In conclusion, I would add that I have made application to the Mexican Consul for a certificate of the due clearance by him of the Peterhoff for Matamoras, but owing to his absence from town till Monday I am unable to procure it until then.

I have the honour to be, Sir, your most obedient servant,
E. Hammond, Esq. JOSEPH SPENCE.

2, Cowper's-court, Cornhill, March 28, 1863.

Sir,—Referring to what passed in the conversation I had with you yesterday relating to the Peterhoff steamer, I now enclose the Liverpool Journal of Commerce of the 24th inst., containing a note of the extraordinary judgment pronounced by the United States' Prize Court at Key West, in the case of the Adele steamer, and which entitles me, I think, to ask the Government to relieve me from the certainty of a similar result.

In this paper you will also find a statement of the circumstances attending the capture of the Magicienne steamer by the United States' vessel of war Onward, apparently identical with the Peterhoff's capture, and which, in my humble judgment, renders it incumbent on her Majesty's Government to take immediate steps to prevent a continuance of the extraordinary course which the United States' naval officers appear determined to adopt in all such cases.

I have the honour to be, &c.,

E. Hammond, Esq.

JOSEPH SPENCE.

Foreign-office, March 28, 1863.

Sir,—I have laid before Earl Russell your letter of this day's date, enclosing a letter containing a report respecting the decision of the Admiralty Court at Key West, in the case of the Adele, and I am bound to state to you that the same shall be referred to the law officers of the Crown for their consideration, with the other papers now before them in the case of the Peterhoff.

I am, Sir, your most obedient and humble servant,

E. HAMMOND.

Joseph Spence, Esq., 2, Cowper's-court, Cornhill.

2, Cowper's-court, Cornhill, E.C., March 30, 1863.

My Lord,—Referring to my previous communication on the subject of the Peterhoff (steamer), I have now the honour of enclosing copies of the following documents:—

- No. 1. Letter from Captain Jarman, master of the Peterhoff, to Messrs. Pile, Spence, and Co., dated Key West, March 7, 1863.
- No. 2. Copy of letter from Captain Jarman to Mr. Gerard, dated Key West, March 7, 1863.
- No. 3. Copy of letter to me from Mr. Gerard, dated New York, March 7, 1863.
- No. 4. Letter from Mr. Redgate and Mr. Brandon, passengers in the Peterhoff, to Messrs. Hird, Mundella, Smith, and Co., of London, shippers of cargo per Peterhoff.
- No. 5. Letter from Samuel J. Redgate to Captain Halsted, secretary of Lloyd's, in London, dated Key West, March 7, 1863.
- No. 6. Official report of Mr. Redgate to the secretary of Lloyd's, detailing the circumstances attending the capture of the Peterhoff.

These documents, your Lordship will observe, while they more than confirm the facts already communicated respecting the seizure of the Peterhoff, disclose a conviction on the part of the officer in command of the Vanderbilt (steamer) that his proceedings were altogether unjustifiable, and that to Admiral Wilkes is to be attributed the execution of a premeditated design to seize and take the Peterhoff to a Prize Court.

Your Lordship will not overlook the conduct of the prize crew towards the officers, crew, and passengers of the Peterhoff in keeping them confined to their cabins for several days in such a climate.

The pretence assigned for seizing the Peterhoff,—namely that she had on previous occasions run the blockade, is without a particle of foundation; the fact being that the ship left England on her first voyage in the month of July last, when she sailed for Bermuda and Nassau, at the latter of which ports she loaded a return cargo direct for Liverpool, where she arrived in the month of October last. On the completion of that voyage she became my property, and the present is her first voyage since I became the owner, and the second voyage since she was built.

Now that the facts are before your Lordship, free from any possible contradiction, I venture to renew my request that your Lordship will lose no time in demanding the immediate restitution of the Peterhoff and her cargo, together with damages for the gross outrage perpetrated by the unwarrantable proceedings of the United States' naval officers; and, further, that your Lordship will convey to me the assurance of Her Majesty's Government that my line of steamers, engaged in lawful trade between this country and Matamoras, will receive such protection as will effectually put an end to the arbitrary proceedings of Admiral Wilkes, or any future interference by the United States' naval authorities.

I have the honour to be,
Your Lordship's obedient, humble servant,
JOSEPH SPENCE.

To the Right Hon. Earl Russell, Her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

Foreign-office, March 31st, 1863.

Sir,—I am directed by Earl Russell to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of yesterday's date, enclosing further papers respecting the capture of the Peterhoff, and I am to state to you that your letter has been referred for the consideration of the law officers of the Crown.

I am, Sir, your most obedient, humble servant,
E. HAMMOND.
Joseph Spence, Esq., 2, Cowper's-court, Cornhill.

Foreign-office, April 3, 1863.

Sir,—I am now directed by Earl Russell to make you acquainted with the conclusion, at which, having considered, in communication with the law officers of the Crown, the circumstances attending the capture, by the United States ship of war Vanderbilt, of the British vessel Peterhoff, as set forth in your letters of the 26th, 27th, 28th, and 30th ult., Her Majesty's Government have arrived at in regard to that matter.

The Government of the United States has clearly no right to seize British vessels bonâ fide bound from this country, or from any other British possession, to the ports of Vera Cruz and Matamoras, or either of them, or vice versâ, unless such vessels attempt to touch at, or have an intermediate or contingent destination to some blockaded port or place, or are carriers of contraband of war destined for the Confederate States; and, in any admitted case of such unlawful capture, her Majesty's Government would feel it their duty promptly to interfere, with a view to obtain the immediate restitution of the ship and cargo, with full compensation, and without the delay of proceedings in a Prize Court.

Her Majesty's Government, however, cannot, without violating the rules of international law, claim for British vessels navigating between Great Britain and these places any general exemption from the belligerent right of visitation by the cruisers of the United States, nor can they proceed upon any general assumption that such vessels may not so act as to render their capture lawful and justifiable.

Nothing is more common than for those who contemplate a breach of blockade, or the carriage of contraband, to disguise their purpose by a simulated destination and by deceptive papers, and the situation of the ports on the coast of Mexico, with reference to the Confederate States, is such, as to make it not only possible, but in many cases probable, that an ostensible Mexican destination would be resorted to, as a cover for objects which would really justify capture. It has already happened in many cases that British vessels have been seized while engaged in voyages apparently lawful, which vessels have been afterwards proved in the Prize Courts to have been really guilty of endeavouring to break the blockade, or of carrying contraband to the Confederates.

It is the right of the belligerent to capture all vessels reasonably suspected of either of these transgressions of international law, and, whenever any cause of capture is alleged, the case cannot be withdrawn from the consideration of the Prize Court of the captor.

After the case has undergone investigation it is the duty of the Prize Court to restore any such prizes, unlawfully made, with costs and damages; and the proper time for the interference of her Majesty's Government is in general when the Prize Courts have refused redress for a capture which the evidence shows to have been unjustifiable.

Her Majesty's Government cannot, upon ex parte statements, deny the belligerents in this war the exercise of those rights which, in all wars in which Great Britain has been concerned, she has claimed herself to exercise.

As regards the allusion which has been made to the case of the Adele, before her Majesty's Government can form any opinion as to the judgment stated to have been given in that case, they must have before them a correct report of that judgment it being impossible to rely upon the general representation of its effect contained in a newspaper paragraph, founded on printed letters, especially as none of the other judgments of the United States' Prize Courts, which have been reported to her Majesty's Government during the present war, evince any disregard of the established principles of international law.

As regards, however, the particular case of the Peterhoff, in which you are more directly interested, her Majesty's Government, having taken into consideration the papers transmitted by you, and being satisfied that those papers disclose no prima facie ground of capture, and that there is every reason to believe the voyage to have been lawful and bonâ fide, and the seizure of the vessel wholly unjustifiable, they will instruct Lord Lyons to make an immediate representation of the circumstances of that case to the Government of Washington, and if no legal ground of capture should be alleged then to press for the release of the vessel and her cargo, with compensation and without the delay of proceedings in the Prize

Court. But if any legal grounds of capture should be alleged by the Government of the United States, this case, like all others, must unavoidably follow the ordinary course.

I am, Sir, your most obedient, humble servant,
E. HAMMOND.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE CONFEDERATE SECRETARY OF WAR.

The following is that part of the report which relates to the operations of the war:—

Confederate States of America, War Department,
Richmond, January 3, 1863.

His Excellency Jefferson Davis, President of the Confederate States of America:

Sir,—I have the honour to submit to you the following report of the action and condition of this Department.

After the toils, privations, and many battles of the past year, it is gratifying to be able to present the army as fully equal, if not superior, in all the elements of strength to what it has been at any previous period of the war. Its numbers, though still seriously inadequate to fill fully its organizations, yet afford a nearer approximation than heretofore to that result. When, in addition, it is considered that a large proportion of these consists, not of new recruits, but of soldiers inured to the exposures of service and made veterans by the ordeal of constant danger, its superior endurance and stability must readily be acknowledged. It is not deemed requisite to state its precise aggregate, nor to detail the exact proportions of its respective branches of service. It may be sufficient to say generally, in respect to the latter, that it is believed they exist in such respective proportion as approved military judgment considers most promotive of efficiency and co-operation.

The army, thus constituted, could it be recruited and maintained to its full complement, would, in all probability, be the largest in proportion to population ever maintained in actual service by any nation, and would attain the maximum which the production and the resources of even the wide expanse and fertile regions of the Confederacy would, without oppressive exactions of the people, render judicious to sustain. Nor, when it is recollected how, with numbers much short of this standard of completion, it has, in the past, generally wrested victory from the far superior forces of the enemy, and repelled the hordes of invaders on which, with the presumptuous insolence of anticipated success, our foe have relied to overwhelm us, can it be doubted that such an army would be fully adequate to all future needs and exigencies, and sufficient to assure final peace and independence.

To secure the completion of its numbers, reliance must be placed on the measures known popularly as the Acts of Conscription, approved, the one on the 16th of April, 1862, and the other on the 27th of September, 1862.

By the first of these acts, all the white male citizens of the Confederacy capable of bearing arms, between the ages of eighteen and thirty-five years, with a few guarded exceptions, were constituted soldiers of the Provisional army, and devoted first to filling up the ranks of the old organizations. This was one of the most remarkable ordeals to which the patriotism and self-devotion of any people was ever subjected. It was demanded by the imperious necessity of the crisis. Without decadence of the real valour of our people, or their invincible determination to achieve their independence, the first flush of enthusiasm, and the rush of volunteers fired by threatened invasion, had comparatively ceased. Not unnaturally, under experience of the diseases, privations and hardships of the soldier's life, and the influence of delusive hopes of speedy peace inspired by early victories, the spirit of volunteering had died out. While, however, the ardour of the individual did not suffice for the proffer of self-devotion, the sentiments and convictions of the mass recognised as the most sacred obligation the stern duty of defending, if needs be, with their entire numbers, their imperilled liberty, fortune and honour. They were engaged in a righteous war for all men hold dear. Foes, as malignant in intent, as unscrupulous in means, with numbers unexampled in modern war, aided by patient training, complete organization, and all the appliances of military science, were pressing on for their subjugation or extermination. The contrast presented at the same time by our banded forces was not less striking than discouraging. The periods of enlistment of more than two-thirds of our soldiers were very near their termination, and it was manifest that, notwithstanding the ulterior purpose of the great majority, at some future time to re-enlist in the ranks of the armed defenders of their country, their resolution was not sufficient to resist the prospects cherished for months, amid the sufferings and monotony of the camps, of returning to their homes and there temporarily enjoying their habitual comforts and pleasures. They had, too, for self-justification the plea that they had borne their part of the burthen and peril, and that it was inequitable that numbers equally interested and capable, but only less bold or more prudent, should enjoy all the benefits without sharing in their trials and dangers. Our army was in incipient disorganization, and on the eve of dissolution. The natural consequences ensued in a series of grave disasters. Reverse succeeded reverse. In the east, Roanoke Island, the key to the inland waters of North Carolina, was captured. We had to fall back from Manassas, abandon our defences at Yorktown, and yield Norfolk, with all the advantages of its contiguous navy yards and dock. In the west, Forts Henry and Donelson fell, with the loss, at the latter, of the gallant force who had victoriously repelled, till exhaustion disabled them to meet, overwhelming numbers. All defences on the Upper Mississippi had to be yielded or abandoned, and Nashville, the capital, and Memphis, the leading city of Tennessee, became the unresisting prey of the victors. Finally, as the crowning stroke of adverse fortune, New Orleans, the commercial emporium of the South, with the forts that guarded the outlet of the great artery of the trade in the west, after resistance so feeble as to arouse not less of shame than indignation, passed into the occupancy of our foes. It was the darkest hour of our struggle, and with a people of less heroic resolve and invincible spirit, waging war against hosts avowing such malignant intents, it might well have caused discouragement and dismay. But, to their honour be it said, it only roused a more indomitable will, and nerved to sterner struggles. A supreme effort of self-devotion and courage was recognised as necessary. The bill of conscription was passed and bravely accepted. Its first effect was to retain in the army the soldiers whose terms of enlistment were just expiring. How great the sacrifice involved in the renewal of all their privations and dangers, and the renunciation of their anticipated release and enjoyments, may be better conceived than portrayed. Yet, was there scarce a murmur of disappointment and disaffection, and not an instance, as far as known, of resistance or revolt. Scarce less meritorious was the action of the great body of the people, who, with full realization of all to be encountered, yielded themselves or their dearest kindred to the call of their country's need. The results worthily rewarded such sacrifices. The army was speedily reorganized and recruited, and with sterner sense of its task, and renewed hope, it prepared to meet the exultant foe.

By the rapid concentration of the armies in the west, General A. Sidney Johnston was enabled, with some approximation to equality of force, to strike a decisive blow, and to win the brilliant victory of Shiloh, where the enemy were only saved from utter destruction by the hasty arrival of reinforcements too numerous to be more than successfully repelled.

In the east, the happy boldness of General Magruder at Yorktown, stayed at a critical time the advance of the grand Federal army, destined for the capture of our capital, until our forces, rescued by the consummate strategy of General J. E. Johnson, from the pressure of enveloping armies, could arrive to the rescue. Signal checks, given in partial battles at Williamsburg and elsewhere, dismayed and baffled the Federal army in its advance, until General Johnson had securely withdrawn his forces to his chosen lines of defence. Meanwhile, General Jackson, by a series of rapid movements and bold attacks, in which strategy equalled valour, with far inferior numbers, defeated successively four Generals, with as many armies, swept the Valley of Virginia of hostile forces, made the Federal authorities tremble in their capital, and frustrated the combinations by which the enemy had purposed to aid General McClellan and environ Richmond by large converging armies. During these operations, the grand army of McClellan, inveigled by the skill of General J. E. Johnson to settle down on the swamps of the Chickahominy to the prudent occupation of digging trenches and earthworks, was, on the first favourable opportunity, stricken with marked success in the severe engagement of the Seven Pines. Unfortunately, before his guidance had consummated victory, General Johnson was wounded and disabled. Our army was then transferred to that consummate commander, General R. E. Lee. Soon thereafter, summoning to his aid General Jackson, the prestige of whose name and recent exploits sufficed for the security of the Valley, he, in pursuance of a plan, as admirably conceived as on his part boldly executed, assailed McClellan in flank and rear, and by a series of bloody victories, drove from their laboured defences his grand army. Shattered and dismayed, it cowered for protection under cover of its gunboats, there to swelter and waste beneath the oppressive sun and pestilential malaria of a shadeless plain on the banks of the Lower James. Even that measure of good fortune was due solely to those accidental miscarriages in combinations which in war often mar the wisest arrangements. The execution of General Lee's plan, with vigour equal to its conception, must inevitably have eventuated in the capture of the whole demoralized army of the enemy.

While these triumphs were being won, another large army of the enemy was advancing through Piedmont, Virginia, towards its central lines of railroad communication, under the command of General Pope. He had disgraced the character of an officer by braggart boasts, and outraged humanity and civilization by stimulating and sanctioning desolating ravages and vindictive cruelties by his unscrupulous troops. General Jackson, despatched with a moderate force to stay his progress, administered a speedy rebuke to his arrogant vanities, and gave an earnest of coming chastisement by defeating, in the sharp engagement of Cedar Run, his advanced division under General Banks.

Soon after, General Lee, despising the shrunken proportions and quelled spirit of the grand army in its unenviable asylum, proceeded, with the larger proportion of his forces, to unite with Jackson and confront the then collected and imposing army of Pope. By a succession of movements, too masterly to be comprehended, and too rapidly executed to be withstood by Pope, he broke up his communications, intercepted his supplies, and by throwing forces in his rear, drove him to rapid flight, chased him from the Rapidan to Bull Run, and at last forced him, but not until sustained by large reinforcements from Washington, to a decisive battle on the already memorable field of Manassas. There a second victory, scarce less decisive than the first, attested the continuing superiority of our troops, and the unchanged favour of the God of Battles. The enemy fled to refuge under their old defences at Arlington, and again spread dread and confusion in their quaking capital. Instead of wasting strength and resources by either assailing the strongholds of the enemy or tarrying in the country wasted by the repeated ravages of war, General Lee, with boldness and dexterity, passed his army rapidly into Maryland. There, with part of his forces, he penetrated to the centre of the State, collecting large stores of much needed supplies, and by stirring appeals, rousing the people of that oppressed State to strike for their own deliverance. With another portion, the rapid Jackson moved to the capture of Harper's Ferry, with its hostile force of 11,000 men and great stores of munitions and supplies. This was crowned with perfect success, and must be recognized as among the most brilliant achievements of the war.

Under the shock of our victories, in the Valley and around Richmond, and of the successes of our arms in the west, the Federal Executive, still tenacious of the hope to crush us by surpassing numbers and resources, had ordered a draft of six hundred thousand more men to be at once furnished and hurried to the support of his still superior but disheartened armies. From the numbers of this call may be inferred, both the extent of the panic and the losses of the enemy, from our successive victories. At the commencement of the campaign they had based their boasts and their hopes on having seven hundred thousand men in arms for our overthrow, and before that campaign was half completed, their fears called for nearly a duplication of their original numbers. While the events last described were occurring, rapid and great additions under this call had been made to the Federal armies, and not merely of untrained levies, since the judicious disposition of them in garrisons and the remoter and less exposed theatres of action, had placed at disposition large numbers of their best troops, whose spirits had not been broken by defeats. By these means General McClellan, who had been summoned with his shattered remnant of the grand army to the defence of the capital, was enabled at the head of an immense army, to issue forth to attack General Lee and relieve Harper's Ferry. The movement, though more prompt than was anticipated, was too late for the latter purpose, as Harper's Ferry had already yielded, yet it brought him in the face of our forces before they had been concentrated from that and their other operations in Maryland. The first shock of his whole force was thus cast on one of the columns of General Lee's army, guarding his rear at Boonsboro', and though most bravely sustained and even repelled by the gallant General D. H. Hill, yet his necessary retirement to the point of embarkation selected by General Lee gave to the enemy the appearance of a first success, and was unscrupulously trumped up as a great victory, to animate the hopes and courage of the Federal army. Thus reinvigorated, with treble odds of numbers and artillery, they ventured an attack on General Lee in the position near Sharpsburg, where he had collected the larger portion of the forces remaining to him after so many arduous marches and glorious victories. The battle, protracted from morn to night, was stubborn and bloody, but resulted in the final repulse of the enemy from all our positions. The field remained in our occupancy, and the next morning, to the challenging fire of our guns, no response was made, and no enemy appeared. McClellan had withdrawn, as afterwards appeared, some five miles in retreat. The victory was ours, but gained over numbers already overwhelming and certain to be immediately reinforced, it could not be followed up and improved. Exhausted by the unwonted celerity of past movements, and by the inevitable losses of his many victories, and exposed to have his communications and supplies intercepted by his host of foes, General Lee judiciously withdrew his army with all its numbers and stores in safety across the Potomac. The enemy finding in this movement of wise precaution a pretext for the arrogant claim of victory, followed to the river bank, but ventured not to assail their retiring conquerors, much less to cross the river in pursuit. Our gallant army, in proud defiance of the hosts gathered on the opposite shore, rested and recruited on the Virginia side, with the satisfaction of having well nigh destroyed two grand armies of invaders, and severely staggered a third, more numerous than either. A pause of martial inaction followed for some weeks, and may be considered as affording a termination in the east to one of the most remarkable campaigns of history.

In the west, less brilliant, but still very decisive, successes attended our arms. From the effects of the victory of Shiloh, and of the reinvigorated ranks and spirits of our forces under the action of the Conscription law, our armies in each department prepared to make active advances, and by combined movements pressing forward their discouraged and retreating foes, to repossess the country previously occupied by them, and to go forward to the redemption of the State of Kentucky, and the attack of one or more of the leading cities of the West. In the prosecution of this plan, North Alabama and Mississippi were speedily cleared of the footsteps of the foe. All of Tennessee, save the strongholds of Memphis and Nashville, and the narrow districts commanded by them, were retrieved, and by converging armies, nearly the whole of Kentucky was occupied and held. The signal victory of Richmond was won, with the capture and dispersion of nearly the whole much superior forces of the enemy, by the skill and valour of General E. Kirby Smith and his brave command. While a series of brilliant cavalry movements and successes, won by the gallant Colonel Morgan, broke up all efforts on the part of the disaffected Unionists or scattered Federal forces to rally and combine, and afforded at once, protection and encouragement to rise, to the loyal citizens of the State. These movements threatened the safety, and excited the greatest consternation of the cities of Cincinnati and Louisville.

Meanwhile, General Braxton Bragg, with a well-appointed army, trained and disciplined under his efficient organization, moved boldly forward through Tennessee and Kentucky. By doing this he so flanked and endangered the rear of General Buell, in command of the leading army of the enemy in the west, as to compel him to rapid retreat, for refuge and reinforcements, on the Ohio and Louisville, or elsewhere. Had General Buell, as might naturally have been expected from his numbers, been more bold to encounter his enemy, or less rapid in his flight, General Bragg would probably have accomplished, after sweeping all foes from before him in Middle Kentucky, the great object of overthrowing Buell's army and capturing Louisville. Unfortunately, Buell effected evasion of battle, and escaped safely to that city which under the occupancy of his army, became too strong for assault. Sheltered in Louisville, Buell was enabled to receive and organize the very large reinforcements which the draft of the Federal Government, and the dread of invasion in the populous States of the North-west, caused to be forwarded with extraordinary despatch. His forces, before superior, became vastly larger than all our commands in Kentucky, and he began by various movements threaten our connections and communications with the more Southern States. About the same time, the diversions which were expected to be made by our forces still remaining on the southern borders of West Tennessee, towards Memphis and Nashville, failed of anticipated success. One division sustained a check at luka and was obliged to fall back, and some time later the whole command, in a most daring and determined attack on the entrenched positions of the enemy at Corinth, were defeated with serious loss and driven to a rapid retreat.

Before these events had fully occurred, General Bragg had concluded that prudence required the present withdrawal of our armies from Kentucky, and the removal into security of the large and, under our circumstances, most valuable supplies of every kind which had been collected during the occupancy of that abundant and unexhausted country. His arrangements were being made with due care and deliberation for these ends, and portions of his forces, preceded by immense trains, were already moving Southward, when General Buell, under the encouragement of his great numbers, at last ventured an attack on one of his divisions. The result was, when comparative forces are considered, the brilliant victory to us of Perryville. Its results were seen in the subsequent prudent avoidance of all interruption or disturbance by the enemy to the quietly retreating columns of our armies with their gathered stores, who resumed commanding positions of their selection in the State of Tennessee. Thus, in Kentucky, as in Virginia, our armies, not conquered or repelled, but diminished by their own successes, were, from mere paucity of numbers, constrained to retire to avoid environment by overwhelming forces, but under the protecting prestige of victory, were prudently respected and unassailed by their enemies.

Of the various operations of our forces on more limited theatres, it is impracticable, within reasonable limits, to give a succinct account. It is sufficient to say, generally, that from the reorganization of our army, and the turn in the tide of fortune, that successes have been numerous and reverses very few, and that with scarce an exception, in small actions as in great engagements, the superior skill of our officers and valour of our soldiers have been signally vindicated.

More special allusion, however, is due to the memorable repulses of the enemy with their formidable gunboats at Drewry's Bluff, near Richmond, and at Vicksburg. At each were illustrated not more signally the fortitude and valour of the armed defenders, than the heroic resolve and self-devotion of the citizens, who preferred for their fair cities destruction to subjugation. The examples were pregnant with monition and encouragement. The gunboats lost their prestige of terror. Cities ceased to be abandoned or surrendered on the approach of a foe, and all were taught how freemen, above fear and ready for all sacrifice, may proudly defy the most potent agencies of modern warfare.

The foregoing detail has been indulged in from a double purpose. First,—to render a tribute of justice to our armies, whose grand achievements, being then in process of accomplishment, my predecessor, from considerations of prudence, abstained in his last report from commemorating; and secondly, and more especially, to demonstrate the imperious necessity that demanded the first enactment of conscription, and the glorious effects that at once vindicated the wisdom of its adoption, and repaid the sacrifices of our soldiers and people in accepting it. It is hardly too much to say that it wrought our salvation from destruction or infamous thralldom. Could it indeed have been somewhat sooner adopted, or more speedily and thoroughly executed, it may well be doubted whether the first act alone might not have sufficed to have extorted from our obdurate foes, in their own capital, or on their own conquered soil, permanent peace and independence. At the culminating point of our late successful advances, could fifty thousand more troops of the Confederacy have been added to the victorious armies of Generals Lee and Bragg, the full fruition of our highest hopes would almost have been assured. In no spirit of vain regret is the reflection indulged, but because of its deep practical monition for the future. In lieu of such happy consummation, our triumphal progress was arrested and our victorious armies compelled to retire before the hosts summoned to the field by the large draft of the Federal Government. The same necessity is therefore again pressing on our people with scarce less stringent urgency. In wise prevision of it, the second act of conscription, heretofore referred to, was judiciously provided by Congress at its last session, giving to your Excellency the power to call into the Provisional Army all subject to military duty between the ages of thirty-five and forty-five, or such part thereof as in your judgment was necessary to the public defence. Under this act you have called into service, for the present, only those between the ages of thirty-five and forty, who are subject to military service, and not exempted by an act passed soon after, known as the Exemption Act, exempting certain classes of persons, and such others as the President shall feel satisfied on account of justice, equity, or necessity, ought to be exempted. The call, as well as the first Act of Conscription, are now being actively executed by the department. A sub-bureau, attached to the Adjutant-General's Department, has been organized, charged with this subject exclusively. In every State one or more Camps of Instruction for the reception and training of conscripts, has been or is being established in judiciously selected locations. To each State an officer, styled a Commandant of Conscripts, is appointed, charged with the supervision of the enrolment and instruction of conscripts, and he recommends a surgeon, a quartermaster, a commissary, and the drillmasters requisite.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE CONFEDERATE CONGRESS.

On the 12th of February, in the Senate, Mr. Sparrow, of Louisiana, submitted a resolution, declaring it to be the purpose of Congress to maintain the right to the free navigation of the Mississippi River, as stated in the Act of the Provisional Government. Referred to the Committee on Commerce. The House bill, repealing the clauses of the Exemption Act relative to overseers on plantations, was discussed until the hour of adjournment.

In the House Mr. McKee introduced an Exemption Bill, repealing the present laws, and leaving the subject in the hands of the President and Secretary of War. Referred. The Impressment Bill was discussed, but no action was taken.

On the 13th, in the Senate, several important bills were introduced. The Committee on Military Affairs reported adversely on the proposition to enroll the Government employees as conscripts. The Exemption Bill was then taken up and discussed until the time of adjournment.

The House passed the bill allowing the soldier five dollars a month for deficiencies in rations. The Impressment Bill was also passed. It empowers any officer commanding a military district or department to authorize the impressment of property when it cannot be procured otherwise; the impressment of slaves to be made in accordance with State laws, but, in the absence of such laws, in accordance with rules to be prescribed by the Secretary of War. No slave are to be impressed where they can be hired at the usual market rates. No individual is to be deprived of provisions required for the comfortable support of his family; nor, except in extreme cases, of grain, forage, slaves, or other property necessary for his plantation. Compensation is to be made for property seized, and if the owner and impressing officer cannot agree to terms, it shall be determined by three disinterested persons. Property lost, destroyed, or injured, is to be paid for by the Government, and penalties are attached for any officer impressing property in violation of the act.

On the 16th, in the Senate, a bill was introduced making Columbia a port of entry. A bill was passed authorizing the employment of pilots. The Exemption Bill was discussed by Messrs. Yancey and Phelan, the pending question being on the motion to lay the Senate Bill on the table and take up the House Bill, which simply repeals those clauses of the Act of last session relative to the police of plantations. The question was decided in the negative, and the Senate Bill was then discussed until the hour of adjournment.

The House passed the bill to refund the State of Alabama the amount overpaid on account of the war tax of 1862. Also a bill to allow minors to hold commissions in the army. The House then went into secret session to discuss the currency question.

On the 18th, the Senate concurred in the House amendment to the Senate Bill authorizing the issue of bonds for funding Treasury notes. The 3rd section of the act provides that bonds issued under the Hundred Million Loan has been filed, will be made redeemable at the pleasure of the Government, at the expiration of five years from the date of said bonds. The Exemption Bill was further considered until adjournment.

On the 20th, the Senate was occupied with the further consideration of the Exemption Bill. An amendment was adopted exempting one person on any farm on which there resides a family of women and children, not less than ten in number, dependant on the labour and presence of a white man for support and protection, with various conditions to prevent the abuse of the exemption.

In the House, proceedings were unimportant, that body having gone into secret session on the Currency question.

On March 10.—In the Senate, Mr. Smith introduced a Bill to grant to the principal officer of each of the Executive Departments a seat upon the floor. The Bill was taken up and discussed until adjournment.

In the House of Representatives Mr. Barkdale introduced joint resolutions declaring the firm conviction of the people of the Confederate States in the justice of their cause, and their confidence of a final triumph in the end; and that they will continue to make whatever sacrifice is required; that they would accord a respectful consideration to any proposition looking to the accommodation of differences, but preserving a separate and distinctive national character. Whenever any State bordering on the Mississippi should desert from their unprovoked war the Confederate Government will secure them the free navigation of that river.

The resolutions were referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. Smith, of North Carolina, introduced a resolution on the same subject, which was referred to the same Committee.

ORDERS OF GENERAL BEAUREGARD.

The following general orders have been issued by General Beauregard in anticipation of an attack upon Charleston. The last, in relation to shipping entering the harbour from abroad, deserves special attention from parties trading with Charleston:—

Head-quarters Department of South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida, Charleston, S.C., February 17, 1863.

It has become my solemn duty to inform the authorities and citizens of Charleston and Savannah that the movements of the enemy's fleet indicate an early land and naval attack on one or both of these cities, and to urge that all persons unable to take an active part in the struggle shall retire.

It is hoped, however, that this temporary separation of some of you from your homes will be made without alarm or undue haste, thus showing that the only feeling that animates you in this hour of supreme trial, is the regret of being unable to participate in the defence of your homes, your altars, and the graves of your kindred.

Carolínians and Georgians! the hour is at hand to prove your devotion to your country's cause! Let all able-bodied men from the seaboard to the mountains rush to arms! Be not too exacting in the choice of weapons; pikes and scythes will do for exterminating your enemies—spades and shovels for protecting your friends.

To arms, fellow citizens! Come to share with us our dangers, our brilliant success, or our glorious death.

(Signed) G. T. BEAUREGARD,
General Commanding.

Official: JOHN M. OREY, A.A.G.

Head quarters Department of South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida, Charleston, February 17, 1863.

[Special Orders, No. 44.]

* * * * *
VII.—All furloughs to officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates, belonging to this Department, not based on Surgeons' certificates, are revoked, and both officers and soldiers will repair, without delay, to their respective stations, to be ready to meet the enemy. Patriots and true soldiers will not linger by the way side.

By Command of GENERAL BEAUREGARD,
G JNO. M. OTEY, A.A.G.

Head-quarters First Military District, Department of South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida, Charleston, February 17, 1863.

[General Orders, No. 8.]

I.—Vessels navigating the harbour will avoid passing through Hog Island Channel, between Mount Pleasant and Sullivan's Island, and the Channel between the flats East of Castle Pinckney and Crab Bank.

II.—Hereafter no vessels entering the port at night, from abroad, will be allowed to pass Forts Moultrie or Sumter, until daylight. Their course will be pointed out by the Commanding officer at Fort Sumter, to which post each vessel will be required to send a boat to report.

By Command of Brig. Gen. RIPLEY,
WM. F. NANCE, A.A.G.,
First Military District.

ALEXANDER GALT, THE SCULPTOR.

(From the Richmond Enquirer.)

At a time like the present, when the people of the South are called upon to bewail so many gallant spirits, who have perished either on the field of battle or on the more fatal couch of disease, it may not be deemed wholly inappropriate to pause a moment at the shrine of departed genius, and drop a tributary wreath on its bier. But the lamented Galt not only possessed that brilliant spark which shines forth only in long intervals, whether of peace or war; but he was a patriot, and cherished with a generous enthusiasm the honour and glory of the ancient Commonwealth in which he was born. The first offspring of his skill, wrought in a foreign land, he named in her honour; and when Virginia seceded a second time from a Federal Union, he was among the first to tender his services in the impending struggle, and was soon engaged in the erection of a battery designed to protect his native city from the hostile forces which were threatening it by land and upon the water. He had just returned from Italy on the eve of the secession, full of hope in his calling, when the avalanche of war, so unexpectedly to him, fell upon us; and it was interesting to observe how a mind like his, which was teeming with the gay images of art, became instantly engaged in the laborious details of fortification, and in the bustle of actual life. Like Michael Angelo, who, on the approach of war, stepped from his studio, and planned the defences which protected his flowery home on the Arno from the approach of the enemy, Galt, who worshipped with true fervour the genius of the great Italian, sought in his own sphere to imitate his heroic example.

He was born in the city of Norfolk, about the year 1828, and was the son of the late Alexander Galt, who was postmaster of that city for several years, and fell a victim to yellow fever in the fatal summer of 1835. Another victim to the disease, or to the sorrows which the disease brought in its train, was Annie, the sister of our artist, whose genius, exerted in a kindred art, was not unequal to her brother's. She delighted to chant the praises of his chisel; and her lines on the Bæchante approach nearer the flowing rhythm, the brilliant perspective, and the living grace of Childé Harold, than any other production of the Virginia Muse.

The genius of Galt began to manifest itself at an early period. When a child, he carved small busts and likenesses with his penknife, which displayed tact and skill; and the ladies of Norfolk ever took pleasure in showing the concheliæ which the modest and beautiful boy had cut from the shell of the oyster. In due time he was sent to Italy, where he devoted all his energies to the study of art; as he well knew that even his livelihood depended upon his success; for in his case, as in so many others, fortune, which gave him genius, had denied him wealth; and it is believed that he maintained himself abroad, either directly or indirectly, by his own efforts in his profession.

The first work from his chisel, as stated above, was a female bust, very sweet and very pretty, which he called Virginia, and which is in possession of a gentleman of New York. He now returned home with this proof of his skill, and some of the prominent citizens of Norfolk united in making up a purse for another work; and the result was the production of a female bust, with a Greek outline of the face, in which beauty and intelligence are finely blended, and, like the aspect of genius in repose, verging to the serious, and draped with uncommon skill.—He called it Psyche, as the embodiment of the soul; though, perhaps, a better name would have been The Penserosa, as exhibiting, in a feminine form, what Milton has so charmingly depicted in the masculine. The citizens of Richmond had an opportunity of seeing this work some years ago, in the hall of the Historical Society; and it is now safe from hostile hands in the collection of him who traces these lines. The birth of Psyche, or rather the first appearance in our city, was celebrated in some graceful verses by the late Mr. Maxwell, and also by the muse of his sister.

His next production was the bust of a lovely woman, in nadraped and freshly developed womanhood, with a smile on her countenance, and with lips slightly parted, as if she were saying some silly thing to her partner in the dance. The features are full and flush, as becomes a Bæchante, a votary of the god of the grape; the hair, which is dressed with exquisite skill, and evenly parted on the forehead, is nicely adjusted behind the ears, which are left free for the music of the dance or the whispers of love, and is bound behind with a fillet which gives a striking outline to the back part of the head; and about her temples she wears a wreath of vine leaves, each one of which, though an exact transcript of nature, differs from its fellow, while the neck and bosom are worthy of the face that smiles above them. The late Mr. James, the novelist, declared in a public lecture that this bust alone "was sufficient to make the fame of a city;" and it was his wont to bring his distinguished foreign visitors to see it as a specimen of the genius of the South; and among those visitors, we recall a son of Lord Dunmore, of revolutionary memory, who spoke of it with rapture. The triumph of the piece is the smile which, as you look upon the face, seems to flash instantly with the distinctness of present life from the lip and cheek and eye. This bust also delights in the name of Allegra, and is in strong contrast with her elder and more serious sister, as she stands by her side in the same collection. Of this bust, the artist made several copies, one of which, is, or was, in the Philadelphia Academy, and there is a copy somewhat less in size than the original model in the possession of General Anderson of this city.

The next effort was the bust of Columbus, which is as large as life. The artist was required to make a head of the great discoverer, such as he was when he landed on the shores of the new world—a point of time in the life of Columbus not represented on canvass, and intermediate between the youthful face painted by Passignano, which was done long after the death of Columbus, and is rather a likeness of some member of his family than his own, though adopted by Mr. Prescott in his history, and the broad, bluff, weather-beaten, but more authentic likeness, taken in the decline of life, which now crowns the colossal monument at Genoa; and in this composite work, which required some skill in reasoning backward in anatomy, if we may so speak, Galt succeeded so well as to call forth an eloquent commentary, through the Florence press, by an eminent Italian, who afterwards declared, as he saw the busts packed for its American home, "that the best head of Columbus in existence was inclosed in that box." The discoverer is represented as clothed in the armour, tipped with the ruffe about the neck of the knights who figured in the tent of Isabella the Catholic, on her visits to the camp of her husband in the wars which ended in the conquest of Grenada, at the taking of which city we know that Columbus was present. The face grave and calm, yet not fretted with the responsibility of his great mission, and forming a fit base for the pyramid of forehead that soars above it. Of this bust, which was made to order, there is but a single copy in marble, which, we rejoice to assure one of our contemporaries, is safe from the grasp of the enemy, and has its place in the same collection with the Psyche and the Bæchante. This was the last of his works that were greeted by the muse of the sister of the artist. Long before the others had reached our shores, her frail tabernacle had dissolved, and her gentle dust had been laid away in patrimonial earth in the cemetery of the Cedars.

He executed other busts of individuals as well as of his own ideal creation, among which we may mention that of the late Judge Standard, of Mrs. Charles Bruce, and of Mrs. Joseph R. Anderson, which two last, apart from their intrinsic value as likenesses, are exquisite specimens of art and the bust of sincerity, in the possession of Captain David Walker. His skill was also called into requisition by citizens of South Carolina, and we believe he made a bust of Rutledge for that State, or for the relatives of the patriot.

The last female bust which he executed in Italy, and which he deemed his masterpiece, was that of Sappho; and it had reached New York in safety in the spring of 1861, on its way to take its station beside her elder sisters, the Psyche and the Bæchante; but unfortunately it was too late, and was detained on its arrival in that city. Let us hope that war, which respects the arts abroad, will not wholly disregard them on American soil, and that this lovely production of Southern genius will ultimately find its destined home.

But the work of Galt which will keep his memory alive in future times is his statue of Jefferson. Our citizens have had an opportunity of seeing it; and those who are best qualified to pass judgment upon it as a representative of the original, have expressed a most favourable opinion of its merits. Placed in the hall of the University of Virginia, it will bring freshly before the eyes of successive generations of young men the noble form and features of the great original; and with the recollection of the qualities of our most illustrious statesmen will come the grateful tribute to the genius whose skill designed that faithful image, and whose hand struck it from the massy marble. It was the darling wish of the departed artist to behold the inauguration of the most memorable work of his life, which he fondly hoped would be accompanied by the ministry of the kindred arts of Eloquence and Song. But vain are the aspirations of man. Who would have thought, when, during the inauguration of the Statue of Washington, five years ago, the distinguished orator invoked the sympathies of the thousands who heard him for the untimely fate of its gifted Sculptor, that on the next similar occasion death would again rear his spectral form, and darken the general joy?

We cannot sufficiently express our sense of the public loss in the death of Alexander Galt. Had he lived, he would have been the artist in this wondrous era in our history. All know that hardly a vestige of the bodily semblance of the patriots of the revolution of 1776 has come down to us. Here and there a few miserable portraits may be pointed out; but when we have gathered them together, the mournful office alone is left us to lament our poverty. It was the province of Galt to preserve the likeness of the eminent men who have stood forth at this time in the council and in the field as the champions of their country, and who have earned for her, at this early stage of our new Confederacy, the respect and the admiration of the world; to snatch their frail features from the worm, and impress them on the imperishable rock. And this mission he was engaged in fulfilling, when death smote him at his task.

PEACE AND THE NORTH-WEST.

(From the Charleston Courier, February 22.)

We have been so often deluded by hopes of peace, and have suffered so severely from those false expectations, that we are admonished not to lend a willing ear to those reports and statements which promise deliverance in a short time from the calamities caused by this terrible contest. All these statements concerning the disaffection in the army threatening Vicksburg may be true, and it may likewise be true that Indiana, Illinois, Kentucky, and Ohio, are prepared to solicit admission into the Southern Confederacy, and in the event their request is refused to establish a separate Independency, all these statements may be true—true to the letter, and yet it is dangerous to bottom our hopes of a speedy termination of our troubles on those advices.

The people of the North-West are in a bad humour because, after having done the most brave and bloody fighting, they are suffering for the want of a market for their grains and bacon. The Emancipation Proclamation has also a great deal to do with the mutinous spirit of the inhabitants of that region. But though they have given expression to their just and sensible sentiments in terms so plain and forcible, and have even gone so far as to call a Convention for the purpose of adopting measures for the adjustment of the momentous questions at issue, before the date set for the assembling of that body events may transpire that will change the tone of their feelings.

For these demonstrations and designs do not in any measure impair the vigour and weaken the determination of the men in power at Washington. They are as bitter and as resolved as they were before the muttering of these murmurs and complaints and curses reached their ears. In truth, so far from making them less earnest and determined, those words of menace and denunciation have intensified the fierceness of their wrath, and aroused the more deeply all their mighty energies.

The feeling in the North-west, that may break out into revolution, only serves to hasten the prosecution of the campaign now in progress. And if any one of those campaigns is successful the victory may hush these notes of disaffection, and cause the war to be waged with more fury and obstinacy.

The course of the North-west depends upon the result of the battle at Vicksburg. The dwellers in that region are uncomfortable and mutinous because they cannot avail themselves of the navigation of the Mississippi. If we can keep that river closed we can maintain and increase their opposition to New England and the Yankee Administration. They will grow more and more disloyal to the Government, they will continue to devise means to deliver themselves from their galling and disgraceful bondage, they will adopt measures in harmony with their greatness, and those measures will be executed with a spirit and energy that will secure success.

But if the many-hilled city falls before the guns that will in a short time thunder upon its earthworks, that victory may arrest the movements on foot, and give a different complexion to matters in that quarter. Having been relieved of their heavy load of woes, the people of the North-west may abandon their intentions, submit with grace to the usurpations of the Government, and co-operate with renewed ardour in the wild scheme of reconstruction. If disaster befall our arms at Port Hudson and Vicksburg, the Convention may fall to the ground, and those powerful States now on the verge of revolution and inspired by high motives of patriotism and honour, may retire from the position they have taken, and swallowing the infamous Proclamation and the stupid and cruel Negro Regiment Bill, give their earnest support to the party they at present so detest and denounce.

These tidings that have come to us over the wires are pleasant, but it is dangerous to build our hopes of an early peace upon them. If the North-west does carry out its purposes, we may expect the war to terminate at no distant day. But the execution of their designs depends upon events which are yet in the womb of the future, and we should not suffer those movements to abate our vigilance, or relax our energy. The expellations that are now ready, the attitude of Foreign Powers, the advantages possessed by the enemy, warn us not to give place for a moment to seductive influences. If guided and strengthened by divine wisdom and might, we are equal to the demands of duty. Without human help we are able to achieve independence. Let us be more earnest, and patient and valiant, and we shall conquer an enduring and honourable peace, when it seems good in the eyes of Him whose approval and assistance we have invoked.

BLOCKADE NEWS.—The steamers Eagle and Douro, also schooner St. George, have reached Wilmington, North Carolina, from Nassau. A private despatch from Wilmington to Mr. Power, owner of the privateer Retribution, received in this city Saturday afternoon, says that a prize schooner taken by the Retribution, and loaded with fish, salt, &c., had been run aground in New Inlet, under the guns of Fort Fisher.—Charleston Courier, February 23.

THE PRIVATEER RETRIBUTION.—A correspondent of the Charleston Courier, writing from Nassau, N.P., gives a list of the captures of this gallant little Confederate privateer. This vessel, it will be remembered by the readers of THE INDEX, came out of Wilmington, North Carolina, with a cargo of cotton and naval stores, consigned to Mr. C. W. White, of St. Thomas. Discharging her cargo at the latter port, she shortly afterwards appeared on the high seas as an armed and efficient privateer. The following is a partial list of her captures:—The Confederate privateer Retribution, Captain Parker, came into Nassau this morning, from a very successful cruise, during which she has been spreading devastation amid the commerce of the enemies of our country. Among the Yankee vessels which have fallen into the hands of the gallant privateersman are the following:—Bark Mary Wright, Miller, bound from Portland, Maine, to Trinidad, with an assorted cargo. She was destroyed by fire. Brig J. P. Ellicott, Deveaux, bound from Bucksport, Maine, to Cienfuegos. A prize crew was put on board and she was sent to the Confederacy. Brig Erie, bound from Camden, Maine, to Demerara, with a load of lumber. She was destroyed by fire. Schooner Hanover, Case, bound from Provincetown, Mass., to St. Domingo, with an assorted cargo. A prize crew was put on board and she was sent to the Confederacy. Brig Emily Fisher, Staples, bound from St. Jago de Cuba to New York, with a cargo of sugar. This vessel was captured and run ashore on Crooked Island, one of the Bahamas. Captain Parker brought the crew into Nassau, as prisoners. While off Blanquilla, in the Caribbean Sea, the Retribution met an unknown whaler. The Yankee showed fight, firing upon the boat's crew of the privateer, and killing one man. One shot from the Retribution sank her, and, it is supposed, all on board. Information has reached here that the Elliot has been recaptured by the Yankees at St. Thomas. The officers and crew of the privateer are all well and in fine spirits. After the necessary repairs are procured, she will go forth again upon the high seas upon her mission of retribution.

The 10th and 19th South Carolina Regiments, in Tennessee, have been consolidated, with the following field officers:—Colonel A. M. Manigault, of the 10th Regiment; Lieut.-Colonel J. F. Pressly, of the 10th Regiment; Major Porcher, of the 10th Regiment. The 10th Regiment was reduced to six companies, and the 19th was reduced to four companies. Captain Robert N. Chatham's, and Captain H. R. Peterson's companies form the 7th company, under command of Captain R. N. Chatham, with Lieuts. McDonald, Vonsant and Denny. Captain R. Richburg's, Captain J. L. White's, and Captain Addison Clinkscales' companies form the 10th company, under the command of Captain Clinkscales, with Lieuts. McLeod, McCaslan and Crawford. Captain E. W. Horne's, and Captain T. W. Getzen's companies form the 8th company, under the command of Captain Horne, with Lieuts. McDevitt, Randall and Hester. Captain H. R. Dean's, Captain — Turner's, and Captain I. B. Courtney's companies form the 9th company, under the command of Captain Dean, with Lieuts. Buzzard, Waddle and Hoolly.—Charleston Courier, 23rd February.

SEIZURE OF AN ALLEGED CONFEDERATE GUNBOAT AT LIVERPOOL.—About noon, on Sunday, Mr. E. Morgan, one of the Customs' surveyors, acting under instructions from the Board of Commissioners, went on board the small wood-built screw steamer Alexandra, recently launched from the building-yard of Messrs. Miller and Sons, and now being fitted for sea in the Toxteth Dock. No official intimation was made by the officer as to the grounds on which he acted. He merely went on board, marked a "broad arrow" on one of the masts, and remained on board, keeping the vessel under surveillance. Up to two o'clock yesterday afternoon no official reason had been intimated as to why the Alexandra had been put or was kept under surveillance, but it is believed to be in consequence of information communicated to the authorities that she is built as a gunboat, and is meant for the Confederate Government. The Alexandra has no gunports, has no magazine, and is not provided with a shell-room, or any other similar arrangement ordinarily pertaining to a war-ship, and has no engines on board. In short, she presents merely the appearance of a fast schooner-rigged steam yacht.

LETTERS from Hamburg state that the notary employed by the firm of Messrs. J. H. Schröder and Co., of that city, having had occasion to apply to the American Consul for an attestation of his signature to a document in which the name of Messrs. Schreder was inserted, the Consul refused to grant it on account of that firm having been connected with the American Cotton Loan.

DEATH OF HON. EDMUND RUETT.—This distinguished gentleman died at Spartanburg Court House, on Sunday last. On Friday his friends had heard with surprise of his dangerous illness, but, nevertheless, were astounded yesterday by the sad tidings of his death. No one's prospects for a long and useful life seemed brighter than his during the recent session of the Legislature. "In the midst of life we are in death." Society can ill afford the loss of such a member. In offices of public trust he was always able, learned, pains-taking, and thorough in the discharge of duty. In private he was pure, unselfish, energetic and conscientious. To any community sad is the day when such a man is taken from it.—Charleston Courier, February 23.

FLORIDA REFUGEES.—The following is a list of persons recently banished from St. Augustine, Florida, by the Federals. It is furnished to the Charleston Courier by one of the refugees:—Mrs. C. Andreu and three children; Mr. Joseph Baya, wife, and two children; Miss C. Baya, Mrs. H. Benet and child; Mrs. Joseph Capo and three children; Mrs. S. Capella and two children; Mrs. William Genovar and child; Mrs. J. V. Hernandez and three children; Mrs. R. M. Leonardy and four children; Miss J. Leonardy; Miss F. Leonardy; Miss C. Leonardy; Miss A. Leonardy; Mr. G. E. Lambias; Mr. D. J. Lambias; Dr. Joseph A. Lambias and wife; Miss A. Lambias; Mr. M. Masters and wife; Miss P. Masters; Miss B. Masters; Miss C. Neligan; Miss J. Canova; Miss D. Pappy; Miss F. Pappy; Miss C. Pappy; Mrs. M. Neligan; Mrs. John L. Phillips; Mrs. B. D. Ponce; Mrs. D. J. Mickler and three children; Mrs. B. J. Pacetty and two children; Mr. Gabriel Masters, wife, and four children; Miss C. Masters; Mr. C. Pomer, wife, and four children; Mr. J. R. Pacetty; Mrs. C. D. Segui and child; Mrs. W. H. Williams; Miss V. Williams; Miss E. Sanchez; Miss Ellen Sanchez; Master John Oliveros; Mrs. P. Leonardy and two children.—Total 85.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

Our friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed; that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any date, will be useful and acceptable presents.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives, or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognized at this office.

Our subscribers in the South will have their paper supplied through HENRY HOTZE, Esq., the Confederate States' Commercial Agent at London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

Subscription, 26s. per annum—post paid, 30s., payable in advance. All communications on business to be addressed, and Post-Office Orders made payable to, J. B. HOPKINS, 13, Bonville-street, Fleet-street, London, E.C.

Agency at Liverpool: WM. KNOX, Secretary Southern Club, 55, Brown's-buildings.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, APRIL 9, 1863.

The Wall Street Victories.

There is something very characteristic in the thorough self-confidence with which the Yankees are waging war with the South, something which we could almost admire, if it did not continually land them in such profound and ludicrous humiliation. From Mr. Seward down to the lowest print in the United States there never seems to be an admission of reverses or a doubt of ultimate success. The infallibility of Federal generals and the invincibility of Federal arms are a settled creed with them; and although taken off his guard and hardly recovered from the Bull Run "Stampede," a Yankee colonel might acknowledge that his regiment "had been whipped into a cocked hat," we may be quite sure no such impeachment of the prowess of his country will ever again be recorded from the lips of a Federal officer. About a century ago a French poet wrote a stanza on the military qualities of his nation, which we are tempted to transcribe, so admirably do they illustrate the martial fervour of the American eagle:

Le coq Français est le coq de la gloire,
Par les revers il n'est point abattu;
Il chante fort, quand il gagne la victoire,
Plus fort encore, quand il est bien battu.

We may find in every page of Mr. Seward's despatches, and of the Northern press, abundant testimony to the truth of the parallel. It seems to be a canon of military orthodoxy never to admit a disaster. When McClellan changed his base, it was for "strategic reasons;" when he was beaten at Sharpsburg, he had saved the Republic. Mr. Seward announced twelve months ago that the Mississippi was open, though Vicksburg was untaken; Banks won a victory at Cedar Mountain, and Pope captured 10,000 men at Corinth. We have not a doubt that when the Yankee historian relates, for the benefit of posterity, the incidents of this tremendous struggle, his narrative, compiled from authentic documents from Washington, will be replete with similar truths. The latest illustration of this tendency is exhibited, as might be expected, in the latest mail. When the Australasian left New York, everybody was in spirits; the rebels were "caving in." They could not hold the Rappahannock. Port Hudson was used up; Vicksburg was, or was about to be, abandoned; in short, the campaign was all but over; and to adopt Mr. Seward's language last November, "a general conviction that the war is moving on towards an early and successful conclusion, was taking possession of the popular mind." We were at a loss to understand the origin of all this elation. There was nothing in the telegrams from the seat of war to warrant it. The authorities at Washington are not in the habit of delaying the publication of good news; and therefore we may be quite sure they had nothing of a very exhilarating character to disclose. Yet "the popular mind" was quite decided there was good news. Rumour set to work to mould the popular impression into form—and gold declined. The public made up its mind to a little blaze of triumph. The blaze has probably died out by this time; but it lasted long enough to create a sensation and to tickle Yankee vanity, and to answer a financial purpose. They can afford in New York now to acknowledge a trifling miscarriage.

Two or three reports combined to excite the Northerners, and the first of these was the rumoured passage of the batteries of Port Hudson by Farragut's flotilla. The Richmond Whig had scared them terribly, for it announced that the attack had been made and repulsed, that the Mississippi was burnt in front of the batteries, and that the rest of the squadron, with the exception of one gunboat, had been driven back with considerable damage. If this statement was true, the struggle for the Mississippi was virtually over. Farragut's flotilla could not possibly be in a position to renew the attack without serious risk to the Federal garrisons at Baton Rouge and New Orleans, for some weeks to come. The garrison of Vicksburg would be free to draw its supplies as heretofore, from Louisiana and Texas by the Red River. A telegram from Baton Rouge persuaded the North that the Richmond Whig was at fault, and that the Federal flotilla had passed Port Hudson. But an official report to Mr. Welles confirmed the Southern news. Farragut's Secretary stated "that the Hartford (flag ship) passed the fort, but that the others were repulsed, and one was seen in flames." A third and still later, but unofficial account from Cairo places at seven the number of the ships that had run the blockade, i.e., the whole flotilla, with the exception of the Mississippi; and states further that two of the gunboats are at Warrenton, a few miles below Vicksburg, and in communication with Grant's army, and the rest blockading the Red River. The truth seems to be that the Hartford and Mononghela have succeeded in passing Port Hudson, that the rest of the squadron is still below the batteries, and that a land attack by Banks has been made and repulsed. Supposing, for argument's sake, the worst to have happened, and the batteries of Port Hudson to have been passed by the whole squadron, the control of the Mississippi river is by no means lost. Twelve months ago there was no works at Port Hudson, and the two Federal squadrons, the one from New Orleans, the other from Cairo, met at Mississippi, and withdrew after an ineffectual bombardment. The only immediate injury the Confederates will sustain will be the stoppage of supplies by the Red River.

But the Federals have, it is said, achieved another triumph. They have found a new passage into the Yazoo River above the batteries at Haines' Bluff, which will bring them into the rear of Vicksburg, and close upon the city of Yazoo. It is now understood that the expedition down the Yazoo Pass is a failure. After penetrating all sorts of obstacles, a portion of the Federal squadron which had suffered the least from snags and shoals and overhanging trees, had arrived within a few miles of the city of Greenwood, when further progress was barred by a Confederate battery, Fort Pemberton, covering some artificial river obstructions, and rendering the river impassable. After an attack by the gunboats, in which the Federals appear to have suffered severely, it was resolved to land some guns, and erect a land battery. This attack, however, fared just as badly. According to the last accounts the guns had been dismounted, and the Federals were themselves besieged. Reinforcements were on the way, but it is plain that the expedition was in great peril. It can hardly reascend the Yazoo Pass into the Mississippi. It must fight its way down the stream. The works at Fort Pemberton are strong and well manned. A few miles lower is the City of Yazoo, whose natural defences are still more formidable. The Federals are fairly trapped, and unless they can at once bring an overpowering force to bear upon the various fortified positions on the Yazoo, they must suffer very considerable losses. Foiled in this attempt to invade the rear of Vicksburg the Federal commanders have essayed a new passage. Entering Cypress Bayou, a few miles above the mouth of the Yazoo, they have penetrated, it is said, by a very circuitous route through Steele's Bayou, Deer Creek, and Sunflower River into the Yazoo River, a short distance above Haines' Bluff, thus turning the works of this formidable battery, and having the way open either to the rear of Vicksburg or to Yazoo City. We cannot speak positively of the results of this discovery. But, at least, we can state that the exultation of the Yankees over this North-West Passage is premature. In the neighbourhood of Jackson, and in the rear of Vicksburg are 60,000 Confederate troops. There are great battles to be fought, rivers to be crossed, swamps to be forded, ravines to be bridged, before the Federals gain a dangerous proximity to Vicksburg. It is not with an army debilitated and cut up, as Grant's forces have been by long exposure to malaria of the most deadly character, that this new invasion is to be brought to a successful issue.

We have shown that there is no very satisfactory prospect for the Federals on the Mississippi. In Tennessee and Kentucky affairs are hardly more promising. The Confederates have resumed the initiative on a grand scale in both States, and Rosencranz finds himself occupied with a powerful army in his front and on his right flank, whilst the enemy is massing considerable forces in his rear, threatening his communications, and even imperilling the Federal hold upon Kentucky. It is not yet known whether the inroad into Kentucky is a feint or a regular invasion. The Confederates have crossed the frontier at three different points, with forces of some magnitude, and seem to be converging upon Lexington. It may be a renewal of General Bragg's invasion of last year, which nearly lost Nashville to the Federals. It may be a mere raid for supplies. Anyhow, it is an evidence that the Confederates feel themselves tolerably secure in Tennessee. They would not march into Kentucky if they were in doubt about successfully opposing Rosencranz's advance. Indeed, their increasing boldness, their recent dash upon Franklin—their appearance within four miles of Nashville, and their concentration in front and on the flank of the Federals at Murfreesborough, point rather to an attack by the Confederates. Altogether it is difficult to understand the unabated confidence of the Yankees. The next mail will, perhaps, explain the mystery; but we fail to discover in the last a single promise of early, or even ultimate triumph.

Belligerent Rights and Neutral Wrongs.

We publish in another column the correspondence which has passed between the Foreign Office and the owners of the Peterhoff, in regard to the capture of that vessel while pursuing a lawful voyage between London and Matamoras. It is important to observe the official notification of the intentions of the British Government in reference to seizures of this kind, and also the interpretation of international law which they have adopted, and on which they intend to act; for no one can suppose that the case of the Peterhoff will be the last of its class. The whole question of trade between England and her West Indian colonies, as well as between England and Mexico, during the continuance of the present war, is at issue. For if the capture of the Peterhoff be admitted to be legal, or if, not being legal, it be nevertheless allowed to pass with impunity, then the Federal cruisers are at liberty to seize any outward-bound ship which they may find in the Western Atlantic; while on the other hand, the broad grounds on which the illegality of that capture must be affirmed cover the whole of the trade between Liverpool and the West Indies, or between this country and Mexico. It is satisfactory to learn that Her Majesty's advisers pronounce the capture of the Peterhoff altogether unwarrantable, and express their intention of requiring explanations from the Government of the United States, as well as of insisting, in case no legal ground of capture be alleged, on the restoration of the vessel. It is not so satisfactory to be told that if any legal plea that might, if substantiated, suffice to condemn the vessel should be alleged by the Federal authorities, the decision must be left to the Federal Prize Courts. For no one has any faith in the honour and impartiality of judges appointed for the nonce by a President who has not only given instructions to his naval officers to commit high-handed violations of the maritime law of nations, but who has also treated the judges and the laws of his native land with unparalleled insolence and contempt. The judges in these Courts do not occupy the position of Lord Stowell and his successors in England. They are not men independent of Government, and superior to popular clamour. They are the mere creatures of Mr. Lincoln's will; and are as completely his servants and instruments as are those officers on the legality of whose acts they are called upon to pronounce. It is somewhat unfair to English merchants that they should be referred to the decisions of such tribunals as these. To the verdict of the Supreme Court no one would venture to demur; for the judgment of Mr. Lincoln's Prize Courts, no sensible man entertains any more respect than for that of Captain Wilkes.

Again, it is not very pleasant to learn that her Majesty's Government considers the Federal cruisers entitled to make prize of any vessel which, though bound for a neutral port, may have on board goods contraband of war, destined for the service of the Confederate States. We should very much like to see the dictum or precedent on which this opinion is based. We conceive that between neutral ports there can be no such thing as contraband of war; and we have always understood that, unless the cargo of a ship whose destination is neutral, be actually the property of an enemy, the probability that it may eventually pass into the enemy's hands affords no pretext whatever for its seizure. We thought that no rule of international law was more clear than this, that a cruiser has no concern with the ultimate destination of the cargo, provided the immediate destination of the ship be neutral. It is evident that if the principle laid down by our Government be conceded, no vessel whatever trading to the West Indies or to Mexico can be safe from detention and probable condemnation. She may evidently be bound for a neutral port, and intend to land her cargo there, and yet, as a part of that cargo will probably consist of goods held by Federal cruisers to be contraband of war, and as these may certainly be destined for the Confederate States, the vessel may lawfully be seized and sent in for adjudication. It would seem that a case of quinine on board a ship bound for Nassau or Matamoras might ensure her condemnation—for Mr. Lincoln has ventured to declare medicines contraband of war. We hope that the Foreign Office will reconsider this matter, and explain the meaning of language which is likely to be construed as a justification of the most outrageously illegal acts of the Federal Government. It is affirmed that despatches are contraband of war. If the present decision of the Ministry be allowed to stand, we do not see but that a letter from Mr. Mason to the Confederate Government, enclosed in an envelope directed to a citizen of Nassau or Havannah, might subject steamers carrying her Majesty's mails to confiscation, as having on board contraband of war, destined for the Confederate States.

All voyages, from neutral port to neutral port, whatever their purpose, are lawful to a neutral ship, that is, to a ship belonging to a neutral nation and not actually engaged in the service of a belligerent Government. The character and destination of the cargo cannot affect the ship on such a voyage. For instance, it is perfectly lawful for a British ship to carry to Havannah a cargo assorted with a view to sale in Charleston; and if an American cruiser meddles with that ship, he does so at his peril; and if an American Prize Court condemns that ship, it commits a wrong which England would be entitled to punish by immediate reprisals. It is not until that cargo has been shipped for a blockade—or, if contraband of war, for an enemy's port—that the belligerent has any power over it. Often and often, during the Napoleonic wars, were our Prize Courts obliged to release vessels under such circumstances as these. It is enough that the belligerent has the right to seize ships and cargoes actually on their way to his enemy's shores; it is too much that he should pretend to seize those which may possibly, on a subsequent voyage, find their way there. If any such pretensions as the Federalists are now advancing had been made by England in former wars, they would have united all neutral Powers in league against her, and at the head of that league would have stood the Government of the United States.

It follows, then, that the seizure of the Peterhoff was wholly unjustifiable; and also that all captures of ships trading between Liverpool and Nassau are equally unjustifiable. It follows, too, that the condemnation of any ships pursuing a voyage either to Mexico or to a West Indian port, would be a wrong which might give rise to war. But it is worth while to notice a plea set up to excuse the seizure of the Peterhoff, first because of its extreme impudence, and secondly because, if admitted, it would serve to legalize many other illegal captures. It is, that the Peterhoff had on previous occasions been engaged in running the blockade. It appears that the statement is false; but if true it would not be relevant. The liability incurred by an unlawful voyage ceases with the voyage. A ship trading between Liverpool and Nassau cannot be touched, because she may ten times have run through the blockade from Nassau to Charleston. If it were allowed that a ship may be captured on a lawful voyage, because at some time or other she may have violated a blockade, it would be difficult to deny that she may be captured for intending to run the blockade at the end of her present voyage. But the law is as we have stated it—that during any voyage between port and port, a ship is affected only by the circumstances and conditions of that voyage, and not by her past acts or her intentions for the future. It is plain that on a strict adherence to this rule depends the safety of all neutral trade in time of war.

We may remark that there are two special aggravations of the wrong committed in the capture of the Peterhoff. First, she carried the mails to Matamoras; so that there was no possibility of her going anywhere else. There was conclusive evidence of her real destination to a neutral port. Secondly, she was captured in neutral waters—an act which, if she had been laden with contraband of war and bound for Charleston, would have entitled us to insist on her release.

The Foreign Office says, truly enough, that a belligerent has the right of capture on the high seas; and that it is for the Prize Court before which the vessel seized is sent to decide whether that right has been exercised without due reason. This is an unanswerable, but it is a partial argument. The rights of search and of capture are strictly analogous to the right of a constable summarily to arrest and search persons whom he may suspect to be guilty of felony. It is impossible to define the cases in which the right may be exercised; but it is quite clear that if it be exercised without reasonable ground of suspicion, a wrong is committed for which reparation must be made. Now, if an offence of this kind be once committed, the remedy is obvious. If a policeman once exceeds his duty, he is liable to be sued before a Court of Law, or reprimanded by his superiors. If a captain makes one or two wrongful captures, the sufferers have their remedy in the Prize Court, and his Government may call him to account. But if a series of unreasonable arrests were made in a particular locality, with a manifest view of driving passengers thence, it is clear that an inquiry into the conduct of the police, and the orders given to them, would promptly be demanded. And when we find that all ships trading in certain directions are invariably seized by Federal cruisers, we are obliged to treat the captures as premeditated acts of wrong, and to inquire what is meant by them. Now, what is meant happens in the present case to be very clear. Captain Wilkes and his subordinates are avowedly acting under distinct orders from the Federal Government, which appointed the commander of the San Jacinto to his present post precisely on account of the affair which ought to have sent him before a court-martial—the kidnapping of Messrs. Mason and Slidell on board the Trent. He was selected because he had shown himself contemptuous of law and careless of consequences. And his orders are to stop the trade between England and the ports contiguous or convenient to the Confederate States by a vexatious use of the rights of search and capture. Such ships as the Prize Courts dare condemn, they will condemn; where they dare not, they will give only nominal damages; if forced to release a vessel "with full compensation," they will do so; but the Federal Government know that no compensation will really atone for the capture and detention of vessels, and the consequent interruption of trade; and that even if every captured vessel were released, the risk of seizure would be sufficient to suspend the regular course of commerce, and to inflict immense injury on British merchants and shipowners concerned in the trade which it is desired to intercept. Such an abuse of the right of search to stop, by systematic vexation, a lawful commerce, is an act of hostility against England, which—in justice to her subjects and in vindication of her own honour—she is bound to resent, to stop, and to punish.

The Last Threat.

The North is learning to provide for the contingency of defeat. Whilst victories at Vicksburg, Charleston, Port Hudson, and elsewhere, are freely discounted in Wall-street, and the world is admonished that the war will be over in about a fortnight, it is suggested that, in the event of the Federals not succeeding in all their undertakings, and exterminating the Southerners before the middle of April, the "rebels" are to be subjugated by starvation. Of all the miraculous mistakes or impudent pretensions of the Federals, this surely bears the palm. In the history of sieges, when large armies have been investing small towns, it is remarkable how difficult it was to prevent the ingress of provisions, and for how long the beleaguered garrisons have endured almost incredible privations. What the United States proposes to do is, not to starve a garrison or a city into submission, but a people numbered by millions, and a country of upwards of 800,000 square miles—a country, too, which is purely agricultural, and its inhabitants accustomed to agricultural pursuits—a country wondrously prolific, where the earth teems with such plenty, that besides feeding its own people, it has yielded the greater part of that fibre which constitutes the staple clothing of mankind. It may be worth while to briefly expose the monstrous absurdity of the last Yankee threat.

In the United States there has lately been published an abstract of the census for 1860, which gives an account of the productiveness of the sections of the late Union. Let us see what prospect that holds out of the North being able to starve the South. The population of the Free States is set down at 18,907,753; and of the Slave States, including the slaves, at 12,252,293. The number of acres of improved land in the Free States was 88,181,466, and in the Slave States 74,623,055. The number of horses, asses, and mules in the Free States was 3,669,239; and in the Slave States 3,557,236. The number of bushels of wheat, rye, Indian corn, barley, buckwheat, and oats produced in the Free States was 700,386,888; and in the Slave States 523,902,461. Bearing in mind that the population of the Free States is set down at eighteen millions, and the population of the Slave States at twelve millions, it will be perceived that in respect to acreage of improved land, the number of horses, asses, and mules, and the production of cereals, the latter has in all a decided, and in some cases an immense, advantage over the former. But this is not all. In the Free States the production of rice was 4,139 lbs.; and in the Slave States 187,136,034 lbs. The value of animals slaughtered in the Free States was $105,669,980; and in the Slave States $106,362,027. Yet, with these facts before them, the Yankees are foolish or impertinent enough to talk of starving the Confederates. Europe has been so accustomed to look upon the South as the cotton-field of the world, that it has not considered that cotton, though her staple, was not by any means her sole product. It is surprising—but it is true—that the South, which in 1860, besides her large yield of sugar, tobacco, and hemp, and of 5,196,092 bales of cotton, of 400 lbs. to the bale, was also able to produce the above quantities of food.

It is not to be denied that the war has considerably affected the Southern supply of food. Here and there fertile districts have been laid waste by the ruthless invader. Some States, especially Virginia, have been impoverished by the presence of contending armies, and the exigencies of war have so interrupted the communications, that certain districts have suffered from comparative scarcity. But without going into details, it is manifest that the Confederacy could not keep such a vast force in the field without seriously diminishing its productive power, and at the same time, by reason of the waste of warfare, rather increasing its consumption of the prime necessities of life. Therefore food is dearer than formerly in the Confederate States; but the famine prices paraded in Northern papers are no gauge of this comparative scarcity, since they are due to the enormous inflation of the currency. What, under these circumstances, is the conduct of the Confederates?

They deserve danger from afar, and manfully prepare to meet it. They cannot, whilst the war lasts, produce as much as in time of peace; and, so, they propose to give up the cultivation of cotton, that is, to grow no more of it than is sufficient for seed; and in place of cotton and tobacco, to grow grain. This gives them a margin, that, notwithstanding their diminished resources, will ensure them a superabundant supply of food. All the Southern papers urge upon the farmers the duty and prudence of not cultivating that which they cannot sell, and of growing that which their country needs, and which will command a remunerative price. The Confederates must submit to the consequences of the war and the blockade, and, whatever the cost, become temporarily independent of intercourse with the rest of the world.

These urgent appeals of the Southern press have, to some extent, misled the Yankees, who are so accustomed to empty boastings, that moderation and truthfulness seem to them like a confession of weakness and the cry of despair. Whilst the defeated North is boasting of its prowess, threatening to exterminate the South, and to whip all creation, the victorious South is anxious and watchful, and instead of celebrating past triumphs, is making ready for fresh encounters. Whilst the North impiously declares that the Union shall be restored though at the price of the desolation of a Continent, the South is using all the means in her power to repel the invader, and is humbly seeking the blessing of the God of Battles. And now, because the South acknowledges all her sufferings, shows all her wounds to the world, and is bent upon securing the needful supplies for carrying on the war, even if it should be protracted for twenty years, the North declares that the South is giving in, and is nearly exhausted. What marvellous blindness! A people that has the courage to face menacing dangers and to employ at any sacrifice the proper remedies, is evidently strong; whilst a people for ever keeping up a false appearance and afraid to contemplate the inevitable results of its acts is manifestly weak.

The South will not be starved, particularly as it makes due arrangements for amply supplying contingent wants and possible deficiencies. When the Mississippi dries up because the Federals blockade its mouth, or when it changes its course in obedience to a Lincoln proclamation, or leaves Vicksburg high and dry from the terror inspired by the threat of making the Great Union River, then the Federals may hope to achieve the greater miracle of starving into submission a people inhabiting a country of upwards of 800,000 square miles, and embracing within its confines some of the most fertile regions of the globe. We must say the threat of the South being starved into submission is clumsy bunkum unworthy of Yankee ingenuity, and not likely to have any other than a risible effect upon Europe.

Consol Bonds.

On Saturday last the Chancellor of the Exchequer was thrown from his horse, but happily the accident was not of a serious character, and it will not interfere with the transaction of public business. If, however, the fall had resulted in broken bones instead of a bruised face, great would have been the disappointment and anxiety of the public. Some years ago England and, for the matter of that, Europe was kept in suspense from day to day because Mr. Gladstone was hoarse and could not make his financial statement; and men dreaded the slightest indication of an east wind, lest it should further postpone the announcement of the Budget, from which so much was hoped and feared. Though there is not an equal anxiety now, the Budget speech is eagerly looked for. Mr. Gladstone is in an unenviable plight—he has to deal with a surplus, and that is, we believe, the most trying fortune that can befall a Chancellor of the Exchequer. That distinguished functionary should pray for neither riches nor poverty, for both involve him in difficulty, but of these evils too little is far less to be dreaded than too much. A deficiency necessitates fresh taxation, and the class on which is conferred the patriotic privilege of rendering the Exchequer solvent becomes, at all events temporarily, hostile to the Finance Minister; but then all who escape the imposition feel grateful for their exemption, and laud the enlightened Minister for his moral courage and political sagacity. When there is a surplus the class relieved from taxation is grateful to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but all the classes not so relieved, look upon him as a man who ought to be scouted from public life. In dealing with a deficiency the Chancellor of the Exchequer makes a few enemies and many friends; in dealing with a surplus he may gain a few supporters, and is sure to array against himself many bitter opponents. It may be very natural and proper to congratulate the country upon a surplus, but it must be an awful bore to the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Mr. Gladstone has about three millions sterling at his disposal: a million from the excess of income over estimated expenditure, and about two millions on account of the reduction of the estimates. He may not see fit to forthwith dispense with taxation to the amount of £3,000,000, for he may think that there are causes at work which will tell upon the revenue during the current year; or that ere he presents another budget, additional and imperative demands are likely to be made upon the Exchequer. Whilst it would be opposed to our practice to retain a larger revenue than we want to provide against possible or distant contingencies, it would be equally foolish and unprecedented to give up taxes that might probably have to be almost immediately reimposed. But the British taxpayer no sooner hears of a surplus than he assumes that the revenue will go on increasing, and that there is no probability to justify the Chancellor of the Exchequer in retaining taxes that he does not presently need. Well, then, all are agreed that Mr. Gladstone has a disposable surplus, and further that it should not be used for the reduction of the national debt. The only reign in which the national debt was reduced instead of being increased was the reign of George the Fourth, and there is no disposition to make any further reduction, at least on the same scale. What then will Mr. Gladstone do with the surplus? Will he reduce the Income-tax, notwithstanding his memorable reply to the pathetic appeal of Mr. Hubbard respecting the inequalities of that prolific impost? The tobacco duties have been settled, and since the excise on spirits is not too high to make the attempt at evading the law profitable, it will not be lowered. There is a whisper about tea having to pay less duty, and a little talk about untaxed breakfasts for the working classes. We do not know how much of the three millions the Chancellor of the Exchequer may appropriate to the relief of the taxpayer, but we do know that all the taxpayers not relieved of a portion of their burdens will consider themselves shamefully ill-used.

But whatever difference of opinion there may be about the Budget of 1863, there can, we should think, be no disagreement as to the expediency and soundness of the change proposed by Mr. Gladstone with regard to the arrangement of a portion of our national debt. Like the Lord Chancellor's scheme respecting church livings, it is a change that promises to work beneficially, and will cost nothing. Mr. Gladstone proposes to give the holders or purchasers of certain stocks—the new Three per Cents. and the Three per Cent. Consols—the option of either having their investments registered according to the present system, or of having bonds with coupons attached, for not less than five years. These bonds and coupons will be as transferable as a Bank of England note, or by being endorsed with the name of the owner, made specially payable to him or his attorney. The plan is used with continental stocks, and the only novelty is its application to the English funds. The one objection urged is that it will open the door to frauds; but those who are timid need not avail themselves of the privilege—trustees, unless especially authorised, will not be allowed to hold stock in coupon bonds; and further, it is not the usual experience that a simple arrangement encourages wrong-doing. Despite the checks of the present system, there are many frauds perpetrated, and foreign stocks and colonial and home coupon bonds are not specially liable to be forged. The fact is, people are so particular as to the character of parties from whom they receive valuable securities, that it is easier to forge, than to dispose of, forged securities. Excepting this objection, which is a matter of detail and of prejudice, we have not heard of any other. The advantages will be manifold. The investment of small sums will be easier, and the bonds will always be available for business purposes, for no banker would refuse to advance on them. To some extent the coupons will be used as currency, for they will be payable to bearer, and will represent specie. To bankers and merchants the Consol bonds will be as convenient for temporary investment as Exchequer Bills; and the new system will facilitate the investment of foreign capital in our funds. Though just at first the plan may not meet with general favour, we doubt not it will speedily be extensively used; and if so it may be found desirable to extend it to the whole of our debt. One probable and desirable effect will be the increase of the normal price of the funds, in consequence of the additional capital that will be attracted to them; and another that it will discourage bubble schemes for catching small savings, by enabling the small capitalist, who is content with moderate interest, and good security, to invest his money in the public funds without difficulty, and to collect his interest with the utmost facility.

The Field-Day at Brighton.

To a superficial observer it might seem that at the present moment large armies and navies and warlike preparations are rather the accidents than the requisites of the civilized world. Doubtless on the other side of the Atlantic, the case is exactly of the contrary character, and it is, perhaps, true that, with the single exception of France, from the Revolution to the fall of Napoleon, no country has within the records of modern history made such gigantic efforts in war, or achieved a more commensurate success than the Confederate States. Deeply as every man, who has the smallest pretension to an honest or humane mind, must deplore the miseries of the American conflict, yet the soldier, and the man of administrative faculties cannot but contemplate with admiration the vast hosts engaged, the enterprises of generals, and the organization of departments, while speculation dwells with intense interest on the results of each experiment, and science waits for the solution of some of the thousand problems of modern warfare. Yet if we put out of the question the "Second American war of Independence," what is there in the nature of war to be found in all the world? Asia is in profound repose, Algeria demands only the pacific efforts of the great French Marshal; and the Moorish people, the only other combative element in Africa, has been glad to bow even to Spain. All the Governments of Europe are at peace. Lord Palmerston boasts that England, and Napoleon III. boasts that France is in a state of amity with all the nations of the three old continents. It is true that Russia is engaged in a struggle, the extent and violence of which increases in geometrical progression with a nation which, like Rome opposed to Hannibal,— Ducit opes animique ferro."

But that struggle is yet an insurrection, and has not risen to the dignity of a war. In spite, however, of these boasted amicable relations the Powers of Europe expand their armies and navies, their budgets, their floating and permanent debts. The three military empires keep between them at least a million and a half of men under arms. The Italian army is enormous, and the Prussian king thinks an immense military establishment preferable to a good understanding with his own subjects. England is infected with the same disease. In addition to her native Indian army and some colonial regiments, she thinks it necessary to maintain nearly 150,000 regular troops, a militia of about the same numbers, and a powerful and most costly fleet, manned by seventy thousand sailors; and yet that is not enough. The Government has organized a great volunteer naval reserve, and the people have organized a great volunteer military reserve. The truth is, that all prudent men find that Europe is face to face with a thousand possibilities of danger, which require but small immediate agencies to make them facts. They see everywhere ambitious military empires, insoluble difficulties of races in contiguity but not in harmony, revolutionary elements at rest, not extinct, with all the ancient antagonisms of liberty and authority, of reason and prescription in full force and vigour. Abroad the Governments have acted upon these facts; in England, the people have appreciated them. In short, these considerations originated, and have, in fact, maintained what is here called the Volunteer movement; and even if the considerations were exaggerated the value of the institution can scarcely be so.

We have been led to make these few preliminary remarks in view of the great Volunteer celebration which took place on Brighton Downs on Easter Monday. It is not our purpose to go into the details of that Field-day, which the columns of our daily contemporaries have so amply illustrated. It will be sufficient for us to state for the aid of those of our readers who may not have had the opportunity of studying a full account of the proceedings, the few following facts. In the first place, then, the troops that assembled on that day at Brighton numbered upwards of 14,000, with thirty guns (6-pounders and 18-pounders), worked entirely by volunteers. There was but one volunteer regiment of cavalry drilled on the old "dagoon" principle, but the 9th Regiment of Lancers, perhaps the finest cavalry regiment in the world, made that portion of the corps d'armée respectable. In the second place, nearly all these 14,000 men, with the principal part of the guns, were carried from London to Brighton—a distance of fifty miles, and brought back again between 5.30 A.M. and midnight of the same day, without the smallest mishap, and without the slightest hindrance to the ordinary railway traffic. In the third place, the battle was in all respects admirable. It commenced about half-past 1, and continued till half-past 4, and the "enemy," about 1,500, with eight guns, who was supposed to have landed in the immediate vicinity of Brighton, was driven by hard fighting over a distance of two miles of difficult positions, and fasilated and cannonaded in his final stronghold by the combined efforts of two divisions and twenty-two guns. The skirmishing in the early part of the action was extremely fine, and the men fought not as machines, but with the individual skill and independence which is supposed to be the pride and monopoly of French troops, yet with an attention to orders and a steadiness that betrayed the German element. Two charges of the 9th Lancers, first upon a company of skirmishers, and second upon a battalion in retreat, were received with the utmost coolness in that formation of squares which Waterloo made immortal; and perhaps the finest feature in the whole battle was the retreat of three regiments of infantry in hollow squares, with the terrible Lancers hovering within a few hundred yards, and eagerly watching for the slightest confusion. We may add, that the weather was, in all respects, delightful, and the country, from its vast and open downs with deep inclines, admirably adapted for testing the endurance of the men and charming the eyes of the spectators.

Now, the men engaged were, for the most part, inhabitants of the metropolis, and to them Easter Monday has always been a high holiday. Setting aside, then, all military and political considerations, can any one imagine a more advantageous or really more enjoyable method of celebrating a festive day than that under discussion? Instead of an excursion—the chief features in which would probably be the amount of food and drink consumed, equalled only by the difficulty of finding pleasure in doing nothing—the Volunteer has in these field-days all the true pleasures of an excursion without its usual drawbacks. He has hard work undoubtedly; he must get out of bed at 3.30 A.M. and be at parade at 4.30 A.M.; he will be perhaps rather tired when he reaches his home shortly before midnight; but what of that? He has added to his stock of health, he has breathed the fine air of Brighton Downs, he has exercised the muscles of his frame, his faculties of endurance, observation, intelligence, and obedience; he may, perhaps, if he has a touch of the heroic in his character, have formed a faint idea of what his mighty German forefathers were, and why they overthrew the weak and dissolute herds of the old Roman Empire. At least, he has done an act of duty, and he who sees no pleasure in that is unworthy of even the name of a citizen.

But as eye-witnesses of and actors in the doings of Easter Monday, we venture to go a little further than this, and honestly wish that some master of the art of war, not an Englishman, but some Marshal of France or a General Lee, had seen the Volunteers at Brighton, who we firmly believe might be led into action without tarnishing the honour of such officers. General Lee, at least, has won battles with men scarcely so well drilled and assuredly worse armed, and his adversaries were neither weak nor cowardly, however indifferent their commanders or their cause may have been. Moreover, if the realities of war arose, the additional ardour and the additional drill and discipline would produce immense effects on troops already fully organised and equipped.

If these conclusions are just, what a source of pride is such an institution to a free country; what a contrast to other communities, where such schemes would seem the act of an insane administration! For these volunteers are raised, clothed, drilled, and equipped almost entirely at their own expense; the only aid which is furnished by Government is the supply of arms and a small capitation grant; and this patriotic sacrifice of time, of ease, and of money has produced kindred effects in all classes. To give one example, we believe that we are correct in stating that the whole county of Sussex is mapped out and catalogued, and that the War Office has returns of the horses and oxen waggons and carts which each landowner and farmer has volunteered to supply in any emergency. Nothing, indeed, can be more gratifying than such patriotic acts and undertakings so developed by the Volunteer system, and it must be the desire of all Englishmen that the institution may flourish, and that Easter Monday at Brighton may be as much honoured as Lord Mayor's Day, or even as the Epsom Derby.

We might, perhaps, wish that we could draw some further inferences concerning what may be called the principles of fighting from the field-day at Brighton; but where no one is killed it is not always easy to say how this or that style of action has answered the intended purpose. It may also be conceded that very much must depend on national character, and much also on the causes and circumstances of each particular war. The Austrian soldier is the steadiest in the world and the most dependent; the French soldier is simply the very opposite; but no course of instruction would make an Austrian fight in the Zouave style, or prevent a French Chasseur from lying down and avoiding unnecessary exposure. Again, the Polish Scythian is terrible; and perhaps Stonewall Jackson's division would be very awkward customers if armed only with pikes; but it is the cause that makes them such, and it would probably be as absurd to drill men without regard to character and circumstances, as to adopt the Procrustean method in politics, and fancy that the same political institutions are adapted equally to every variety of nation. The genius of the people, and even the genius of the commander, must be allowed their sway. The Parthian, who seems to have been the personified object of the satire that had his peculiar method of fighting, but he annihilated Crassus and the Roman Legions. On the other hand, it is difficult to understand how any one could in the present day admire the style of fighting immortalised by Leonidas, which simply consisted in fighting till you fell on the exact spot to which you had advanced. Yet reasons other than strategic might make such a system even now advisable, and mercenary troops might refuse to face desperate men fighting for liberty if the former were convinced that the motto of the latter was "Victory or death." Certainly at Brighton the troops were not exposed to such alternatives they fought with intelligence; and what would have been courage had there been danger. The action was a retreat before a superior force; the object was to perform that retreat with as little damage to one side, and as much to the other as was possible. After all, it is the main purpose of all strategy to destroy your enemy and save yourself, and the Field Day at Brighton was a good illustration to novices of one of the many ways in which that purpose may be accomplished.

"He who fights and runs away, Lives to fight another day,"

English Universities.

The formation of the character by influence and association and the formation of the mind by studies, so that the two may combine to produce a youth adapted for the various walks of educated life or the pursuits of science, has been already defined to be the objects of the University system. There is, perhaps, no subject on which so much variety of opinion has existed as the befitting field of intellectual exercise for the mind of man, and perhaps the number of educational philanthropists and amateur schoolmasters is not exceeded by the cloud of amateur politicians. The energies of the English doctrinaires in this particular line of busyness have been for the last two years entirely expended on the rival schemes for educating the masses in the Government schools, and the Universities have been, perhaps, as much unassisted by the advice of philosophers as they have been free from the interference of "quacks." Our object is to give information; we wish neither to be didactic nor polemical, and we endeavour to keep our opinion to ourselves as much as possible; but in justice to the labourers in the vineyard of education at our English Universities, we think it right, before entering upon an exposition of the studies pursued at one of them, to repudiate to some extent the common accusation, that the advice, arguments, and views of great and prudent men on the subject of intellectual training are rejected and contemned by the leading authorities of Oxford and Cambridge. We think the accusation unfounded; there are bigots, stiff-necked, blind, and infatuated, to whom learning has only a dædal conceit, in all places and under all systems; but many men of large and liberal ideas are ready to welcome the suggestions and adopt the conclusions of enlightened philosophers, and do not stop to inquire whether these are of the initiated or not. Perpetual routine teaches a faith in routine, and the victims of it feel the power which they are unable to resist; aid from without, the untrammelled and unbiassed wisdom of a stranger, is their best hope of freedom which they will neither condemn nor reject. If the mouse is a welcome liberator to the entangled lion, surely the lion will not despise the aid of his fellow hunter.

That the University of Cambridge has opened its gates wide to the admission of new sciences, we shall presently show, but first, the ancient subjects claim attention. Now, we have in former articles frequently spoken of the degree of "Bachelor of Arts," which we have shown to be the usual result of a three years' residence in the University. To the attainment of this degree an examination is, of course, a condition precedent; but these examinations, though the same degree is the common result of all who differ widely in their nature, their difficulty, and their attendant honours. The student whose heart shrinks alike from the corrupt intricacies of Æschylus and the appalling feature of the Binomial Theorem, may content himself with a rather moderate acquaintance with the first rudiments of mathematics, a little classics, and still less history and divinity, but he must bow to that destiny which consigns his relative superiority or inferiority to his competitors to an untimely and perpetual oblivion. He is as much a "Bachelor of Arts" as Whewell or the Professor of Greek ever were, but posterity knows not by what ladder he reached that glorious eminence. Fortunately for Cambridge ambition is the ruling passion of her sons, and the numbers of those who reach the goal by the highway of glory is far greater than that of the men who seek it by the paths of a painful mediocrity.

The great renown of Cambridge in point of wisdom is said to rest on the wonderful proficiency of her mathematicians, and it is on their examinations that she pours forth the energies of her laborious ingenuity. One hundred and twenty of her sons emerge annually from the ordeal, and the first of these is the "god" of the hour. The successful candidates for "honours" in this field of competition as in all others are arranged in three classes, and the members of each class are arranged in order of merit. The struggle lasts for nine days; the abstruseness of the questions and the intricacy of the problems increase day by day in geometrical progression, while the number of those to whom the subjects are intelligible, of course, decreases in an inverse ratio; the result of the whole process being that the gradual elimination of the beaten competitors at length places the enthusiastic Examiner face to face with a select band of invincible calculators. The whole business is transacted on paper, and the system of a viva voce inquiry is now never employed in the matter of "honours." The sittings last for about three hours, and first-rate men write incessantly, and with a rapidity which thought rather aids than impedes, and which would leave far in the rear the speed of a copyist or even of a writer to dictation. In fact, quickness of hand and neatness in execution are indispensable to supreme success, in a case where the test must necessarily be the highest combination of quantity and quality.

The next department of knowledge and competition, both in usage and importance, is that of the classical languages and literature, and here also the ordeal necessary to success is almost as terrible as that already portrayed. It is evident, however, that the classical scholar has more scope for natural genius, that he may substitute taste and accuracy for rapidity of execution, and that the touches of a refined imagination and the purity of an artistic elegance will not lose by comparison with the results of a grosser but more voluminous compositor.

So much then for the examinations; the subjects themselves, perhaps, claim a passing notice. As to the mathematics, it is not necessary here to dilate upon their adaptation to the purpose of hardening the comprehensive powers of the intellect, and strengthening the reason and memory; nor, perhaps, is it worth while to argue a proposition pretty generally allowed, even by detractors, that mathematics at Cambridge are taught thoroughly well, and that the standard of excellence is very high. But one word about the classical studies may be essential. No one doubts, probably, that it is right to make classical studies an early and prominent part of liberal education, but the question is in what spirit and with what purpose are the great Greek and Latin authors to be studied?—It is said, and with much truth, that these authors are read at Cambridge, not so much for what they say, but how they say it; or again, that the Historians are not read for the great historical truths to be learned from their works; that Plato and Aristotle fail to excite a spirit of philosophical or ethical inquiry, and that the vast imagination, exquisite taste, and grand conception of the poets are unperceived; while all undergo a process of verbal dissection and microscopic inspection of style, only that their language may be a subject for a formal and vain criticism, and that their words and phrases may be reproduced in the prose and verse composition of the student, by a method of imitation as unmeaning and servile as it is destitute of the spirit and power that dictated the original. Such is a not uncommon accusation, and to a portion of the indictment Cambridge must plead guilty. The language of the Greek and Latin writers is her first care. She thinks that philosophy and ethics have a domain of their own, and are not, strictly speaking, classical. She especially adds a knowledge of Greek and Roman history as an important element in the classical examination, and she argues that the painful investigation of the author's language is not necessarily unobservant of his ideas and imagination. For our part, we have no wish to speak authoritatively. We know that Oxford has adopted the very opposite system, while Germany has gone almost hand in hand with Cambridge; but it must not be ignored that by the united efforts of the devotees of verbal criticism, the study of the classical languages has in reality assumed the form of a fixed and abstract science, is possessed of similar attributes, and is capable of producing similar results. With regard to the relative dignity of the honours obtained in the mathematical and classical examinations, it will suffice to say that public opinion knows no distinction, and that fellowships at the various colleges are conferred on the students who have attained to the most exalted positions in each with rigid impartiality. A nominal precedence is conceded to the first mathematician, because of the greater antiquity of the institution of that ordeal, but whether it be more desirable to be the first mathematician or the first classic of the year is a point which individual taste and inclination can alone decide.

In addition to these, Cambridge has lately instituted new themes for the trial of the intellectual powers, and holds an annual examination in moral sciences and natural sciences. Not only has the degree of "Bachelor of Arts" been offered to the successful candidates in these departments, but arrangements have also been made to enable the mathematicians and the classical scholars, who are sufficiently ambitious, to gain farther honours. Certainly the list of subjects in each of the new sciences is by no means contemptible. Under the head of Moral Sciences are ranged moral and mental philosophy, logic, history, and political philosophy, political economy, general jurisprudence, and the history of philosophy; under that of Natural Sciences, we find chemistry, mineralogy, geology, botany, zoology, with comparative anatomy and comparative physiology. How far the new institutions will be able to hold their own against their time-honoured rivals it is not easy to determine. At present they only number eleven years of existence, and though by no means hindered by the authorities, they have found but little favour with the students. The average number of the successful candidates in mathematics has been already given: the classics claim sixty annual aspirants for honours, while the moral sciences have had but seventy in ten years, and the natural sciences fifty-eight in the same time. But what is more unfortunate still, they rather sink than rise in popular favour. Indeed, in one instance, within the last three years, one of them has displayed a list of but three devotees, and the other not one. Success without adversaries is absurd; hence men of great talent refuse to compete, a general distrust of the reality of the test is engendered, and the honour seems too barren to compensate for the labour. Degrees in laws, medicine, and music are conferred on the University, but the candidates are not numerous, and we have no space to dwell on this unimportant portion of the subject.

Having now considered the nature and results of these intellectual contests, it is necessary that we should say a word as to the means by which the knowledge requisite for the successful competitor is acquired; and remarkable as every English institution, political or social, is for its contradictions and anomalies, it may be doubted whether any one of them can boast anything so strange, and apparently so indefensible as the department of instruction at Cambridge. In the first place, each college undertakes the education of its own students; and as each charges for the article "tuition," it might reasonably be supposed that the particular commodity would be supplied to the required extent. Undoubtedly each has a staff of tutors and lecturers, and it would be false to deny that lectures are delivered and attended. But, although a conjecture might be hazarded by a stranger, that the nearer the time of the struggle the more frequent and the more assiduous would be the meeting of tutor and scholar, the contrary is the fact. In some colleges a fixed number, and never an excessive number of lectures is delivered during the terms, that is, during about twenty-five weeks in the year, and all students of the particular species of learning are expected to attend. In others, dispensations are granted in increased numbers as the third year of residence approaches, till at length absolute emancipation is attained. It may be, and often is the case, that the tutor, zealous of the credit of his college, and conscientious in his work, spends hours and days in the preparation of a candidate who bears unmistakably the mark of success, but he does so of his free will, by way of patriotism, and not because it is part of his regular business. If the teachers of mathematics and classics are sought, they will be found in a race indigenous now to Cambridge, not originally part of the system, still theoretically ignored, practically the sheet-anchor of learning. These are the private tutors. Of course they are members of the University, and live within the walls of the colleges, or in the town; but they are not officials, they neither exercise control over their pupils, nor are they either paid or recognised by the regular tutors. On the other hand, they are miracles in their line of art; they not only possess the most consummate skill in the science of imparting knowledge, but they stand in the front ranks in scholarship and mathematical power. From the great experience possessed by the leaders of their class, and from the fact that men of the same calibre place themselves under the same private tutor, it not unfrequently happens, that the latter can form a most accurate estimate of the relative chances of success in the several competitors; at times also there is a concentration upon one private tutor as upon a great barrister. Perhaps this is more frequently the case in classics than in mathematics. Indeed, we recollect but a very few years since, that out of eleven candidates, whom the examiners thought worthy to be placed in the first class in classics, ten had been prepared by the same master-hand. The best scholars will go to the best teacher, and to the inferior scholars the great critic is unintelligible. At the present moment, when the services of one who is in our opinion the first scholar in England can be obtained, it is no marvel that there is on the one side an insatiable demand, and on the other an approximate monopoly. Probably, if the neglect of duty on the part of the Colleges be set aside, the system has no decided blot beyond the increased expenditure of the education. All private tutors, however, are not Porsons nor Newtons, and every student may rest assured that, whatever be the character of his individual enterprise, he will experience no difficulty in finding the professor of that particular line, and that he will enter the lists trained and prepared after a fashion that would excite the envy of a prize-fighter or the owner of a Derby favourite.

There is yet another class, more brilliant in position and of conspicuous renown—the great army of Professors. In assigning to them functions of utility in the immediate and practical sense of the word we should be in error. At the first blush the thought naturally occurs that in them the true powers and instruments of instruction are to be sought. It is not intimated that they despise the task; perhaps they were never intended for it, perhaps they do not harmonise in their gravity and wisdom with the rush and struggle of the competitors for honours. In numbers they are twenty-six, and among them are Professors of Divinity, Languages, and Moral and Natural Sciences. Some deliver lectures at stated periods of the year to well-filled benches of involuntary students, others to select parties of volunteers. In the former case the advantages to learning are slight, for the student who aspires to honours is never included in the "conscription;" in the latter case the audience is composed of devotees of a particular line of Physical Science. Indeed, the Professors at an English University must be regarded as the embodied representatives of Arts and Sciences; they are the aristocracy of learning; they wear the purple and fine linen of philosophy; they are authorities accepted not only in Cambridge and Oxford, but in England and in Europe; their toils, self-instructive, if not teaching others, carry forward the standard of knowledge, and mark the way for followers. In the deeper sciences, in those that require the devotion of a life-time, to know little or to know superficially is worse, perhaps, than declared ignorance. The few must be accepted for the many, and must compensate for the lack of numbers by the plenitude of excellence. They demand recognition, and they have the right to it; that which they profess is necessary to the human race, and the passive recipients cannot refuse duly to honour those that supply the want. Attempts have been recently made with the view of utilising more extensively the professorships for the purposes of instruction; such an experiment would neither be a great hinderance to the original objects of the institution, nor deteriorate the standard of talent attained; but the results of the experiment are bounded by the fact that but two Professors represent the subjects in which "Honours" are eagerly sought, and that one of these is already so employed. Such a question is not of any deep importance, and is only mooted perhaps in deference to a supposed agitation. We think that at a great University all Arts and Sciences, in the pursuit of which in all ages the genius of man has been developed, should be represented, and while the bench of the Professors of them is worthily filled we are not much allured by a scheme the tendency of which is merely to add to the abundant list of ordinary teachers.

Easter Monday.

We lately looked over a comprehensive collection of Nineteenth Century ballads, and though they were not so spirited as those of an earlier date, or perhaps did not appear so spirited on account of their newness, they were amusing and instructive. We could trace in them the great political changes that have taken place since the year 1800. Gradually the ballads lose their political significance. Social questions take the lead, and if public affairs are referred to, it is only to make a joke, not to point a moral. A composition called "Finality John," and which, we were told, sold prodigiously, was evidently not inspired by any ill-will to Lord Russell, but merely by the desire of not missing a promising opportunity of having a little fun by caricaturing an eminent personage. This political indifference does not arise from the apathy of political decay, but the masses of the community never care about parties, and fortunately for many years we have not been divided into factions. Amongst other ballads, we glanced over those that were written and bawled in honour of the marriage of Queen Victoria, and we were struck with the stress laid upon the incident of a Monday being selected for the celebration thereof. It was evidently regarded as a droll and remarkable circumstance. Saturday was and still is the fashionable day, as Friday is the unlucky day, and Monday the unfashionable day. Whether Belgravia was shocked at the selection of the last instead of the first we know not, but undoubtedly it amused the crowd. Monday is the holiday of the working classes, and in some trades all the Mondays in the year are observed as "blue" Mondays. One reason for this is that Sunday is not with us a day of pleasure. It is true there are Sunday excursions, but there is a comparative sobriety and decorum, a kind of sedate and sober restraint observed by the Sunday excursionist that would rather astonish those well-intentioned but mistaken individuals, who would make it a punishable offence for the artisan to visit the green fields on his only day of leisure; the consequence is that Monday, which is so conveniently near pay day, is, as far as possible, devoted to pleasure-seeking.

Easter Monday is the carnival of the English working classes; and it must be a poor heart that does not sympathise with the enjoyment of the multitude. From early morning until midnight, railroads, public gardens, theatres, music halls, and all places of recreation are thronged with men, women, and children, who are determined by sheer hard work to get as much pleasure out of the day as they can. Nothing depresses them. If it is wet they enjoy the fun of being crammed into inconveniently small covered places,—if the sun shines so much the more comfortable for them. Perhaps they determine to have eight hours at the seaside, and after investing their half-crowns in return tickets, find themselves penned like sheep in miserable railway carriages, and travelling at the rate, including stoppages, of an old stage coach, so that when they get to the sea, they have only just time to glance at it, to return to the station, and to fight for places in a train that is about four hours over due when it reaches London. Well, they do not grumble, or threaten to write to the papers; but they laugh, joke, and sing,—or at least they try to sing, for in spite of the skill of Mr. Hullah in the art of teaching we have not yet become as musical as the Germans.

One of the most popular amusements of the people has been nearly put down by the rigid construction of an Act of Parliament and the unwonted exertions of the police. Why fairs should be so persecuted we know not. Is there anything sinful in indulging a taste for gingerbread nuts, or in taking "three shies a penny," or in having a turn at the roundabout or the whirligig? As for the dancing booths, we presume they are quite as respectable as London casinos. However, the police are bent in this case upon obeying their superiors, and fairs are only held here and there, and their jollity and attractiveness have departed. But though Greenwich has lost its famous fair, it continues to be a favourite resort on Easter Monday, and is as well attended as though there was no such place as Brighton, or no such sight as "the Volunteer Review." The holiday folk, dressed in their best and thinnest—the damsels who make holiday on Easter Monday appear in summer attire, no matter what may be the state of the weather—stroll about the fine old park, or run and roll down the charmingly steep hill, as did their fathers and mothers before them. There is not much chance of imbibing pure country air in consequence of the quantity of genuine shag burnt in pipes of wood and clay, and of the number of those "far-famed Cubas, ten for a shilling," that are puffed by the young men who look upon a cigar in the mouth as a certificate of manhood and a mark of gentility. We hope Mr. Gladstone's recent legislation will enable those who cannot afford dear cigars to procure cigars that are cheap and not nasty. It also occurs to us that free-trade in wine might provide for the holiday folk a more wholesome and pleasant beverage than ginger beer, a vile compound at all times, but which on such a day as Monday last is much more so than usual, for when depressed by the cold east wind, it refuses to pop, comes from the bottle as flat as ditchwater, and looks like bilious soapsuds.

Our national holidays are few, perhaps too few; and we wish better provision could be made for the amusement of the people. The Volunteer Review is excellent, and it suggests a review of regular troops in London. A review in Hyde Park would cost little and gratify thousands. Besides, the country owes something to the holiday folks; for their pleasures incidentally contribute to the national coffers. The smoking and the drinking—even the Greenwich tea at ninepence a-head—brings in a revenue to the Exchequer. The shareholders of the metropolitan railroads get a little profit out of Easter Monday excursions, and that little profit pays its quota of property tax. In France, reviews are frequent; and we never heard that they impaired the efficiency of the soldiers, but on the contrary, they are thought to be useful for the purpose of discipline.

Easter Monday at the theatres was this year duly observed and celebrated. At the Haymarket, there was a panorama of the Prince of Wales's Eastern tour, ending with a picture of St. George's Chapel during the celebration of the royal wedding. At the Olympic, a comic version of Handel's Acis and Galatea was produced, and though it was a success, we think the selection of the subject shows questionable taste. At the Strand, a burlesque, by Mr. H. J. Byron, was played for the first time, founded on the tale of the "Forty Thieves," and entitled "Ali Baba, or the Thirty-nine Thieves," in accordance with the author's habit of taking one off. We need not add that every line was enlivened by a pun; and that when the puns were not good, they were so egregiously bad as to provoke loud laughter and hearty applause. The judgment of an Easter Monday audience is, however, not of much account, for on that evening all the theatres are filled, and all the pieces and actors are applauded. The holiday folks pay their money to be amused, not to criticise, and they are right, for fault-finding is the business of those who do not pay.

A GLANCE AT SOME NEW BOOKS.

About four thousand books are annually published in England, in addition to the streams of periodical literature that are constantly issuing from our prolific and exhaustless presses; yet there is little new under the sun, so far as the world of letters is concerned. From the gross total we must deduct new editions and translations, and of the remainder—the so-called original works—very few have any claim to novelty, even in style and arrangement. The student who reads abundantly the classics and the books that were written prior to or immediately after the invention of printing, will find little to instruct him in the literature of the nineteenth century; but for all that, we do not deny that in the multitude of new books there is much gain, for with the general reader old truths have more influence when presented in new forms. For instance, the “History of England” by Macaulay, although, to quote Mr. Bright’s bull, it displays a warm neutrality to the Whigs, has done wonders in making Englishmen familiar with the history of their country, and in making constitutional Government understood and appreciated on the Continent of Europe; yet it was not new in the full meaning of the term, and to have so characterised it would have been to incur the indignant displeasure of its brilliant author. But not many books are so far new as Macaulay’s History, of which not only the style and arrangement are original, but many of the facts contained in it were dug out with as much research and assiduity—and by a process involving as much genius—as the man of science brings to bear upon his experiments. Mr. Sutherland Edwards, the Times’ special correspondent in Poland, has just published a useful book on that country, that ran through a first edition in a few days, and will run through many editions ere the year closes, if Russia does not sooner proclaim that Poland is tranquil, whether it be the tranquillity induced by a generous peace or by the national death; but Mr. Edwards has not done more than bind up together, without an attempt at order, a number of authenticated statements all valuable in their way, and all relating to the Polish question. Good digestion is as much promoted by the proper order of the courses as by the wholesomeness of the several dishes, and upon the digestion of the food depends the nutriment derived by the body. We wish Mr. Edwards’s good food had been better cooked, and that the roast had not come before the soup, and the sweets before the meat. Nevertheless Mr. Edwards did well, considering how short a time he was allowed to prepare his MS. for the printer—there is intrinsic evidence that there was a devil at his elbow plaguing him for copy from the moment he undertook the work until he had written the last folio—and those who feel a special interest in the Polish revolution ought to read the “Polish Captivity,” and having read it, to feel grateful to the author.

Our sensation novelists are not more original than our sensation dramatists. Long before Mr. Boucicault adapted The Collegians, and Colleen Bawn was the rage, actors had made terrific leaps upon feather-beds, yet that agile actor obtained, as we understand, a species of copyright in the jumping scene; and it now appears that years before Miss Braddon published “Lady Audley’s Secret” and “Aurora Floyd,” a Mr. Fullom had published a novel called “The Man of the World,” which Miss Braddon says she did not read until her own works were notorious, but which, if we had not this assurance, we might very well have supposed to have suggested them to her mind, so many and close are the coincidences, as may be seen from the following points of resemblance selected from the thirty or forty given by Mr. Fullom in his letters to the Morning Herald:—

Man of the World.—The story opens with the marriage of Rosalie, a girl of 20, with Sir Blundell Haughton, a baronet of 50, whom she accepts for his wealth, and who has a daughter about her own age.

Man of the World.—Lady Haughton has jilted her lover to marry the baronet, and the lover appears immediately after the marriage, to her great discomposure.—(p. 38.)

Man of the World.—The narrative describes the impression made on Danvers, Lady Haughton’s lover, by the portrait.—(p. 79.)

Man of the World.—The secret passage at the old country house is accidentally discovered by Amy.—(p. 353.)

Man of the World.—The portrait at the old country house is connected with the secret passage.—(p. 353.)

Lady Audley’s Secret.—The story opens with the marriage of Lucy, a girl of 20, with Sir Michael Audley, a baronet of 56, whom she accepts for his wealth, and who has a daughter about her own age.

Lady Audley’s Secret.—Lady Audley has thrown over her first husband to marry the baronet, and he appears just after the marriage, to her great embarrassment.

Lady Audley’s Secret.—The narrative describes the impression made on Talboys, Lady Audley’s first husband, by the portrait.—(p. 142, vol. i.)

Lady Audley’s Secret.—The secret passage at the old country house is accidentally discovered by Alicia.—(p. 5, vol. i.)

Lady Audley’s Secret.—The secret passage at the old country house leads to the portrait.—(p. 136, vol. i.)

Man of the World.—The scene in Mrs. Addlefield’s apartments reveals the mysteries of the toilet, as performed by the lady’s-maid, showing how the mouth is “furnished” with “a complete set of pearls,” the “cheeks with a delicate bloom,” the “head with flowing locks,” this “transformation” being “effected” by the French maid, and a comparison is suggested between the relations of a lady to her maid and those of a hero to his valet.—(pp. 316, 317.)

Man of the World.—Eleanor changes her name on flying from home (p. 126), and is engaged by Mrs. Mayburn without a reference and without inquiry about her antecedents, which afterwards provokes the sarcasms of Mrs. Windham.—(p. 195.)

If not so passing strange, it is more amusing to find authors unconsciously original. “Nobly False” is a sensation novel by Mr. J. McGrigor Allan. It appears this gentleman intended to portray the character of Shelley in fiction. What he has produced is as much a fac-simile of Shelley as it is of Mr. Spurgeon. Indeed, we should have classed “Nobly False” as original, but that we have a shadowy remembrance of having on other occasions had to read similar originals by the same author; in one of which, if we recollect rightly, we were introduced to a fashionable Countess, living somewhere in the neighbourhood of Piccadilly, who devoted her mornings partly to callers, and partly to teaching a charming young author how to use a pistol, so that he might shoot a fashionable villain who had wronged her; and another, which was something about the last moments, or the last hours of a bachelor. Every Jack has his gill, and it is possible that every author has his readers; but, certainly, if the reading public sympathised with our taste, Mr. Allan would be a dire enemy to those careful housewives who hoard up and ultimately sell their waste paper.

Another case of unconscious imitation is worth passing notice. We have not examined the matter for ourselves, and only give the facts secondhand. Dr. Wynter wrote an excellent little book called “Our Social Bees,” and his admirers, or perhaps his publishers, were disgusted at seeing an article in a popular serial, which bore a very striking resemblance to a part of “Our Social Bees.” At length it is discovered that before “Our Social Bees” was written an article appeared in another popular periodical, from which it might seem to ill-natured people the Doctor derived some of the materials for his work. In politics and history, as well as in popular science, it is curious to note how information is gleaned. First comes the special correspondent’s letters, then leaders thereon, then articles in reviews, and then a book which is a jumble of special correspondents’ letters, and review articles. But let those who feel disposed to sneer at this way of preparing history recollect upon what much less reliable witnesses than newspapers historians have hitherto had to rely. If there had been an independent daily press when the Stuarts were kings of England, we do not say that liberty would have been preserved without the decapitation of a monarch, or that the Constitution would have been saved without the expulsion of James II.; but assuredly the story of their times would have been told much more effectively, “The History of England, from the Accession of James I. to the Disgrace of Chief Justice Coke,” by Mr. Samuel B. Gardiner, which has just appeared, would, in that case have been more satisfactory, though we should be sorry, by this remark, to be thought to disparage Mr. Gardiner’s painstaking and valuable work. He is neither so lively nor so deeply read as Macaulay, but, then, he does not seek by the history of the past to glorify his political friends or to damage his political enemies. Mr. Gardiner is not free from prejudice, or even from the heinous offence of marshalling facts to support pet theories, but his prejudice is not excessive, and his theories are plausible and not insisted on dogmatically. With regard to the defence of Bacon, we can only remark that we consider it an unnecessary labour, for it seems to us that Mr. Hepworth Dixon’s vindication is all-sufficient, so long as those who delight to picture Bacon as the meanest as well as the wisest of mankind tacitly confess they are unable to answer it.

There is not a royal road to learning; and authorship—except the writing of love stories and tenth-rate sensation novels—can never be made easy; but the labour will be diminished by such publications as Mr. Noel Sainsbury’s “Calendar of State Papers. Colonial Series. East Indies, China, and Japan, 1613-1616.” Mr. Sainsbury

Lady Audley’s Secret.—The scene in Lady Audley’s apartments reviews the mysteries of the toilet as performed by the lady’s-maid, showing how she is aware that “pearly teeth are foreign substances supplied by the dentist,” the “ivory complexion bought,” and that “the glossy plaits are the relics of the dead;” the “lady’s-maid is by to see the transformation effected,” and a comparison is suggested between the relations of a lady to her maid and those of the veiled prophet of Korazin to his valet.—(pp. 57, 58, vol. iii.)

Lady Audley’s Secret.—Helen changes her name on flying from home, and is engaged by Mrs. Vincent without a reference and without inquiry about her antecedents, which afterwards provokes the sarcasms of Miss Tongs. (p. 166, vol. ii.)

is an admirable editor from his complete self-abnegation. He gives us unadorned facts, but for all that, he produces a very readable volume. Englishmen may justly feel proud of their ancestors, for our Eastern supremacy, which has been so valourously maintained, was established by their dauntless spirit of enterprise. The daring adventurers of the sixteenth century were worthy to prepare the field for such men as Sir James Outram, the Lawrences, and Sir Henry Havelock. Our forefathers, too, were highly inventive and suggestive. The overland route is a modern institution, but two hundred and fifty years ago it was proposed to send persons from the East Indies by the way of Aden and thence by the Caspian Sea to England.

Not to know that one has a digestive organization is health and happiness. Directly a man is practically conscious that he has a liver and a heart he is a fit subject for medical treatment. This is even more true of the body politic. A people may have a history, and a very bloody and exciting one too, and thrive; but so soon as they have a disposition for studying the constitution of their country they are almost sure to attempt to improve it, and the more perfect the Constitution the sooner it is destroyed by quack-doctoring. It is our happiness that we are content to know that our Constitution works well, and not to care one jot about its anomalies, or to desire to see it defined with the precision of a religious creed. “The Constitutional History of England since the Accession of George III., by Thomas Erskine May, C.B.,” is not an attempt to so define the Constitution, but as its name implies, a history of its working. It is a valuable contribution to our literature, and whilst it is a text-book for the politician and the public writer, it will find favour with the general reader. Mr. Erskine brings his work down to our own times, and though he betrays a partiality for Lord Palmerston, that is, a tendency to defend as well as state the noble lord’s policy, we must give him great credit for wonderful impartiality. Mr. Erskine is a Liberal, yet no more Liberalism appears in his work than would be approved by a vast majority of the Conservatives.

“The Best Form of Government,” by Sir G. C. Lewis, is also a neutral work, but not likely, we think, to prove of any utility. Accepting our War Secretary for a political guide, we must assume that all forms of Government are equally susceptible of being turned to good account, or of being misused. It is unnecessary to say that what proceeds from the accomplished pen of Sir G. C. Lewis is marked with thought and betrays deep and extensive erudition; but if any people on the face of the earth are thinking about adopting a new form of Government, and are uncertain what form to try, we hope they will not get hold of this book, as they may then possibly vote all forms of Government bad, and essay to do without any form of Government at all. We are glad, however, that Sir G. C. Lewis does not adopt the patriotic prejudice of our countrymen, and recommend our own form of Government as the very best for all nations. It is the best for us, no doubt, but it does not follow that it will do for other peoples and countries.

“The Nationalities of Europe,” by R. G. Latham, M.A., M.D., is a very learned work, but only valuable to those who take a deep interest in the subject, and who will therefore study it. We mention these volumes by way of caution. If any one, seeing the title announced, should imagine that they will help him to learn what the map of Europe would be if every nationality was a separate power, he will be greatly disappointed. Dr. Latham’s book is calculated to make us think the only practical definitions of nationality are geographical boundaries. It seems to us that the question of descent ought not to be mixed up with the question of political nationality. We do not imagine that the present inhabitants of Greece are descendants of the ancient Greeks; but they nevertheless constitute a nation. Where there is the same religion, the same tongue, strong political affinities, assimilation of character, and identity of interests, there we have what is politically a nationality. A common descent is a priori evidence of a nationality because it involves these identities.

“Incidents in My Life,” by D. D. Home, the Medium, is a business circular on a large scale, and it will doubtless pay. Mr. Home says many respectable people believe in him, and to this we reply that many respectable people believed in those rank impostors, the Cock Lane Ghost and Johanna Southcote. Respectability—id est, having money and station—is not necessarily allied to wisdom. Mr. Home must not suppose that he and the rappers are the sole dealers in the supernatural. The so-called gipsies, whose fingers have such an affinity for family plate, find a multitude of dupes to cross their palms with silver and to believe their gibberish.

One of the most amusing books lately published is the “Diary of an Austrian Secretary of Legation, at the Court of Czar Peter the Great. Translated from the original Latin, and edited by the Count Mac Donnell." The name of the Secretary is Korb, who was attached to the mission sent in 1698, by the Emperor of Germany, to Peter the Great, and of which Von Gaurient was the chief. In 1700, Korb published a diary of the mission, but it so displeased Peter the Great, that at his request the Emperor of Germany had it destroyed, and but few copies escaped. Besides the copy found by Count MacDonnell in Italy, there are three others, one of which is in the British Museum. Apropos of this we may remark that Mr. Disraeli, the leader of the Conservatives in the House of Commons, has been unanimously elected as a Trustee of the British Museum, in the place of the late Marquis of Lansdowne, who was a Whig. Since the office is not political, the choice will gratify Liberals as well as Conservatives. The Rt. Hon. gentleman has an opportunity of doing a public service, by exercising his influence in having valuable MSS., such as Korb's Diary, published. We can see no reason why curiosities of literature should be buried in Bloomsbury. We have frequently met with Essays on the Life and Times of Peter the Great, which would have been all the more accurate and intelligible if "Korb's Diary" had been translated and published. This book puts in an appearance at rather an opportune moment. It certainly does away with anything like respect for Peter the Great, who is represented as a coarse, heartless savage. Moreover, it tells us a great deal about the atrocities perpetrated to avenge the rebellion of the Strelitzes; and, although we would not so far insult the common sense of our readers as to compare the present Emperor with Peter, these accounts give a kind of force to the tales told of Russian cruelties to the Poles. We repeat that this Diary is one of the, if not the, most interesting book of the season.

To those who prefer homely gossip we can recommend the "Journals and Correspondence of Thomas Sedgwick Whalley, D.D." who was born in 1746, brought up for the Church, obtained plenty of the loaves and fishes—his father was Master of Peterhouse, and Regius Professor of Divinity at Cambridge—moved in the best society at Bath, and was acquainted with Mrs. Siddons and a host of celebrities. If he did little for his day and generation, he rendered a slight service to posterity by keeping a diary. Compared to "Korb's Diary," "Dr. Whalley's Journal" is insignificant, but then the two works ought not to be compared, and both of them are excellent in their several ways.

"The Life and Death of the Irish Parliament," being two lectures by the Rt. Hon. James Whiteside, Q.C., M.P., is distinguished by the eloquence and lucidity that might have been expected by those who are acquainted with Mr. Whiteside's speeches in Parliament. It is, perhaps, not very surprising that at the time of the union of the two parliaments some dissatisfaction should have been felt; but that after the lapse of so many years any Irishmen should be found to regret the decease of a Parliament that was not independent, is remarkable. The Irish Parliament was an anomaly, for it survived the de facto union of the two countries.

Sermons are not generally worth publishing, and particularly the best of all sermons, those that are composed by conscientious clergymen for the special requirements of their congregations; but the "Sermons preached before His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales during his Tour in the East, by A. P. Stanley, D.D.," are a brilliant exception. They are not only interesting from association, but of great intrinsic worth. Dr. Stanley made the best use of a splendid opportunity, and whilst avoiding extravagance and rant, he permitted the scenes through which he passed to have their due influence on his discourses. Dr. Stanley is liberal and orthodox—rather a rare combination in these days.

Cardinal Wiseman delivered a lecture, last summer, at the Royal Institution, on "Points of Contact between Science and Art," and the lecture is deservedly published. The Cardinal's coreligionists admire him greatly as a theologian, and that is a point on which we must decline giving our opinion; but there can be no doubt of his merits as a linguist and an orator, or of his fine appreciation of the works of art and science. As Dr. Wiseman he was well known and respected for his great attainments, and when he received ecclesiastical promotion some ultra-Protestants were rather shocked at hearing that a Protestant Member of Parliament was the avowed friend of the Romish Cardinal. However, even Dr. Cumming can find nothing to object to on the score of theology in this lecture, but much to admire both as to matter and style. Political and religious differences ought not to find place in the republic of letters, only assuming that, as in Cardinal Wiseman's case, an attempt is not made under the guise of literature to propagate sectarian views.

AMERICAN POLITICAL CONTESTS.*

(Concluded from last week.)

THE BEGINNING OF THE END.

It was an unfortunate circumstance that, at a moment when sectional passions had risen to their highest point, and little was wanting to kindle the flames of actual civil war, the supreme executive authority of the United States should have been conferred upon a man of no personal influence or political reputation. Even if Mr. Pierce had been a man of commanding character and extraordinary intellect, he lacked the weight which attaches to an established name and long experience in public life; and he was, unhappily, a merely well-meaning, respectable citizen, fit enough to be the governor or the representative of a minor State, but utterly devoid of the qualities which might have entitled him to the office to which he was called. Had the choice of the Democrats fallen upon Mr. Douglas, whose personal character would have commanded respect, and whose political sagacity would have enabled him to steer a safe and straightforward course through the difficulties that surrounded the Government, it is possible that the "irrepressible conflict" might have been postponed for some years longer. But the selection of a man who, however honest, had not skill to choose the path of safety, nor authority to act as mediator between contending and infuriated factions, precipitated collisions, so frequent and so violent as to leave no hope of postponing much longer the final appeal to arms.

The chief event of President Pierce's administration—which may be considered the commencement of the disruption of the United States—was the organization of the Kansas-Nebraska territories. From the greater part of those territories, lying north of the parallel of latitude 36° 30", and being part of the Louisiana purchase, slavery was excluded by the terms of the Missouri compromise. The consequence of this exclusion would be to place Missouri altogether in the midst of Free States except on the side of Arkansas; and to this her statesmen not unnaturally objected. Accordingly, when the bill for the organization of these territories—which, by an amendment, were separated—was under discussion, a long contention arose as to the conditions to be imposed on them while in their territorial state of pupillage. Were they, in obedience to the compromise, to be declared free soil—subject only to the right of the slaveholder to recover there all fugitives from service? Or was slavery to be established there, in virtual repeal of the Missouri compromise, and in pursuance of the right of citizens of every State to migrate with their property into any part of the common territory of the United States? The great majority of Northern members obstinately insisted on the former course, and complained of the attempt to repeal the prohibitory enactment of 1820, on this the first occasion to which it applied, as a breach of faith. The South insisted on the principle of equal rights in the territories, declaring that the Missouri compromise had been virtually superseded by the arrangements of 1850, and insisting on the application to Kansas-Nebraska of the rule laid down in the case of the Mexican territories, that on becoming qualified as States they should be admitted with or without slavery as their constitutions might prescribe. Mr. Douglas took a view of the matter differing entirely from those of both contending parties. He disputed the right of Congress to legislate for the territories in a political sense, as one nowhere conferred by the Constitution; and alleging the amendment which reserves "to the States respectively, or to the people," all rights not expressly conferred on the Federal Government as warrant for the attribution to the inhabitants of the territory of the same absolute sovereignty over their internal affairs that is enjoyed by those of organized and admitted States. He desired to leave the question of slavery in Kansas to be dealt with by the territorial Legislature; and this view ultimately prevailed. Kansas and Nebraska were constituted territories, and left to choose their own legislators and frame their own laws. The latter territory almost disappears from sight; the former became the scene of the strangest political contest and civil war that history has recorded. The Northern Abolitionists, knowing that the situation of Kansas, and its proximity to the Slave States of Missouri and Arkansas, would, if it were left to natural immigration, inevitably devote it to slave labour, resorted to a scheme of propagandist colonization. They sent thither bands of adventurers, capable of using arms, and not troubled with an over-scrupulous reverence for law or respect for human life, to become nominal settlers, elect a legislature, and by express statute exclude slavery for ever from the soil of Kansas—for ever, inasmuch as such a statute, once passed, prevents slaveholders or pro-slavery from remaining there as settlers. This work was done a little too openly and too boastfully, and the South took umbrage. The Missourians in particular resolved to beat the North with its own weapons. They swarmed over the border, and voted by hundreds in every district near the Missourian frontier. Having the advantage of neighbourhood to the disputed territory, they prevailed; and a Legislature of their way of thinking was returned. Of course, the election was not bona fide, inasmuch as neither the Missourians nor the propagandist immigrants from Massachusetts, and the North were really settlers. The former intended to remain for a few days, the latter for a few weeks, until their respective objects were secured; and the longer residence of the Abolitionists was due only to the more remote situation of their real homes. It is quite evident that the latter had no right to complain. They thought to prevail by a half-legal fraud; they were baffled by a fraud a little more audacious and illegal than their own. In their rage they had recourse to open rebellion; they held elections of their own, assembled a rival Legislature, and finally called a convention to frame a Constitution and apply for admission as a State into the Union. This Legislature, Convention, and Constitution were named from the place of meeting, at Topeka. Meantime the Federal Governor had quarrelled with the Territorial Legislature, on the ground that it had changed the place of meeting from that which he had appointed, and he therefore declared its proceedings null and void. This conduct, based on a pretext so utterly frivolous, induced the President to recall Governor Reeder, who subsequently made evident the intent with which he had acted by accepting a nomination under the auspices of the bogus Legislature at Topeka as territorial delegate to Congress—the delegate returned under his own authority, having already taken his seat there without question. The Topekaites began to collect armed forces, and threaten the State authorities with actual violence; so that the Federal Government was forced to send United States' troops into the country for their protection. It was not very long before actual civil war began, the Abolitionists being led by "General" Jim Lane, John Brown, and other notorious persons of a similar reputation.

In January, 1856, President Pierce addressed a Message to Congress, denouncing the conduct of the Topekaites as flat rebellion—which, in a legal point of view, it undoubtedly was—and recommending that Congress should provide for the assembling of a Convention to frame a Constitution for Kansas, with a view to her admission as a State. Several important reports were presented to both branches of Congress by the Committees to which the subject was referred; Mr. Douglas, in the Senate, urging that the Topekaites were clearly in rebellion against the only body having the shadow of a claim to legislative authority that existed in Kansas, and objecting to any recognition of their pretensions, while Mr. Collamer, who dissented, rested their defence upon the claim of the Northern propagandists to be "the people of Kansas," and treated the Missourians as lawless invaders. An attempt was made in the House to admit Kansas as a State under the Topeka Constitution; the bill, after being once rejected, was reconsidered, passed, and sent up to the Senate, where it was referred to the Committee on Territories. On their report it was rejected, and a bill sent down providing for the assembling of a Convention to form a State Constitution with a view to the admission of Kansas, as soon as she should have the requisite population, but the House allowed this to drop. Finally, the Territorial Legislature of Kansas summoned a Constitutional Convention at Leecompton, which met in June, 1857, framed a Constitution, and submitted to the people the question of slavery or no slavery. The Topeka party not voting, the result was an overwhelming majority in favour of slavery. After this, a Free-soil Legislature was elected under the new Constitution, and this Legislature submitted the whole Constitution to the popular vote—which it had clearly no legal right to do—the result

The Political Text-Book, or Encyclopedia. Edited by M. W. Clusky. (Smith & Co., Philadelphia.)

Thirty Years' View; or, a History of the Working of the American Government for Thirty Years, from 1820 to 1850. Chiefly taken from the Congress Debates, the Private Papers of General Jackson, and the Speeches of Ex-Senator Benson, with his actual view of Men and Affairs; with Historical Notes and Illustrations, and some Notices of Eminent Deceased Contemporaries. By a Senator of Thirty Years. (Benton.)

Abridgment of the Debates in Congress from 1789 to 1853; from Gale and Seaton's Annual of Congress, from their Register of Debates, and from the officially reported Debates by Thomas C. Rives. By Thomas H. Benton.

Debates in the several State Conventions, on the adoption of the Federal Constitution, as recommended by the General Convention at Philadelphia in 1787; together with the Journal of the Federal Convention, Luther Martin's Letter, Yates' Minutes and Congressional Opinions, Virginia and Kentucky Resolutions of 1794-99, and other Illustrations of the Constitution. Collected and revised from Contemporary Publications by Jonathan Elliot, and published under the sanction of Congress.

The Federalist on the New Constitution, written in 1788. By Mr. Hamilton, Mr. Madison, and Mr. Jay. With an Appendix, containing the Letters of Pacificus and Helvetius, on the Proclamation of Neutrality of 1793; also, the Original Articles of Confederation, and the Constitution of the United States. The numbers written by Mr. Madison; revised by himself. (Hallowell, Maine, 1842.)

being an enormous majority against the Lecompton Constitution. Hereupon a schism took place in the Democratic ranks, which was never afterwards healed. Mr. Douglas, justifying the second submission of the Constitution to the popular vote, found himself at issue with President Buchanan and the extreme Southern wing of the party, who were determined to abide by the first vote of the Lecompton Constitution. Ultimately, the quarrel was compromised by an Act offering to admit Kansas with the Lecompton Constitution, on peculiarly favourable terms. This offer was refused, and the matter rested for the time. But blood had been shed, the example of civil and sectional war had been given, and party passions continued to grow more and more furious.

An incident which had occurred during the struggle tended to exasperate their fury. Mr. Sumner, senator from Massachusetts, made a violent speech in the Senate exceedingly insulting to the Southern senators generally, and especially to one of those from South Carolina, who had already spoken in the debate. His language was such as, if used on an English platform, would be thought to justify the party aggrieved in taking the law into his own hands—that is to say, it was a good deal worse than anything that Mr. Bright ever dares to say in the House of Commons, and rather worse than anything he is wont to say out of doors. Preston S. Brooks, of South Carolina, one of the representatives of the State, and a relative of the senator especially assailed, took the matter up. After watching for Mr. Sumner in the street, and failing to meet him, he entered the Senate-chamber when the Senate was not in session, and finding the offender writing at his desk, approached him with menacing words and gestures, at the same time brandishing a small cane. The senator, who is either imbued with Mr. Bright's peculiar notions on such subjects as personal honour and the lawfulness of resistance, or is deficient in nerve, did what Mr. Bright certainly would not have done—he sat still and submitted to be caned. As the cane broke off almost immediately, he did not suffer severely in a physical sense. But even in the North a man is not thought the better of for submitting to be thrashed without defending himself or challenging his assailant, and Mr. Sumner found it advisable to make the injuries he was supposed to have received a pretext for at once disappearing from the public view, and allowing public sympathy to be excited on his behalf. The Senate found that it had no jurisdiction in the matter; the House censured the act of Mr. Brooks, but failed to vote his expulsion by the requisite majority of two-thirds. He resigned his seat, but was immediately re-elected.

There can be no doubt that the act was highly censurable. Incidentally, it was an affront to the Senate; in its essence, it was, as all attacks of the kind are, an abuse of superior physical strength. To have challenged Mr. Sumner, and to have posted him, if he refused to give satisfaction for his outrageous language, would have been the course of a self-possessed gentleman; and no subsequent display of cowardice on the part of the victim can justify or palliate the violence originally committed. The assault was, moreover, exceedingly foolish. The Presidential canvass had already commenced; and the result of this affair was in the highest degree favourable to the chances of the Abolitionist candidate.

Out of the ruins of the Whigs, and the growing strength of the Abolitionists, had been created the Republican party—a party with merely sectional principles and of a purely sectional character. Its one great object was to confine slavery to the States where it already existed, in order to its extinction; and proposed to repeal the Fugitive Slave Law, and do away with all Federal encouragement of or protection to slavery. The candidate of this party was John C. Fremont; then known chiefly as a hardy explorer, now more famous as an insubordinate general, and somewhat more than suspected of pecuniary malpractices during his command in the West.

The Democratic Convention selected as its candidate James Buchanan, by 168 votes to 121 for Douglas.

A third party—calling itself Native American or Knownothing, was represented on this occasion for the first and last time. Its one great principle was that of antagonism to the influence of foreign immigrants, and especially of the Irish Catholics. Its candidate was Millard Fillmore.

The electoral vote was for Buchanan 174, for Fremont 114, for Fillmore 8. The popular vote was for Buchanan 1,834,000, for Fremont 1,341,000, for Fillmore, 393,000.

We do not propose at present to enter upon the more recent political contests which terminated in the election of Mr. Lincoln and the disruption of the Union. It is enough if we have made intelligible to our readers the history of the degeneration of American party conflicts into mere sectional feuds, and the circumstances which, by dividing the Democratic party, destroyed the last hopes entertained by Conservative statesmen of postponing for a few years longer the separation which few believed to be permanently avoidable.

*THE only claim of this little book to even a passing notice is, that it professes to be a "tale of the Confederate States," illustrative of Southern manners, as contrasted with the manners of the North. The most we can do is to give its writer credit for good intentions, and the least we must say is, that he or she (for the production bears unmistakable traces of an inexperienced feminine pen) has undertaken a difficult task without scarcely a single requisite for its tolerable execution. The heroine is a weak-minded girl, whose status, whether white or quadroon, free or slave, remains doubtful until toward the close of the tale, when she turns out to be not only pure white, but an heiress. Pending the solution of the mystery of her birth, she elopes (whence the title) under the fear of being sold, with an emissary of Northern Abolitionism, who combines with his vocation of fanatic those of a gambler and a forger. The hero is a lay figure, supposed to represent the type of the Northern gentleman. There is, besides, a brutal, cruel overseer, and some much exaggerated "negro talk," to give the tale a Southern complexion. A group of absurd caricatures, whose connection with the plot it is impossible to discover, are made to do duty as representatives of Northern manners. Plot, indeed, there is none. The reader is left with a vague impression on his mind that the author meant to convey the idea of a fugitive slave, spurned by the spurious philanthropy of the North, and driven at last in very despair to seek refuge even by a return to slavery. If this was the meaning, it is difficult to imagine how any one could have more signally failed in impressing it. If the author could be said to have succeeded in anything, it would be to have caricatured both sections of the late Union, only that the characters and scenes possess so little of likeness to life that they cannot be termed caricatures.

We do not wish to be severe upon this little work, and but for the fear that it might be adduced as a specimen of Southern literature, we should charitably have said nothing at all. But the South has suffered scarcely less from ill-advised friends and indiscreet defenders, than from malicious defamers. Since the advent of "Uncle Tom's Cabin," it had become the fashion of the Southern press to encourage, from a mistaken idea of patriotism, every champion, however incompetent, who challenged Mrs. Beecher Stowe on her own field. On this condition, the most unmitigated trash was certain, if not of praise, at least of indulgent leniency at the hands of Southern critics. If the South wishes a literature of her own, this pernicious system must cease, and to have such a literature nothing is wanting but a correct standard of taste, which independent and even severe criticism can alone form. Fertility of imagination, vigour of thought, and poetic fancy, the sunny clime of the Southern States produce abundantly. An appreciative audience, also, the States afford to aspiring authorship, such as few countries can present. Heretofore the South has been content to receive her novels from the North or from Europe. In political literature alone has the national mind been urged to make an independent effort, and in this the South may challenge competition. We may hope that after the war the same may be true in the paths of romance, but to accomplish this, Southern critics must deal mercilessly with tales like "The Elopement."

THE DEFENCES OF CHARLESTON.

(From the Charleston correspondence of the Mobile Register.)

The struggle, when it comes, will certainly be of a fearful character. It will be the shock of tremendous forces, the relative powers of which are yet untried. The long mooted question of the fighting value of ships against batteries will be brought to a test more conclusive than any to which human warfare has yet subjected it. In other words, the Monitor iron-clads, which the Yankees claim to be the most impetrable vessels ever constructed, will necessarily come within point blank range of the most numerous and powerful batteries that have ever yet been used in a single engagement. We have good reason, too, to believe that our guns will be managed with admirable tact and precision. The more important batteries are manned by the South Carolina regulars, for whom the credit is claimed, and I think justly, of being the most expert and practised heavy artillerymen in the Confederate army. The forts are well officered, and General Ripley, who has made the study of heavy ordnance a specialty for years, and whose excellence in that particular branch of military knowledge is an admitted fact, will, I hear, make his headquarters at Fort Sumter as soon as the enemy makes his appearance.

It is scarcely possible that any floating thing can breast unharmed the concentrated storm of heavy metal from the guns of Sumter, Moultrie, and Battery Bee, the three principal works commanding the throat of the harbour. Nor can the peril of running this terrible gauntlet be diminished by an attempt to pass under cover of the darkness, as has been the case at Vicksburg and New Orleans. So tortuous and intricate is the channel leading to the forts that the most experienced pilots of the harbour would not venture to bring in a vessel by night, under the conditions which the enemy cannot escape, viz., without a light or landmark to guide the way. Even when the blockade-running vessels leave the harbour, it is always necessary to aid their exit by previously arranged lights (shaded) and signals; so that it is reasonably certain that the attacking iron-clads must either enter in open day, or incur the imminent hazard of getting aground upon one of the most treacherous bars on the Southern coast, which seldom yields a vessel once it has grasped the keel. But if, perchance, despite of mazy channel, multiplied torpedoes, and the combined batteries of the forts, some of the nine Monitors should chance to get into port, they would still have to encounter a concentrated fire from other batteries, which, as the Yankee papers have learned from contrabands, "line the shores of the interior of the harbour." And then will come the "tug of war" which will determine the possession of the honoured old city.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE REPULSE OF THE FEDERALS AT FORT M'ALLISTER.

Head Quarters, District Georgia, Savannah,
March 9th, 1863.

(General Orders, No. 21.)

In calling the attention of the troops in this district to the successful repulse, on the 3rd instant, of three turreted iron-clad gunboats and three mortar boats by Fort M'Allister, the brigadier-general commanding again returns his hearty thanks to the brave garrison, and expresses his confident hope that their heroic example will be followed by all under his command. For eight hours these formidable vessels, throwing 15in. hollow shot and shell, 13in. shell, 11in. solid shot, and 8in. rifle projectiles—a combination of formidable missiles, never before concentrated upon a single battery—hurled an iron hail upon the Fort. But the brave gunners, with the cool, efficient spirit of disciplined soldiers, and with the intrepid hearts of freemen battling in a just cause, stood undaunted at their posts, and proved to the world that the most formidable vessels and guns that modern ingenuity has been able to produce, are powerless against an earlwork, manned by patriots to whom honour and liberty are dearer than life. Believing that the repulse of these vessels, with but slight injury to the battery or garrison, marks a new era in the history of the war, the fact is published with proud satisfaction for the information and encouragement of all.

Captain Robert Martin, of Martin's light battery, who commanded the mortar during the engagement, and dropped one of his shells directly upon the deck of the Montauk, deserves, with his detachment, to share all the praise awarded to the immediate garrison.

The vigilance and activity of Captain J. L. M'Allister, and his free exposure to all danger, merit particular mention. His brave marksmen, who lay in the open marsh, within rifle range of the gunboats, are commended to the notice of the troops in this district.

The brigadier-general commanding desires also to commend especially the gallant conduct of the 1st Battalion Georgia sharpshooters, officers and men. This corps, honourably distinguished for its discipline and drill, manned one of the guns of the battery throughout the fight; and during the ensuing night, under a severe and constant fire from the mortar boats, fearlessly repaired all the damage done to the fort, and rendered it by morning better prepared than ever to resist the foe.

The surgeons who volunteered their services and were present during the fight, the chief engineer, Captain John McCrady, and his assistant, James W. McAlpin, to whose zeal and efficient labours the repeated repulses of the Abolition vessels are largely due, deserve honourable mention.

As a testimonial to the brave garrison, the commanding general will be solicited to direct that "Fort M'Allister, March 3, 1863," be inscribed upon their flags.

By command of Brig.-Gen. Mercer.

GEO. A. MERCER, A. A. G.

THE FEELING IN CHARLESTON.

(From the Charleston Courier, February 23rd.)

The hour is at hand, and may burst upon us at any moment, when Carolina "expects every man to do his duty." The high responsibilities of citizen, soldier, and patriot, now rest upon every man, and we must meet them in the language of the stirring Proclamation of General Beauregard, determined to win "a brilliant success or a glorious death." The trial before us is one that will test to the uttermost the martyr spirit of our people; but while we pass through the fire let us remember and emulate the stern lessons of our ancestors. Let us have faith—faith in ourselves; faith in our leaders; faith in our cause; and, above all, faith in that good God whose sheltering arm has ever been round our country. With this we may write the sublimest page in the history of the Confederacy. Without it, our works will be as naught. Rally then, one and all, to the battle cry of "our homes, our altars, and the graves of our kindred!" Let the mountains and valleys of the State pour forth their wealth of sinewy men and sturdy boys to join us in our noble work.

"Come with the weapons at your call,
With musket, pike, and knife;
He wields the strongest blade of all
Who lightest holds his life."

Let men fear not the solemn shadows that are hovering above our city, but with the same proud spirit and stern purpose that animated them in the beginning of the war, strike now in these closing hours of the death-struggle of the monster, with an earnestness that shall teach the enemy how terrible is the might of a people defending their own firesides. Emulate the example of gallant little Vicksburg, and remember, if we fail, the doom of New Orleans. We want no blood here now that will curdle white in the face, but strong arms and stout hearts to build if needs be a wall of fire around this beloved city.

Our prospects are bright. Our defences are as perfect as the science and foresight of man can make them. The attack will be but an experiment, in which the probabilities all lean to our side. Let our determination and constancy in brave doing be but equal to our hopes, and our success is certain. If we are true to ourselves, true to our cause, and true to our country, God will be true to us, and all who come in war will "find a mouthful of our dust in death, and sea beach 'er a grave."

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

AMERICA.

Again the New York papers are discussing the engagement that took place at Port Hudson on the 15th of March; and it seems that, after so many rumours of victory, the credulous Northern public is at last convinced that the Confederate report of the defeat of Farragut's fleet is correct. The New Orleans mail puts an end to doubt. The flag-ship Hartford and the Albatross passed the batteries, but not, as now admitted, altogether uninjured by the fight. The Richmond and the Monongahela were disabled, and together with the rest of the fleet, with the exception of the Mississippi which was blown up, had to retreat. The exact loss sustained by the Federals is not known: they admit that sixty-five officers and men belonging to the Mississippi were killed, wounded, and taken prisoners; that the loss on the Monongahela was six killed and twenty wounded, including several officers; that on the Richmond there were three killed and ten wounded; and that on the Genesee there were three wounded. Among the killed are Commander A. B. Cummings of the Richmond, and Captain McKinstrey of the Monongahela. Possibly later accounts may disclose a larger number of casualties, but the Federal authorities can conceal the loss in men, though they cannot prevent the defeat of the fleet from being known. The Confederate loss is small, owing to the elevation of the batteries. It is rumoured that during the passage of the batteries only two men were wounded.

After the engagement, the fleet, with the exception of the two ships that had passed the batteries, and the Mississippi that had been blown up, returned to Baton Rouge, all of the vessels being "more or less injured."

The land attack was not more fortunate, except that, owing to the prudence of General Banks, who took care not to come too near the foe, the casualties were not so numerous. Banks was to make a diversion, but he did not succeed. He advanced to Springfield, sent out some skirmishers, and returned to Baton Rouge, where he proclaimed that "the object of the advance was accomplished, and that the expedition was an entire success." What object? We learn that Colonel Clark, his chief of the staff, received a wound in the leg, of which he has since died. Was that the object of the advance? It is evident that the people of New York are not so sanguine as General Banks, or rather that they have not implicit confidence in the truthfulness of that gallant commander; for they do not believe that the expedition was an "entire success," but are under the unpleasant impression that the news from the Mississippi is "unfavourable to the Federals."

According to the Philadelphia Enquirer General Banks has achieved another triumphant advance and retreat. It asserts that he sent a brigade of four transports to assist Commodore Farragut, but the transports got aground, and when the troops landed they found the place too swampy, and therefore re-embarked.

It is quite possible, nay, highly probable, that Commodore Farragut has, ere this, been in need of assistance, for it is much easier to maltreat the women and children of New Orleans, than to deal with Confederate fortifications. Farragut has discovered that passing the Port Hudson batteries is by no means the whole of the danger and difficulty incident to his enterprise. The steamers Hartford and Albatross have, it is stated, met with formidable batteries, and both have received some damage; and it was even reported at New York that Farragut had been captured. This, of course, was a rumour only, though it is a possible contingency.

The report that Admiral Farragut had captured the Indianola without resistance is now contradicted. That reliable authority, the Federal Navy Department, states that Farragut says he saw the wreck of the Indianola, that she was partially submerged, and that her upper works were very much shattered by explosion. In reference to this story we must repeat what we said about the capture of the Indianola without resistance—it may be true, but it certainly requires confirmation, for by the latest advices we hear that the Confederates have repaired, and taken her to Alexandria, on the Red River.

We should be guilty of unfairness to General Banks if we did not record another object besides the death of the chief of his staff, that has been gained by his advance and retreat. "The expedition from New Orleans up the teche was abandoned, as all the troops were required to co-operate with Banks." It is not always that the Federals find a plausible excuse for the non-performance of their threats and promises. General Banks is resting on his laurels at New Orleans.

The confirmation of the failure of the attempt to pass Port Hudson is not the most disheartening news that the Federals have received from the Mississippi. On the 25th of March, the Federal rams Lancaster and Switzerland, accompanied by two other vessels, attempted to run past the Vicksburg batteries. On this occasion the pregnability of Federal rams was incontestably proved. As soon as the enemy came within range the Confederates opened a tremendous and well-directed fire. The Lancaster was—we are taking the Federal account—struck thirty times, her bow was shot away, and she sank immediately, turning a complete somersault as she went down. The Federal version says that all her crew were saved with the exception of two, and if so it was a wonderful escape; but in the absence of further details we incline to believe the Southern report, that the Lancaster sank "with all on board." The Switzerland was disabled by a 64-pounder penetrating her steam drum, and she was afterwards set on fire. The fire was extinguished, and she was towed to the mouth of the canal, where she remained thoroughly crippled.

When the intelligence of this disaster was first whispered in the North, it was reported as a compensation that General Sherman had forced the passage of the Sunflower River, and landed his troops near Haines' Bluff. The victory thus opportunely discounted has not been gained; and in place of victory the Federals have to confess to a complete failure. The Federal squadron was driven back, three of the gunboats being disabled, and some of the transports captured or destroyed. General Sherman returned to Young's Point, but we are not informed whether he followed the example of General Banks, and congratulated his troops upon the "entire success" of the expedition.

In our last issue we reported, on Northern authority, that Fort Pemberton had been bombarded by the gunboat Chillicote without result, which we said meant that the gunboat was repulsed. By later advices we are informed the Confederate shot had penetrated her iron mail, and that she was almost a wreck. It is reported that the Federals intend to renew the attack with superior force, and that the Confederates not neglecting the intimation, have made further preparations for defence.

General Grant denies that his troops are suffering from sickness—or at least, he maintains that his command is not worse off than other commands, and he goes so far as to say "it is a great question whether one person in ten could be so well taken care of at home as in the army here." This is not generally the case, at least with European armies, in which the camp is an uncomfortable place for the sick soldiers, and from which they are removed as soon as possible. Nor does it coincide with the testimony of those who have visited Grant's army.

The Yankees are somewhat anxious about General Rosencranz. He is still at Murfreesboro', maintaining a defensive position—a very ominous position for an invading General. The Confederates are in strong force at Tullahoma. On the 26th of March, General Forrest attacked the Federals in the rear of General Rosencranz, at Brentwood, a place about nine miles from Nashville, and as he captured 800 prisoners, including 35 officers, and a large quantity of military stores, and destroyed the railroad track and bridge, we may conclude that he gained a very decided and complete victory. The intelligence from Tennessee is meagre, and we are not able to form any opinion as to the attitude of the belligerents and the probability of a battle, but still it is of a character to excuse the Yankee anxiety about the army under Rosencranz.

The advices from Kentucky are also indefinite, but it is apparent that the Confederates are in greater force than was at first supposed. Some persons estimate the Confederate army at 50,000, but all such estimates are mere guesswork. The Federals say they have recaptured Danville, which may mean that the Confederates did not hold the place. It is certain, however, that Frankfort and Lexington have been placed under martial law, and that the Unionists are flying from Central Kentucky with their valuables.

But surely all this trepidation is needless after the despatches of the Federal Generals Burnside and Gilbert. The last-named general encountered a force of 2,600 Confederates under General Pegram, and was outnumbered two to one. Did he run away? Not at all. He attacked them, "and after five hours' fighting, drove them in confusion across into Cumberland." It was a wonderful engagement. His own loss was thirty, being at the rate of six men an hour, whilst he killed and wounded 50 or 100 of the enemy, and took 400 prisoners. Let John Pope and Halleck look to their laurels; they have rivals in Burnside and Gilbert; but it is not unlikely that the brilliant report is due, not so much to the genius of Burnside and Gilbert, as to the editorial talent of Halleck.

We repeat that as yet no reliable intelligence has reached Europe about the Confederate movement in Kentucky. It may be an important movement, or the Confederate forces may have no other object than the convey of stores.

The rest of the war news is not very important. The reported bombardment of Charleston is not confirmed, and it is intimated that an attack will not be made for several weeks. General Beauregard has demanded the delivery of the steamers Mercedita and Keystone State, they having surrendered at the late naval engagement.

On the 12th of March General Johnston reviewed the army at Mobile. Despatches from that city state that the Federals have evacuated Pensacola, and now occupy only the Navy-yard and the forts of Barrancas and Hyacinth. The garrison of the town was sent to reinforce General Banks. The Federals are said to have burnt the town before evacuating it.

It is reported from Fortress Monroe that the Confederates had attacked Williamsburg, Virginia, and Wingfield, and were repulsed at both places. Another account says that the Confederates made "a raid into Williamsburg, Virginia, and left after driving a small Federal force out of the town."

There is, it is said, a considerable Confederate force under General Kirby Smith in the neighbourhood of Brashear City, and the Confederate gunboats, Queen of the West and Webb, are rumoured to be in Chafalaya River, not far above Brashear.

Mosby's Confederate Cavalry lately visited Centreville, Virginia, and left for Dranesville, where they encountered a squadron of Vermont cavalry, which they defeated and put to flight.

A few months since the Federals destroyed some of the bridges on the East Tennessee and Virginia railroad. They have been repaired, and the regular traffic was resumed on the 13th of March.

In another part of our impression will be found a letter from our Richmond Correspondent.

The Florida has captured and burnt the Star of Peace, from Calcutta for Boston. Her cargo was valued at $500,000. The Florida has also captured another Federal schooner.

The Charleston Courier of the 27th says:—"Four steamers have arrived from Nassau since Sunday. Notwithstanding the blockade Charleston is enjoying a larger direct foreign trade than she has ever had before."

The steamers Cornubia and Beauregard, with 1,400 bales of cotton, arrived at Bermuda on the 23rd from Southern ports. The steamer Gertrude has arrived at Charleston, and the Britannia has arrived at Wilmington.

The British schooner Mary Jane has been captured off Wilmington.

The captain of the steamer Peterhoff is said to have laid the facts of her capture before Lord Lyons, who, it is reported, will make a formal demand upon the Government for the release of the vessel and indemnity to the owners.

The Governor of Georgia has recommended to the General Assembly that cotton planting should be restricted to a quarter of an acre to each hand.

As the Federals are not likely to take Richmond they have lately been reporting that the Confederates were about to evacuate that city. General Dix, to add point to the joke, writes from Fort Monroe that he has no information to warrant the conclusion that the Confederates are evacuating Richmond.

General McClellan will not be beaten with the pen, though he suffered defeats with the sword. His official report of the seven days' fighting on the Peninsula, and falling back to Bereley, is published. He says in it that no such difficult movement was ever more successfully executed. The preliminary report of his operations, from the evacuation of Harrison's Landing to the close of the Maryland campaign, has also been published. He declares that the disgraceful surrender of Harper's Ferry deprived his operations of the results which would have formed a brilliant sequel to a substantial and gratifying success. If the Federals are contented with this success, they are easily satisfied—or, perhaps, they rather like being whipped.

There has been some excitement at San Francisco about a supposed intention of the Secessionists to attack the Benecia Military Station and the Mare Island Yard. Nothing had happened to justify the alarm.

The Republican party denounce Lord Lyons for his official correspondence, because, they say, it shows sympathy with the Secession party.

General Butler has received an ovation at New York. An address expressing the sentiments of his New York admirers was delivered to the General by the Mayor, Mr. Opdyke. General Butler, in his reply, advocated the extermination of the Southern "rebels," the confiscation of the estates of the planters, and their partition among the soldiers of the Union. He was particularly bitter against the English Government and aristocracy, and said that at the time of the Trent affair it was perhaps wise not to provoke England, but he thanked God that the country was now getting into a condition to remember that case. He advised retaliation for the depredation of the Alabama and the Florida, and recommended that non-intercourse with England be proclaimed, so that not an ounce of food from America should get into an Englishman's mouth until those piracies were stopped. He also advocated the prohibition of the export of gold to England. Any one, even Butler, Turchin, or McNeill, can get the applause of the Yankees by the abuse of England.

A Union meeting was held at Washington on the 11th ultimo, at which the President and his Cabinet were present. Of course, the speeches and resolutions were "loyal." It is no joke being "disloyal" in the presence of a man who is invested with despotic power, and is indemnified for any offence he may commit.

The New York correspondent of the London Times has, in his last letters, given some choice specimens of Yankee eloquence which are worth recording as evidence of the Republican spirit. Mr. Lane, United States' Senator for Kansas, addressed a League Meeting at Washington, and said:—

It is a disgrace to the country and the Government, that a sympathizer with treason, whether male or female, should be permitted to rest his or her foot on the soil of the district of Columbia. I would purify the soil of them by sword and fire. (Cheers.) In Kansas, where I live, a Copperhead is not allowed to remain in the State. If he does not leave when he is ordered to leave, we shoot him down. (Loud applause, and cries of "That's the way!") I am informed by the Governor of our State that no longer ago than last Saturday a Copperhead who refused to leave the State in the morning was found before night with two bullet holes through his body. (Cries of "Good, good!") It had been said that we ought not to use the negroes. So far as I am concerned, I would rather that every rebel should be sent to Hell by a negro than by a white man. (Great laughter and loud applause.) I would like to live long enough to see every white man now in South Carolina in Hell, and the negroes occupying his territory. (Cheers.) All this may sound to you very wicked (cries of "No, not at all!") but no place on the face of the earth ought to be desecrated by a traitor. I bid you God speed in clearing out sympathizers with treason in the district of Columbia. It would not wound my feelings any day to find the dead bodies of rebel sympathizers pierced with bullet holes in every street and alley of the city of Washington. (Vociferous applause.) I would regret the loss of the powder and lead. (Laughter.) It would be cheaper and better to hang them, and save the ropes. Yes, hang them! and let them dangle until their stinking bodies rot, decompose, and fall to the ground piece by piece. (Enthusiastic applause.)

At a "League" meeting held in Philadelphia, the Rev. A. N. Gilbert said:—

We know that the negro slays everything in his reach when he rises in insurrection. We all have learned the history of St. Domingo, and it would be terrible to have a St. Domingo massacre re-enacted upon our soil. But the President has declared this a military necessity, and, if blood must flow, we must not dread the consequences. Blood must flow in this war. So impressed am I with the greatness of the interests engaged in this rebellion and its suppression, so satisfied of the inconceivable importance of the struggle that opens up before us in the dispersion of this rebellion, that I speak it meaningly and as a Christian, deliberately and calmly, I would rather see every man, woman, and child in the South perish than that the Southern Confederacy should succeed in attaining the objects of its leaders.

Mr. Lincoln has adopted the plan of agitating in the army, and "loyal" meetings are held in camp, presided over by officers. This is a measure that is likely to ruin Mr. Lincoln as well as the country. The Richmond Examiner is right in saying that the United States' Congress may put Mr. Lincoln into Cromwell's boots, but they cannot put Cromwell into Mr. Lincoln's boots.

We suppose no one out of Bedlam and the United States will be imposed upon by the hoax of the Louisville Journal about seventy-three leading Southerners asking the Emperor Napoleon to recognise the South, "because it is the duty of France to encourage aristocracy, and to discourage democracy."

It is reported in New Orleans, from the Gulf, that yellow fever was already assuming a malignant form in the extreme South, and an impression was prevalent that it would reach New Orleans this summer. New Orleans has been free from yellow fever since 1858.

The fluctuations in the price of gold at New York have been remarkable. On the 28th of March it was 42½ premium. On the 31st it went up to 49, and on the 1st of April it was 60 per cent. premium. On the 2nd of April it fell to 54 at the commencement of business, rose to 59½, and left off at 54 per cent. premium. It was the same price on the 3rd inst.

ENGLAND.

The returns of the Poor-law Board exhibit a diminution of about 9000 in the number of paupers in the manufacturing districts; chiefly in Manchester, Blackburn, and Oldham. This, after the unfavourable reports of the last two or three weeks, is a hopeful symptom, so far as its significance extends; but we cannot flatter ourselves that it promises any general or effectual relief to the misery of Lancashire. What is needed to raise the suffering classes from their present wretchedness and despair is either a supply of cotton at home, or removal to places where work such as they can do is to be had at such wages as will suffice for their wants. Of the first there is no immediate hope. The extra supply of Indian cotton is much smaller than was expected, and is made up of the very worst sorts grown, adulterated with refuse and dirt. The manufacturers turn away in disgust from the filthy samples; the work-people find that they can do nothing with it, and prefer, in some cases, to be dependant on charity rather than undertake the hopeless, heart-breaking, unremunerative toil of spinning dirt and refuse into yarn. There is no help anywhere else and no prospect, therefore, of a revival of the cotton manufacture while the blockade endures. Removal to the agricultural districts of England is out of the question. The wages earned there by better work than men trained only to indoor and manufacturing pursuits can do are wretchedly low, and labourers are already superabundant. Emigration, and emigration on a gigantic scale, seems to be the only hope of the operatives, who are already pressing the consideration of measures to this end upon the public. Several of those who have most warmly espoused their cause are doing the same, and the Mansion-house Committee has had under its consideration the propriety of making grants in aid of emigration. Many of the colonies are willing to grant free passages. Queensland has already provided means to send out thither 1,000 persons, and the other Australian settlements have done or will soon do likewise. It would be well if some arrangements were made to send a number proportionate to the probable means of employment to Natal and other colonies less distant than those in Australia. It is said by a clever and generally well-informed correspondent of the Times, that attempts are being made to send out able-bodied men from Lancashire to the Northern States of America, nominally as emigrants, but really as recruits. We hope that this is not true. If it is, the persons concerned in such transactions ought to be exposed by name, that they may receive their due meed of infamy. To send Englishmen to the Northern States at present for any purpose, is a barbarous and treacherous cruelty; but to send them there to die by famine and fever in the service of their country's bitterest enemy—above all, to send Lancashire men to assist those who have suspended and are fighting to destroy the trade on which the prosperity of Lancashire depended—is an act of cold-blooded and villainous deception worthy of the countrymen of a Butler and the associates of a Seward.

The operatives of Ashton have addressed a memorial to the Central Executive Committee at Manchester, complaining of the scantiness of the relief doled out by the guardians and the local committees, and of the smallness of the grants in aid made to the latter. The reply given is courteous and kindly in tone, but exhorts the complainants to contentment and peaceable behaviour, and holds out no hopes of increased grants.

The Bishops have, one after another, been prohibiting the Bishop of Natal from preaching in their dioceses, considering him as having, by the publication of his attack on the authenticity of the Mosaic history, completely forfeited the claims to respect and forbearance which his episcopal office would, in a less serious case, secure to him, and having in fact put himself morally, if not legally, outside the pale of the Church. It is announced, also, that the Bishop of Cape Town, as Dr. Colenso's metropolitan, will take measures to bring him to justice. We are glad to hear it. Abhorring, as we do, all forms of religious persecution, we are unable to conceive that a priest—and above all a Bishop—who claims the privileges of a free-thinker while retaining the dignity and the emoluments of an office which binds him to a particular creed, is entitled to any tolerance whatever. By all means let all theological disputants have the full benefit of modern laws of civilized warfare. Let there be neither legal nor social penalties imposed on erroneous or unpopular forms of belief. But no law of warfare entitles the traitor—the enemy within the camp—to any more lenity now than was shown to him in the days of mediæval barbarism. He has no right save that of a drumhead court-martial and a speedy execution. Bishop Colenso stands in the position of Benedict Arnold. The cause he has adopted may or may not be better than the cause he has deserted. But he is an officer of the Church, holding high rank in her service; and while holding that rank, and retaining its emoluments, he has held traitorous commerce with her enemies, and availed himself of the opportunity and authority afforded by his position to strike a dangerous blow against her. It is not religious persecution to punish a criminal of this character; still less is it persecution to strip him of the uniform he has disgraced, and of the position which he has treacherously misused, and send him over, helpless and dishonoured, to the camp of those to whose cause he has attached himself. It can hardly be urged, even by the most venomous Dissenter or the most bigoted unbeliever, that the Church is bound to maintain in his dignity and emoluments a Bishop who has openly proclaimed himself at war with her teachings and an infidel to her faith. The Bishop of Natal does not seem to understand the nature of character of his offence, and complains bitterly of being condemned without trial. He forgets, first, that he has himself pronounced his own formal condemnation on the charge of "heresy"—that is, dissent from the orthodox doctrine of the Church; and secondly, that the inhibition to preach is not a penalty, but a measure of precaution. Little sympathy is felt for him; and that only by men whose sympathy, to a Bishop, must be felt as the most stinging condemnation; by the avowed advocates of the various forms of anti-Christian opinion which, now, as ever, find utterance in the press, and by the "Essayists and Reviewers" connected with the National Review—a clique consisting chiefly of men guilty of Bishop Colenso's own error; men who may have a keen insight into theological truth, but whose sense of professional duty and personal honour is peculiarly dull.

A very clever sarcasm upon the Bishop of Natal has been published by the brilliant and bitter writer known to the public as the author of the "Eclipse of Faith." He argues that some one must have borrowed the name of Dr. Colenso; for that it is utterly impossible that a gentleman, a scholar, and a dignitary of the Church could have written the utterly futile, childish, and often dishonest nonsense with which many pages of his book are filled, and which his critic dissects with merciless logic.

The great event of the week is a most mournful one. Sir George Cornwall Lewis, who died on Monday afternoon, at his seat in Radnorshire, was, perhaps, among all our leading politicians, except the chiefs of the two great parties, the man whom the country could least afford to lose. England has many men whose public career has been more brilliant, and attracted more popular applause; but no living statesman has rendered greater services as a Counsellor and an administrator, or shown himself so thoroughly competent to all the most arduous offices of State, as the late Secretary for War. He was not a brilliant speaker; on the contrary, he was slow, somewhat heavy, and troubled with a shy and awkward manner, which would have marred the effect of eloquent declamation. But he always spoke sensibly and to the point; always thought deeply and clearly, and expressed his thoughts with precision and accuracy. He was, moreover, one of the best informed men in the House of Commons; always up to his work, always thoroughly master of the matter in hand, and rarely or never liable to lapse into extravagance or exaggeration. He was, perhaps, the profoundest philosophical statesman of this generation. His political essays are full of deep and original thought, and will probably be reckoned by posterity among the masterpieces of that peculiar branch of literature. As an administrator, he was one of the most efficient and reliable men of the day; always careful, capable, and conscientious; perfectly frank and honourable in all his dealings with friends or adversaries; able at short notice to make himself thoroughly acquainted with the details of a wholly new department of public business, and yet never sinking into a mere official, or forgetting the sound and statesmanlike views which he had learned in the closet, amid the bustle and turmoil of political strife, or the weary routine of departmental duties. As a financier he was not original, and he was sound; and there is nothing which commerce dreads like originality, which unsettles all her arrangements, and condemns it to wait continually upon political experiments; and nothing which commands her confidence as simple common sense and sound practical judgment. Sir George became the favourite of the commercial classes almost as soon as he undertook the Chancellorship of the Exchequer. Since Robert Peel, no one has filled that office so thoroughly to the satisfaction of "the City." As a future political leader, Sir G. C. Lewis was regarded with confidence and respect by the best men of both parties; and he was certain, had he lived, to have succeeded Lord Palmerston as the chief of the Liberals. His own friends felt that they could understand and depend upon him. He would never upset the coach; he would never leave them in the lurch at a critical moment in order to escape from the punishment of errors in the perpetration of which he had borne his share; he would never shave so closely by the verge of falsehood as to expose himself and his colleagues to disgrace. He was not the man to perplex and confuse them by sudden caprices and unintelligible crochets; or to hurry them into new plans which might be wise and sound, but which would certainly bring danger and unpopularity with them, and invite effective and damaging opposition. His political adversaries felt in him something of the same confidence that they repose in Lord Palmerston; they might differ with it,—but they could feel that the great and permanent interests of the country would be safe in his keeping. Their consternation and regret at his loss were evident, even in the brief speeches which expressed the respect and esteem, not only of Mr. Walpole and Mr. Disraeli, but of the whole Conservative party, for an opponent who was never known to do an ungenerous action, to provoke a needless quarrel, or to make a personal enemy. A ripe thinker, a finished scholar, a profound statesman, an honourable, amiable, thoroughbred English gentleman, the most loyal of partisans, the most courteous of antagonists, the most diligent of public servants—Sir George Cornwall Lewis has left a void in the councils of his Queen and in the service of his country, which will not soon be filled up.

The presents made to the Prince and Princess of Wales on their marriage—laces, ornaments, jewellery, plate, and the various costly trifles which are the traditional right of a bride and bridegroom—are now exhibited, by permission of his Royal Highness, at the South Kensington Museum; and are said to be well worth seeing.

EUROPE.

The Russian Government has responded in advance to the representations of England, France, and Austria. Whether those representations took the form of identical notes, or each Power formulated the demands they had agreed to make in its own language, and supported them by its own reasons, a point not yet cleared up—it is certain that the character of the intervention is moderate and conciliatory enough, and that the three Powers have asked nothing more for Poland than an amnesty and the promise of some kind of autonomy. The Manifesto of the Czar, which was issued on Sunday—the Easter Sunday of the Russian calendar—grants a full and entire amnesty to all insurgents, whether in Congress Poland or in the Polish provinces of the empire, who shall lay down their arms before the 13th of May, and proceeds to acknowledge the obligation to preserve the country from the return of disorders, and to open a new epoch of political life based upon the rational organization of administrative local autonomy. The foundations of this autonomy, it says, have already been laid in the institutions granted Poland, but whose efficacy has not yet been put to the test. It is the desire, it adds, of the Czar to maintain those institutions, reserving the right of proceeding with their future development according to the requirements of the age and of the country. The amnesty is complete enough. The only exceptions it makes relate to ordinary crimes and offences committed by the army; and the only question for the Poles, so far as it is concerned, is whether they can trust the promises of the Russian Government. The announcement of the Emperor's determination to preserve the country from a return of disorder, by a rational organization of administrative local autonomy, sounds well; but these general promises are susceptible of very different interpretations, and the autonomy which the Czar designs to bestow may be very different from that which the Poles have the right to claim. But, without trusting too much to promises made at such a moment, it is but fair to presume, from the steps already taken in this direction, that the autonomy the Czar intends, although it will fall short of that inaugurated after 1815, will be large enough to give the Poles, if they choose to accept and work it, a very considerable measure of self-government. The institutions which the Czar gave Poland in 1861 were really of a liberal character, but the Poles were so determinedly set upon national independence, or, at least, upon administrative separation, that they would give no heed to them.

Sufficient time has not yet elapsed since the publication of the manifesto to enable us to speak at all decidedly as to its effect. In Poland, it will, at present, have little influence, although it is rather absurd for the Correspondent of the Times to telegraph from Cracow on the same day that the manifesto reaches that city, that it is universally rejected. This universal rejection could only refer to the city of Cracow, to which the offer was not addressed. The men to whom it applies are scattered over Poland and Lithuania, and will not hear of it for some days to come. The Poles care for nothing short of national independence, and the manifesto puts them in about the same position that they stood before the insurrection broke out. They will certainly not lay down their arms, therefore, in response to the amnesty, unless they are satisfied that they have no chance of success in their greater design. The effect of the manifesto on Poland will, therefore, depend upon its effect upon the Powers, to whose notes it is really a reply.

At present the Poles fancy that those Powers will not be satisfied with it. The Czts, of Cracow, treats the amnesty as a recognition of the insurrection, and insists that it imposes upon the Powers the duty of further interference. But that is only the reasoning of hope. If the three Powers have asked nothing more from Russia than she promises in this manifesto, and as Austria is one of the remonstrants, it may be considered as perfectly certain that they have not, then the manifesto, by offering everything they put forward, will stop all further interference on their part. The Poles will, perhaps, be misled by the language of the English and French press, which exhausts its ingenuity to show that the concessions of the Emperor are worthless, and finds reasons for distrusting everything that Russia promises. No doubt the concessions are small. No doubt the Russian Government may be deceitful. But what better can be done for Poland? The attainment of her national independence is impossible. Russia will not at once concede—and, indeed, could not—complete autonomy; and any amnesty, whenever it comes, will be equally exposed to distrust. The Governments who have intervened will no doubt accept what Russia promises, and repeat their praises of the Czar's benevolence. And the question which the Poles will have to determine is whether they shall yield now upon terms, or shall prolong a partisan warfare for a few months, to ultimately surrender at discretion.

A Ukase of a very different character was published a few days before the issue of the amnesty manifesto. It sequesters the whole property, real and personal, of all persons taking part in the insurrection in the Polish provinces incorporated in the empire of Russia. Provision is made for the support of the families of the owners where they are destitute, and have not been concerned in the rebellion. The final determination of the fate of the property sequestered is reserved for the Imperial Government after the suppression of the insurrection. It was rumoured that this measure would be extended to Congress Poland, but we may presume that such a measure will now be postponed until the offer of an amnesty shall have been tried.

The war news is as conflicting and confused as ever. The telegraph brings us from Cracow reports of engagements in all parts of Poland and Lithuania, but it has the modesty in most cases not to claim the victory for the insurgents, and when it has done so it has been contradicted from Warsaw. The inference, however, to be drawn from all the statements, as well of the telegraph as of the correspondence from the frontier, is, that there is a slight recrudescence of the insurrection. In the south-western corner of the kingdom—the scene of Langiewicz's exploits—two or three bands have been formed by volunteers from Cracow, and the character of the country enables them to maintain themselves against the overwhelming forces which are on the look out for them. In the Government of Kalisz, too, the insurgents, who obtain many recruits and much material of war from Posen, have increased in numbers and boldness, and by the avowals of the Russians themselves the Governments of Kowno and Wilna, to the north of the kingdom of Poland, are in a very disturbed condition. However, reinforcements are pouring in upon the devoted land—"Asiatic hordes," as they are described in the figurative language of some of our journalists—and a more important reinforcement yet has arrived at Warsaw in the person of General von Berg, some time since appointed Adlatus to the Viceroy, but only within this week commencing his functions. Von Berg is a man of very great ability, and although perhaps not cruel, by no means scrupulous about the means by which he carries out his plans. His work in Poland in 1831 is yet remembered. The Archduke Constantine will probably now disappear from the scene. He could neither conciliate nor command.

The Russians have published a summary of the fighting and its results from the 23rd of January to the 27th of March, which deserves note, as one of the most impudent fabrications ever attempted. According to this return there were, within these dates, 61 conflicts, in which the insurgents had 6,193 killed, 67 wounded, and 1,177 prisoners; their loss, in all, being 7,437; whilst only 61 Russians were killed, 192 wounded, and 9 taken prisoners: total loss 262. For whom could such a statement be designed? Surely the Russian officials must have suspected that the very extravagance of the account would deprive it of all credit.

The Russian and the Insurrectionary Governments are fighting hard to win the peasants. They both offer them very great advantages at the expense of the nobility, advantages which the Russians can offer with very great satisfaction, because the nobility is the insurrection, but which the insurrectionary government only holds out as a last resource from constraint. The peasants, however, incline to the Russian side. They have always been treated with consideration by the Government, whilst they have always had much to complain of against their lords.

Langiewicz has been removed to Tischnowitz, in Moravia, about four miles from Brunn. He had given his parole to the authorities, and was allowed considerable liberty. He has, however, it is now said, withdrawn the parole, and consequently will be strictly watched.

Miss —, not knowing Polish we will not attempt to spell her name—we have seen about fifty different readings—even the Germans, usually so correct on this point, are hopelessly contradictory—the female aide-de-camp of Langiewicz, is residing at Prague, an object of very great interest and enthusiasm.

Public interest in Paris is mainly absorbed by the affairs of Poland. What little attention can be spared from this engrossing subject is given to the approaching elections to the Corps Legislatif. The "old parties" have resolved to oppose the Government candidates in many places, but their nominees have apparently little chance of success. Legitimists, Orleanists, and Republicans, they have learned nothing and forgotten nothing, and if a few sensible men recommend union to return candidates who will do their utmost to assist the Emperor by steady and moderate opposition to all abuses of power to crown the edifice with liberty, the majority dream only of their little personal interests, and justify their ostracism from public life.

The Danish Government has repudiated the Dagbladet through the Times. The only conditions it imposes for its assent to the candidature of Prince William have reference to the position of the Prince in Greece. We presume that these conditions refer to the religion of the Prince and his descendants. There is only the life of his elder brother between Prince William and the throne of Denmark; and the fact that there remains but one other brother to keep up the succession stipulated in the Treaty of London, compels the Danes to hold the Prince to his rights over them, even if he should himself be disposed to renounce them. The Danish Government cannot, therefore, consent either that Prince William should adopt the Greek faith, or that his descendants should, as the National Assembly have proclaimed, be brought up in its tenets. Prince Frederick, his elder brother, may die childless, or leave children who do not perpetuate the line. In that event, the Danes would have to turn to Greece, and re-claim Prince William or his representative. But if that representative were an orthodox Greek, a difficulty would be created which the Danes wisely wish to prevent. It is a question whether the Greeks for all their want of a king, will consent to take one upon such terms, even if the conditions imposed by Prince Christian, and which we are assured are quite inadmissible, could be accepted. It is not at all improbable that Earl Russell will have to resume his search for a king—and we can only hope that the next time he finds a victim, he will make the bargain hard and fast before he announces it with a flourish of trumpets. The deputation commissioned to offer Prince William the Crown is on its way to Copenhagen, and the best thing Earl Russell can do will be to send them on a voyage of discovery through the petty principalities of Germany.

The National Assembly gives away a crown in the name of Greece, but the mob of Athens will not allow it to vote itself some compensation. A popular demonstration effected for all practical purposes the immediate repeal of a law by which the Assembly voted to each member a monthly allowance of 300 drachmas—nearly twelve pounds—the effect of the law to be retroactive, and the allowance to be paid for the part of the session already expired. As the Assembly had just been engaged in cutting down all salaries, recalling foreign ministers, and making other savings on the plea of poverty, this was justly deemed too bad. A popular demonstration brought the members to their senses, and although they have not formally repealed the law they have renounced the allowance it gave them.

The proclamation of the King of Denmark, giving Holstein an independent position in the monarchy, has, as was to be expected, excited great indignation in Germany. The Prussian party of progress have agreed to address an interpellation to the Minister upon the subject. They will ask him whether the Prussian Government regards the arrangement of 1850 and 1852 as still in force, and seek to elicit a declaration that the proclamation is a violation of that understanding, and that Prussia has a right to claim a connection between Holstein and Schleswig. A great deal of patriotic steam will be let off, and much injustice advocated in the name of liberty, but nothing will be done yet. Poland holds Prussia fast.

There has been a Ministerial crisis at Vienna. Count Apponyi has resigned the post of Judex Cuius, one of the highest offices in Hungary; it is presumed on account of a difference of opinion with Count Forgach, the Hungarian Chancellor, and the German Ministers, as to the course to be adopted towards that country, and has been succeeded by Count George Andrassy. Both are Hungarian magnates of the highest rank and character.

A constitution has been elaborated for Venetia, and it is believed that the Diet of that province will soon be convoked. The question is whether the Venetians, despite their hatred of Austrian rule, and their anxiety to join their fellow-countrymen in the Italian kingdom, will yet have the good sense to use the opportunities offered them for the development of individual liberties, and the promotion of institutions calculated to increase the prosperity of the province.

The King of Italy has gone to Florence. His ministers display a very uneasy conviction that his kingdom has been built up much more speedily than surely. The Minister of Justice has addressed a circular to the public prosecutors, calling upon them to keep a vigilant watch upon the subversive tendencies of the Federal and Radical press, and insisting that every attack upon the principles of a constitutional and united monarchy should be rigorously repressed. This looks very much as if unity were hardly to the taste of the people upon whom it has been forced. There have been rumours that the party of action was meditating an expedition into Venetia, and they seem to have had some foundation, as the Perseveranza, of Milan, in denying them expresses its belief that some few members of the party have assembled on the frontiers of Venetia, and the Opinione confesses that the Government has informed the Swiss Government of preparations making in the canton of Ticino for an invasion of the Austrian territory.

A continental telegraphic agency assures the Globe, "upon the best authority," that the Russian armaments are directed against Sweden, whose conduct upon the Polish question has given the Czar great dissatisfaction, and that the Russian Ambassador has received instructions to demand satisfaction, and if he does not receive it within twenty-four hours to demand his passports. And as if this dose were not strong enough, it also declares that the Emperor of the French has asked of the Government of Italy whether, in certain eventualities, it would be prepared to act as an armed ally with 60,000 men, and that General Cialdini has answered that the requisite force should be ready at the shortest notice.

The Marquis de Miraflores, the chief of the new Spanish Ministry, has made a very unmeaning declaration of policy in the Cortes. His policy is to be of a liberal-conservative character, and he will endeavour to repair the injustice committed by the Congress of Vienna in leaving Spain a Power of the second rank, although, without Spain, the Congress would not have been possible!

The Minister of Finance has requested authority to levy the taxes until the 1st of July next.

It is reported from Berne that the negotiations for a commercial treaty between France and Switzerland have been broken off.

PARLIAMENTARY NOTES.

MONDAY, APRIL 13.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The House met after the Easter recess. The Civil Service Estimates were considered in Committee, and several votes passed. No other business of general interest was transacted; and the House rose early.

TUESDAY, APRIL 14.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

On the motion to name a Select Committee on the Lord Chancellor's Church Patronage Bill, Lord St. Leonard's (Chancellor, in 1852, under Lord Derby's Government), objected to many details of the measure, and in particular urged that, as dealing with the patronage of the Crown, such a measure ought not to have been introduced without the formal sanction of her Majesty having been previously obtained.—Lord Derby expressed a general approval of the Bill, but remarked that many of the livings to be sold were hardly fit subjects for augmentation, on account of the smallness of the population; and that, in some points, the Ministerial scheme would come into conflict with the regulations of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. He thought that the Lord Chancellor would have done better to sell some of the larger livings in his gift, and apply the proceeds to the augmentation of those which required it.—The Lord Chancellor, having premised that the discussion which had taken place would be of advantage to the end he had in view in bringing forward this Bill, stated that he had not the least intention to interfere with the action of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, but that he had taken every means to ascertain whether the provisions of the Bill agreed with the rules of the Commissioners. He concurred with the justice of Lord Derby's objection, that, if the principle of the Bill were good, it should be carried further, and hoped at some future time to include a larger number of livings in the Bill. He replied to the other criticisms of Lord Derby in detail, and showed that there would be no difficulty in finding purchasers for the advowsons of livings when they had once been augmented. The Select Committee was appointed, and the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, APRIL 14.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The news of the death of Sir G. C. Lewis had filled the House. After a few questions had been asked and answered, Mr. Walpole rose and said:—Sir, I am very unwilling to interpose between the House and the hon. member who has given notice of a very important motion, and one which deserves a full discussion; but I cannot help feeling that the sudden gloom which has come over us, caused by intelligence which was announced only this morning to any one, and which may still be unknown to many hon. gentlemen, does render it proper that out of respect to the memory of the late Secretary for War we should not proceed with business to-day. (Hear, hear.) At present I can only say, what everybody in this House must feel, that we never had among us a man more thoughtful, more conciliatory, or more beloved than the late Sir George Lewis, whom I may call my deeply lamented friend, having known him since I was an Eton boy. (Hear, hear.) I should not do justice to my feelings if I did not respond to the wishes of many hon. gentlemen on both sides by asking you to put from the Chair that out of respect for the memory of Sir George Lewis we should now adjourn. (Hear, hear.)—Lord Palmerston.—Sir, I am sure the House will sympathize with the feelings which have induced the right hon. gentleman to make the motion now in your hands. It would be impossible for any man to add to the well-deserved tribute which the right hon. gentleman has paid to the memory of the colleague whom we have lost, and I think I shall best consult the feelings of the House by simply seconding the motion. (Hear, hear.)—Mr. Disraeli.—Sir, until a few minutes ago I was not aware of the calamity which I think I may say has befallen this country. (Hear, hear.) The Queen has lost one of the ablest of her servants, and this House has lost a member who I am sure possessed the universal regard and respect of hon. gentlemen on both sides. (Hear, hear.) Sir, I never knew a man who combined in so eminent a degree as Sir George Lewis, both from acquired and from native power of thought, the faculty, upon all public matters, of arriving at a sound and judicious conclusion. (Hear, hear.) Although he was remarkably free from prejudice and passion, yet the absence of those sentiments which are supposed in general to be necessary to the possession of active power, had not upon him the effect which it usually produces, and he was a man who always brought a great organizing faculty and a great power of sustained perseverance to the transaction of public affairs. (Hear, hear.) Sir, I am sure that the rising statesmen on both sides may take him as an example that in many particulars may be remembered and followed with advantage, and I am persuaded that his name will never be mentioned in this House without feelings of deep respect or without unfeigned regret for what may be deemed the untimely loss of a man whom the country could ill spare. (Hear, hear.)

The motion was then agreed to, and the House immediately adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 15.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

In reply to Mr. Ferrand, Sir G. Grey said that the Government would name Monday, the 27th instant, for debate on the condition of the cotton districts.

Sir S. M. Peto moved the second reading of his Burials Bill. Its object was to compel clergymen either to permit the burial of dissenters in the churchyard with dissenting services and ceremonies, or to give their reasons for refusal in writing, to be forwarded, through the Bishop, to the Home Secretary.—Lord R. Cecil moved that the Bill be read a second time that day six months. There was really no practical grievance sustained by the dissenters, seeing that the clergy did not refuse to bury them, and there were abundance of unconsecrated cemeteries throughout the country where they could be buried with their own rites. The provisions of the Bill were calculated to enable them to harass and frighten the clergy into concession, and to keep up a perpetual "row" in every parish.—Lord Henley thought that as dissenters paid church-rates they had a right to be buried in the churchyard.—Mr. Newdegate said that the Bill would not promote unity or good feeling among Protestants.—Mr. Gladstone said that the subject was full of difficulty; but he should not oppose the second reading of the Bill. Mr. Hardy (a subordinate member of the late Conservative Ministry) said that the Bill could by no possibility be rendered acceptable to churchmen, and he should vote against it. Sir C. Douglas supported, and Sir J. Trelawny opposed the Bill. Mr. Hunt said that the Liberation Society wished for this measure as a means of doing further injury to the Church. Sir G. Grey would vote for the Bill, but reserved the right to object to all its essential clauses. There was no such grievance as to require an extensive alteration of the law. Mr. Disraeli censured Sir George Grey and Mr. Gladstone for supporting the second reading, while evidently disapproving the Bill. If the principle of religious liberty were involved at all, it was certainly not on the side of the Dissenters, who endeavoured to force themselves into the sacred places of the Church. On a division, the Bill was lost by an immense majority—96 to 221. Some further business was transacted, and the House adjourned before 4 o'clock.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, April 15.

At the date of our last report our market was sustained by a good trade and export demand, which was freely met by holders—Fair Dhollerahs worth 17½d.

On Thursday, 6,000 bales were sold at firm prices. On Friday and Saturday the business only reached 4,000 bales.

Buyers waiting further American and Indian news, bought sparingly, and prices were the turn against the seller.

On Monday, however, telegrams were received from Bombay and Calcutta dated 27th of March, in response to the worst accounts from this side, reporting a further advance of 1s. per piece in goods, an advance in cotton, and decline in freights. From these it appeared that a good consumptive demand existed for goods and yarns, whilst the arrivals of new cotton continued on a limited scale. The Europa's accounts were also to hand, giving, at last, more reliable information regarding the late operations on the Mississippi.

The Federal accounts recently received, spoke of brilliant success in that quarter and predictions of the early fall of Vicksburg were rife in New York, and obtained some credence here, but the detailed accounts of the various engagements there show that the attack on Port Hudson had resulted in the repulse of the attacking fleet in a crippled condition, except two gunboats, which ran the gauntlet of the batteries. The other expedition from the Yazoo and its tributaries had either been checked in their advance, or met with decided reverses. Cotton in New York had again advanced to the basis of 24d. for Middling Upland.

Under these accounts our market became animated, and the sales reached 10,000 bales, at hardening prices. On Tuesday, with an excellent trade demand, the business amounted to 12,000 bales, at rather higher prices. To-day a large business has been done, principally to the trade and exporters; the sales reaching 15,000 bales at 1d advance in Surats, and 1d. in long staples since Friday. We quote Middling Orleans 22d., Fair Egyptian 21d., Fair Sawginned Dharwar 18d., and Fair Dholerah and Omrawuttee 17d.

MANCHESTER, April 14.

We have to report a very steady business as having been done from day to day during the past week, both in cloth and yarn, at the prices of the previous week, and that a still larger amount of transactions might have taken place, had sellers been inclined to submit to the slightest reduction on their pretensions.

Nos. 40s, 50s, and 60s. mule yarns have been much inquired for, and orders have been placed readily with spinners to make, where last week's prices were taken, stocks having been entirely cleared off the market.

Home trade yarns have been rather quiet, manufacturers having for the present satisfied their wants, and as the Liverpool cotton market keeps very steady in price, they necessarily feel themselves disinclined to buy any further lots on speculation.

Cloths have also been very firm in price, and a very fair business has been done in them. India shirtings, mulls, and jaconets having been the articles most in demand.

To-day there has been a brisk demand for all kinds of India goods, occasioned by the receipt of further telegrams from Calcutta and Bombay, dated the 26th and 28th of March respectively, reporting another advance on shirtings of 1s. per piece, and 1d. per lb. in the 40s mule yarn, but as spinners and manufacturers demanded an increase in price very little actual business resulted.

For shirtings, shippers were disposed to place large orders at last Friday's quotations, but manufacturers would not take them unless at an advance of from 1d. to 3d. per piece on those quotations, which the would-be buyers would not pay, notwithstanding the better telegrams.

For yarns suitable for India shipment, buyers would give an advance in price, could agents deliver in a few days, but as the latter are pretty well in order, and hold no stocks, they are not in a position to do so.

Although the demand is for India qualities, other descriptions sympathise and advance in the same ratio.

BELLIGERENT AND NEUTRAL RIGHTS AT SEA.

The following correspondence has just been published:—

In consequence of the capture of the British steamer Adela, Mr. Stuart writes from Washington to Earl Russell on August 8, 1862, that he had represented the case as one of great gravity to Mr. Seward, and forwards the following official report of the occurrence from Admiral Milne:—

Vice-Admiral Sir A. Milne to Mr. Stuart.

(Extract.)

Nile, at Halifax, August 2, 1862.

I lose no time in forwarding to you by the first safe opportunity the documents which I yesterday received from Commander Hewitt, of Her Majesty's ship Rinaldo, giving details of the capture of the British steamer Adela by the United States' cruiser Quaker City, and reporting the purport of communications which had in consequence passed between himself and Flag Officer Lordner, commanding the United States' squadron at Key West.

It would appear that the Adela was bound from Liverpool and Bermuda to Nassau, for which place she had mails; that she was fallen in with near the British island of Abaco by the United States' cruiser Quaker City, which, without showing any colours, chased and fired at her several times.

It is further stated that she was seized before the result of any actual search could have proved that contraband of war was on board, and thus given a colourable pretext for the seizure, on the ground that her real destination was not Nassau, but some Southern port.

Grave as this transaction, in the aspect in which it is presented to me, appears to be, of far graver immediate consequence is the statement of the flag officer (if rightly understood by Commander Hewitt), that their cruisers have orders to seize "any British vessels whose names were forwarded them from the Government at Washington, and that being bound from one British port to another, would not prevent the United States' officers from carrying out those orders;" and further, "that such were the definite orders that they were, when and where met with, to seize British steamers or vessels of which official information had been sent them."

These instructions are so entirely at variance with the recognised principles of international law, that I deem it essential to lose no time in putting you in possession of them, in order that, should you deem it expedient to do so, and your instructions admit of it, and early representation may be made to the United States' Government with a view to these orders, if really issued to their cruisers, being at once recalled, and serious complications possibly averted.

Every respect and consideration have been most studiously shown by the captains of her Majesty's ships under my command to the belligerent rights of the United States, but if British ships lawfully cleared out from and bound to other British ports, without the slightest indication of their deviating from their route, are to be subjected to seizure wherever found, simply because their names are on a list furnished to United States' cruisers, I cannot but fear that a collision between our ships of war and those of the Federal Government may be the result, as while, in affording all proper protection to British commerce, I am enjoined to abstain from any acts likely to involve Great Britain in hostilities with the United States, yet I am also instructed to guard our commerce from all illegal interference, and to permit no warlike operations in British waters, and further, should they be attempted within a British harbour, or within the undoubted limits of a British territory, to prevent them, if necessary, by force.

I do not conceive myself called upon to offer any opinion as to the abstract right of the Admiralty Court at Key West to break the seal of her Majesty's mails sent in a British ship bound from one port to another, both in her Majesty's dominions; although I apprehend this, with the other features of the seizure, will hardly fail to attract the attention of her Majesty's Government. However, I do consider that it would only have been in accordance with international courtesy had the despatches from me to the commander of her Majesty's ship Greyhound, at Nassau, which it is stated were on board the Adela, been handed over to her Majesty's consul, or the commander of her Majesty's ship Rinaldo, when on the spot, as I am not aware it has ever been maintained that even the condemnation of a neutral ship would extend to the official neutral despatches she may have been carrying from one neutral port to another, and so justify their being opened and detained; or that such despatches can in any sense be considered as contraband of war.

I shall forward by the mail for England, which leaves this on the 7th inst., a copy of this despatch and its enclosures to the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty.

COMMANDER HEWITT TO VICE-ADMIRAL SIR A. MILNE.

(Extract.)

Rinaldo, Halifax, August 1, 1862.

In forwarding you a copy of the log of the British steamer Adela, I feel it my duty to report the following conversation that took place on board the San Jacinto with Flag Officer Lordner when at Key West, in conversation relative to the seizure of the Adela, and her position during the time, being in British waters, and the unusual manner in which she was brought-to. The flag officer remarked, as regards the position of the vessel when brought-to, reports differ, but that the United States' vessels of war had orders to seize any British vessels whose names were forwarded them from the Government at Washington, and that being bound from one British port to another would not prevent United States' officers from carrying out those orders.

The flag officer considered that their proceedings might bring on a collision, but that such were the definite orders, that they were, when and where met with, to seize British steamers or vessels of which official information had been sent them.

On August 12, Mr. Stuart writes to Earl Russell that on the day following the date of his despatch of August 8, Mr. Seward showed him a copy of instructions which he was preparing to send to Federal naval officers. These instructions are addressed to Mr. Welles, the Secretary of the Navy, and after reciting the circumstances described in the documents unofficially submitted to him, Mr. Seward proceeds:—

"It is the duty of the naval officers to be vigilant in searching and seizing vessels of whatever nation which are carrying contraband of war to the insurgents of the United States. But it is equally important that the provisions of the maritime law in all cases be observed and respected. Without waiting to inquire into the correctness of the representations of Admiral Milne thus brought to my notice, and with a view to prevent collisions between the armed vessels of the United States and Great Britain, I am directed by the President to ask you to give the following instructions explicitly to the naval officers of the United States, namely:—

First. That under no circumstances will they seize any foreign vessels within the waters of a friendly nation.

Secondly. That in no case are they authorized to chase and fire at a foreign vessel without showing their colours, and giving her the customary preliminary notice of a desire to speak and visit her.

Thirdly. That when that visit is made the vessel is not then to be seized without a search carefully made so far as to render it reasonable to believe that she is engaged in carrying contraband of war to the insurgents and to their ports, or otherwise violating the blockade; and that if it shall appear that she is actually bound and passing from one friendly or so-called neutral port to another, and not bound or proceeding to or from a port in the possession of the insurgents, then she cannot be lawfully seized.

And, finally, that official seals, or locks, or fastenings of foreign authorities are in no case, nor on any pretext, to be broken, or parcels covered by them read by any naval authorities of the United States; but all bags or other things conveying such parcels and duly sealed or fastened by foreign authorities will be, in the discretion of the United States' officer to whom they may come, delivered to the Consul, commanding naval officer, or Legation of the foreign government to be opened, upon the understanding that whatever is contraband or important as evidence concerning the character of a captured vessel will be remitted to the prize court, or to the Secretary of State at Washington; or such sealed bags or parcels may be at once forwarded to this department, to the end that the proper authorities of the foreign Government may receive the same without delay.

The President desires especially that naval officers may be informed that the fact that a suspected vessel has been indicated to them as cruising in any limit which has been prescribed to them by the Navy Department, does not in any way authorize them to depart from the practice of the rules of visitation, search, and capture prescribed by the law of nations.

Instructions similar to this will be given to the district attorneys of the United States.

While preparing the above, your letter of the 5th inst., with the accompanying report of Commander James Madison Frailey, has been brought to my attention. This report does not seem to obviate the necessity of a fuller one from that officer on the points raised by Admiral Milne. I will consequently thank you to require a supplementary Report of that character.

The next despatch is the following from Earl Russell to Mr. Stuart:—

EARL RUSSELL TO MR. STUART.

(Extract.)

Foreign Office, October 10, 1862.

Her Majesty's Government are glad to find, from your despatch of the 12th August last, that the orders originally given to American cruisers in regard to interference with neutral vessels have been rescinded. If those orders had been sanctioned and continued in force by the Government of the United States, they would have called for prompt and firm remonstrance on the part of her Majesty's Government; and it will be proper that you should intimate to Mr. Seward, while expressing the satisfaction of her Majesty's Government at their revocation, that her Majesty's Government are glad to be thereby spared from the necessity of stating their decided objections to their tenor. You will say that to order vessels though apparently and prima facie carrying on a lawful trade, to be systematically seized on the high seas, without any preliminary search, or without the discovery during such search of any strong evidence of suspicion against such vessels, would be to subject the mercantile marine of neutrals to a system of oppression and annoyance which no neutral Government could be expected to tolerate. The unjust seizure under urgent circumstances of a neutral vessel may be considered as one of the occasional burdens which a state of war may impose upon a neutral, and it may be partially compensated by the condemnation of the captor in costs or in costs and damages; but the indiscriminate and general seizure of merchant vessels, without previous search, converts an occasional exception into an intolerable rule.

It is desirable that you should ascertain from Mr. Seward whether the Government of the United States admits the principle that her Majesty's mail bags shall neither be searched nor detained.

On 4th November Mr. Stuart writes to Earl Russell that he had made the representations mentioned in the above despatch, and that Mr. Seward showed great readiness to admit the principle, requesting an inquiry to be made in an unofficial letter, to which he would give a satisfactory reply. This was done, and Mr. Seward in reply furnished a copy of the following additional instructions to the Secretary of the Navy:—

MR. SEWARD TO MR. WELLES.

Department of State, Washington, October 31, 1862.

Sir,—It is thought expedient that instructions be given to the blockading and naval officers that, in case of capture of merchant vessels suspected or found to be vessels of the insurgents or contraband, the public mails of any friendly or neutral Power, duly certified and authenticated as such, shall not be searched or opened, but be put, as speedily as may be convenient, on their way to their designated destinations. This instruction, however, will not be deemed to protect simulated mail bags, verified by forged certificates or counterfeit seal.

I have, &c.,

(Signed) WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

The next despatch is from Earl Russell, dated November 20, expressing his satisfaction that Mr. Seward had issued the above instructions; and a despatch from Lord Lyons, dated December 12, announcing that he had communicated Earl Russell's despatch to Mr. Seward, closes the correspondence.

The next batch refers to Neutral Rights and Duties accruing from the incident of the seizure of the British steamer Labuan, at Matamoros, the case of which vessel is still under discussion.

Mr. Adams, in the course of the correspondence, asked the British Government to interfere against the "unlawful trade" carried on by British subjects, representing that great embarrassment had arisen to the Federal Government by reason of it, and that the seizure of the Labuan was the result of that embarrassment. On the 10th of May, 1862, Earl Russell wrote:—

EARL RUSSELL TO MR. ADAMS.

Foreign Office, May 10, 1862.

Sir,—In the letter I had the honour to receive from you yesterday, you appear to me to have confounded two things totally distinct.

The Foreign Enlistment Act is intended to prevent the subjects of the Crown from going to war when the Sovereign is not at war.

Thus private persons are prohibited from fitting out a ship of war in our ports, or from enlisting in the service of a foreign State at war with another State, or in the service of insurgents against a foreign Sovereign or State. In these cases the persons so acting would carry on war, and thus engage the name of their Sovereign and of their nation in belligerent operations.

But owners and masters of merchant ships carrying warlike stores do nothing of the kind. If captured for breaking a blockade, or carrying contraband of war to the enemy of the captor, they submit to capture, are tried, and condemned to lose their cargo.

This is the penalty which the law of nations has affixed to such an offence, and in calling upon her Majesty's Government to prohibit such adventures, you in effect call upon her Majesty's Government to do that which it belongs to the cruisers and the courts of the United States to do for themselves.

There can be only one plea for asking Great Britain thus to interpose. That plea is, that the blockade is in reality ineffective, and that merchant-ships can enter with impunity the blockaded ports.

But this is a plea which I presume you will not urge. Her Majesty's Government have considered the blockade as an effective blockade, and have submitted to all its inconveniences as such.

They can only hope that if resistance should prove to be hopeless, the Confederate States will not continue the struggle; and that if, on the other hand, the restoration of the Union should appear to be impossible, the work of devastation now going on will cease.

Her Majesty's Government can only desire the prosperity of the inhabitants of the United States, whatever may be the event of the present civil war.—I am, &c.,

(Signed) RUSSELL.

Mr. Adams replied on the 12th of May in a letter, which concludes as follows:—

But I pray your Lordship's pardon if I submit that you appear to have entirely overlooked a plea, which I am confident enough to imagine of no inconsiderable weight. That plea is, that the kingdom of Great Britain endeavour, in spirit as well as in letter, to preserve the principle of neutrality, if not of friendship, towards a foreign nation in amity with it, to which it has pledged itself. The precise mode in which that shall be done it does not presume to prescribe. That the toleration of such conduct in subjects of Great Britain as I have had the pain heretofore to expose is surely a violation of that neutrality, is justly to be inferred from the very language of her Majesty's Proclamation. For it is therein declared that precisely such acts as theirs as I have been compelled here to complain of, are done "in derogation of their duty to her as a neutral Sovereign, and incur her high displeasure." If such, then, be the true character of the proceedings to which I have hitherto called your Lordship's attention, they surely merit something more of notice from her Majesty's Ministers than an intimation that they will be suffered to pass unreviewed unless the punishment shall be inflicted by the nation whom they are designed to injure. The object of the Government of the United States has not been to relieve itself of the duty of vigilance to capture offenders against the law; it has rather been to avoid the necessity of applying additional stringent measures for their own security against British subjects found to be engaged in such illicit enterprises, made imperative by the conviction that no preventive co-operation whatever can be expected from her Majesty's Government; it has rather been to avoid the risk of confounding the innocent with the guilty, because all happen to be involved in a general suspicion; and lastly, it has rather been to remove at as early a day as may be, consistently with its own safety, the restrictions on the trade with foreign countries which these evil-doers are labouring with so much industry to force it to protract. Your Lordship's language leaves me little hope of any co-operation of her Majesty's Government to these ends. Nevertheless, I trust I may be permitted to indulge the belief that the time is not now far distant when the difficulties thus interposed in the way of its progress will have been so far removed by its own unassisted action as to relieve both countries from the painful necessity of further continuing the discussion.—Renewing, &c.

(Signed) CHARLES FRANCIS ADAMS.

Earl Russell's reply closes the correspondence:—

EARL RUSSELL TO MR. ADAMS.

Foreign Office, May 17, 1862.

Sir,—I do not wish to prolong this correspondence, and shall only make one remark in answer to your last letter.

If the British Government, by virtue of the prerogative of the Crown, or by authority of Parliament, had prohibited, and could have prevented, the conveyance in British merchant-ships of arms and ammunition to the Confederate States, and had allowed the transport of such contraband of war to New York and to other Federal ports, her Majesty's Government would have departed from the neutral position they have assumed and maintained. If, on the other hand, her Majesty's Government had prohibited, and could have prevented, the transport of arms and ammunition to both the contending parties, they would have deprived the United States of a great part of the means by which they have carried on the war. The arms and ammunition received from Great Britain, as well as from other neutral countries, have enabled the United States to fit out the formidable armies now engaged in carrying on the war against the Southern States; while, by means of the blockade established by the Federal Government, the Southern States have been deprived of similar advantages. The impartial observance of neutral obligations by her Majesty's Government has thus been exceedingly advantageous to the cause of the more powerful of the two contending parties. I am, &c.,

THE SITUATION IN ARKANSAS.

(From the Little Rock True Democrat.)

Since writing our brief notice, two weeks ago, of the fall of the Post, wherein we expressed our conviction that the enemy would still never get control of this river, he has made no attempt whatever to do so. There has been since his success at the Post, plenty of water for him to try it, at least a portion of the way, and yet, when he has ascended White River with his gunboats and transports as high as Des Arc, with the avowed purpose of marching upon this place across the country, he has not thought proper to attempt the ascent of the Arkansas river. Perhaps he has some idea of the difficulties attending such an enterprise. The navigation of the river itself, with its narrow channel, rapid current, and thousands of snags, would alone present many dangers and difficulties, but lined as its banks have been, since the fall of the Post, by General Walker's whole army, he will have a sheet of fire to pass through that will neither be safe nor comfortable.

No one thought the Post of Arkansas an impregnable place, and but few deemed it any fortification whatever to the river. It has served its purpose. The stout resistance there offered by three or four thousand brave men to the force of the enemy, numbering about 30,000, accompanied by their gunboats, has taught them a lesson that they will not soon forget. They will be more wary in encountering our whole army, composed of the same sort of stuff as the handful at the Post. Our reliance is now, as it always has been, upon the stout hearts and strong arms of our troops, placed in such position that they cannot be overpowered in detail. They now occupy that position, and we are confident that the enemy can never take the Arkansas river.

By dint of luck and desperate courage, if they possess it, they may get a few gunboats past our troops, as they did at Vicksburg, last summer, but that will avail them nothing. It will only subject them to the possibility of capture, which will not only be possible, but highly probable. We live on an uncertain river. It may be navigable for the largest sized boats one day, and in three days more down to low water mark.

We have every confidence in our generals. General Walker, who has charge of the defences of the river below Pine Bluff, is known to be skilful, brave, and energetic. The enemy that passes him will do it in a crippled condition. General Holmes we all know. His heart is in the cause, and it is with us here in Arkansas. He is a pure man and a patriot, and will leave no effort untried to drive an invading enemy from our soil.

Our Governor has called for troops to serve in emergencies. We hope and we believe the call will be promptly answered. The people of Arkansas, notwithstanding the absence of so large a number of them on the other side of the Mississippi river, still possess both the number and the courage to oppose a successful resistance to any Abolition force that can be sent against us. We have no fears of the result. The liberation and salvation of Arkansas, we regard as certain. The fall of the insignificant place like the Post may afford grounds of complaint to untrue men, but will only nerve the brave to renewed and stouter efforts.

There may be a few in our midst who labour assiduously to impair the confidence of the soldiers in their officers, and the confidence of the people in both soldiers and officers, but their numbers are small and their influence still smaller. They are not patriots, and do not wish our cause well. Let them go. Open wide to the right and to the left, and let them pass down to the infamy their conduct merits. Arkansas will be free without their aid or countenance.

PREPARING FOR WAR.—ADDRESS OF THE GOVERNOR OF FLORIDA.

Governor John Milton, of Florida, has addressed an appeal to the planters of that State to devote their whole labour to the production of provisions. After examining all the indications of an early peace, he continues:—

That, while cherishing sincere anxiety for peace, just and honourable in its terms, and compatible with the dignity, honour, and independence of the Confederate States, yet mature reflection upon facts derived from the best sources of intelligence justifies, in my humble judgment, no reasonable hope of immediate peace; but, on the contrary, induces the belief that more active efforts will be made by the United States during the present year than have yet been made by them to subjugate the Confederate States, to liberate the slaves, to destroy all rights of property, and to dishonour and degrade the people of the South.

The people of the Confederate States should not rely for peace, either upon the interference of European Powers, or upon dissensions between the Eastern or North-western States. Their entire reliance should be upon themselves, with a just appreciation of the rights of free and intelligent people, resolved to exercise the fortitude, patriotism, and invincible courage necessary to compel a peace by conquest over tyranny.

If peace should be made during the year the probability is that the cotton now in the Confederate States would supply the demand for that article until the crop of 1864 could be prepared for market. If such be the fact, an increased quantity would cause prices to decline, and the aggregate amount of money which would be realised from the additional crop of this year would not be greater than will be realised from the cotton now on hand.

Whether a peace shall be made or the war be continued, there must necessarily be a pressing demand for provisions to supply the wants of the people in the several Confederate States. That deficiency cannot be supplied by the United States, even in the event of peace; it cannot be expected from Europe. Can it be presumed that it is remuneration for your labour that causes you to hesitate? The experience of the past settles the question, for notwithstanding the abundant crops made last year in all parts of the State, corn commands remunerative prices, and in some counties cannot be bought to save families from perishing, at less than from four or five dollars per bushel.

I appeal, then, to the patriotism and intelligence of the planters of Florida, to devote their labour exclusively to the making of corn, peas, sugar, and other provisions and supplies. I appeal to them to do so in behalf of the gallant men who are fighting for their protection, and that of their children, sisters and mothers—those noble women who have worked with self-sacrificing fortitude, energy, and industry to clothe and feed our armies—and in behalf of the name and for the honour of the State.

Act for the public welfare and God will bless you, and you will entitle yourselves to and enjoy the gratitude of your country in the midst of plenty and peace. Upon abundant supplies of provisions depends the ability of the Confederate States to conquer an honourable peace, or even to defend your property and the honour of your wives and daughters during the year.

If full crops shall not be made, the Confederate States may possibly be subjugated, your slaves freed, and all other property you may have (including cotton) taken from you, and yourselves and families dishonoured and disgraced.

Respectfully, your fellow-citizen,

JOHN MILTON, Governor of Florida.

THE ARMY OF FREDERICKSBURG.

The Richmond Examiner of March 14, publishes the following from its own Correspondent:—

Fredericksburg, March 12, 1863.

The night is bitter cold, and the freezing, furious north wind seems to have possession of the world without. Hoarse with howling, it slams the doors and rudely shakes the shutters, as if in rage to find its entrance denied. The picket fires, though shining with unwonted brilliancy, look cold and comfortless, and the sentinels pace their solitary paths with quickened steps.

Your correspondent has just returned from his daily expedition, late, wearied, and unsuccessful. In default of Northern newspapers, however, he had the pleasure of hearing read at the dress parade of a part of General Barksdale's brigade, the cheering account from General Lee of the exploits of our cavalry during the winter months. He is indebted to the kind consideration of Sergeant Cabell, of the 17th Mississippi Regiment, for the opportunity of copying this general order, which he herewith transmits.

Speaking of the dress parade reminds me of the splendid appearance which General Barksdale's brigade presented this afternoon. Comfortably clad, elate in bearing, precise in drill, every man seemed instinct with a proud appreciation of his position, as a member of this veteran and victorious organization. It was a grand sight to see these troops reviewed in the very locality of their late triumph, and literally over the graves of the vanquished invaders. As the excellent band attached to the 13th Mississippi Regiment, commanded by Colonel Carter, passed slowly in front of the column, the music sounded like a dirge over the heroes whose places along the line had been made vacant in the recent shock of battle, and then, as the musicians rapidly retraced their steps, to allegretto notes, the air seemed one of gratulation that, nevertheless, each of the fallen filled a conqueror's grave.

It was this brigade that defended Fredericksburg, on the occasion of the bombardment of the 13th December, and held its position with such death-defying pertinacity, as to provoke the unbounded wonderment of the enemy. Much of the credit, for the admirable condition of this body of men, is due to the regimental and company commanders, but none the less, to their Brigadier General, whose constant and untiring attention is not only devoted to every department of his command, but even to the minutest details of the multifarious duties devolving upon him in his position of commandant of this post.

He is evidently a believer in the semper paratus doctrine, and every day finds him in the saddle giving his own lines and the enemy's indications the closest scrutiny of personal inspection. It was a wise selection that placed him in this position of responsibility and requisite vigilance.

THE DEFENCE OF FORT MALLISTER.

(Correspondence of the Savannah Republican.)

The defence of Fort Mallister is one of historic interest and marks a historic period, because it was a desperate struggle against odds never before encountered. It stands forth in solitary pre-eminence, and can only be compared with future defences of like character. The annals of all the past furnish no parallel to it. In the history of two or three hundred sieges, from the era of Louis XIV., down to our day, no appropriate standard of comparison can be found. That history appertains generally to land attack and defence. This is the old question of ships against fortifications revived under an aspect absolutely novel. Among the more prominent instances of this description are, the attack of Lord Exmouth on Algiers in the last century; that of Lord Nelson on the Crown Batteries of Copenhagen about the beginning of this, and the comparatively recent attack by Admiral Napier on the defences of St. Jean d'Acre on the coast of Syria. There are other cases less signal, as that at New London during the war of 1812, when two 18-pounder guns beat off two British sloop-of-war. Then the ships had wooden walls, and in general their projectiles were round shot of small dimensions. The gallant defence of Vicksburg has been justly extolled, but while the attack there was by no means so formidable as that of Genesis Point, the defence was made under conditions vastly more favourable.

Fort Mallister, however, is a simple irregular earthwork, or field fortification, but the parapets are unusually thick and strong. It is quite open in the rear, and its batteries are not casemated. The embrasures in which the heaviest guns are placed are protected by traverses from an enfilading fire, but they are necessarily exposed to a direct one. This field-work has grown to its existing proportions by such successive accretions as necessity has dictated, receiving its finishing touches from the plastic hands of Captain McCrady. It would be improper to advert here to the additional development which these entrenchments are now receiving. It may suffice to say that on the 3rd instant it was far from formidable. The action was chiefly maintained by its 32-pounder rifled gun and the favourite 42-pounder. One of the traverse wheels of this last gun having been broken by a shell, it was replaced under fire.

The 8-inch gun, which did the best execution during the engagement next previous, was dismounted before meridian, by a shot which struck one of the diagonal braces. It was mounted again during the night upon a carriage sent down from Savannah. The 10-inch gun, fired at an elevation of 6.30, generally overshot the tower aimed at. It had been but recently placed in battery, and practice with it was limited.

Opposed to the fort were three iron-clad gunboats, and three mortar boats, the former launching, with a direct horizontal fire, projectiles more formidable than any yet known; the latter throwing shells with curved fires, from six o'clock a.m., during all the night, which did not prevent, however, the reparation of all the damage done during the day. In the Engineer's report, the iron-clads—distant from 1,400 to 1,900 yards—are numbered 1, 2 and 3, No. 1 being up stream. The projectiles hurled by No. 1 were hollow shot and shells of fifteen inches diameter, and also solid shot and shells of eleven inches. Those of No. 2 were cylindro-conoidal percussion shells, eight inches diameter at the base, and seventeen inches in length, and eleven inch solid shot and shells. No. 3 threw cylindro-conoidal shells like the above. This fire was maintained nearly eight hours, with average intervals of ten minutes. The most active fire appears to have been concentrated on the 42-pounder, in the immediate vicinity of which twenty-one projectiles fell. At this and most other points the happy escape of the garrison seems almost providential.

The fire of the fort was concentrated on Monitor No. 1, the men in No. 3, not on duty, quietly looking on from their deck. Lieut. Ellerby, from his position in the marsh on the left bank of the Ogeechee, only 350 yards distant from No. 3, reports that he could hear the words of command—that her ports were always open, that the guns were run regularly in and out of battery, the rammer staff and the hands of the men being visible, and that the guns were therefore loaded at the muzzle. One shot from the fort struck the tower a few inches from one of the port holes.

The revolutions of the tower of No. 1 were observed to be often temporarily arrested either from design or injury sustained. The last shot from the 42-pounder struck No. 1 low down, near the water line. This was followed by an escape of steam and the sudden appearance and disappearance of three men. After this she blew her whistle, when No. 2, which had already weighed anchor and started down stream, returned and took her place. Meanwhile No. 1 retiring, discharged her guns without aim or object.

THE LATE FIGHT NEAR WINCHESTER.

The Richmond Enquirer of March 5, contains the following letter respecting the fight near Winchester. Your readers, perhaps, may feel some curiosity to learn something of the fight that occurred between Woodstock and Winchester on the 26th ult.

On the morning of the 25th ult., the 11th and 7th Virginia Regiments of Cavalry were ordered to mount immediately. It was said that a company of Marylanders had captured a Yankee picket, and were being pursued by a large body of Yankee cavalry.

Five minutes had scarcely elapsed after the reception of the order when the 11th was ready, Colonel Funsten commanding. The 7th followed shortly after, Colonel Dulancy commanding. On went the 11th through mud and mire, eager for an opportunity to "flesh its maiden sword," for it is a regiment newly organized, and not yet officered.

About two miles beyond Woodstock, the enemy, numbering over 500, were discovered. There was no pause; the trot was changed to a gallop, and like a hurricane went the 11th at more than twice her number.

The Yankees tried to fight. But their volleys did not check the speed of our advancing column. With sabres drawn, and scarcely firing a shot, they kept on with an unbroken front.

General Jones and Colonel Funsten were in the lead. The Yankee column trembled and broke. Then commenced a retreat disastrous to them, and which our men failed not to take advantage of. Many times they rallied; but it would not do. Scarcely would they form when our gallant boys would be in among them, cutting and slashing at such a rate that Yankee could not stand it.

The fight continued in this manner for ten miles, when Strasburg was reached. Here they were slightly reinforced, and made something of a stand. By this time the veteran 7th Virginia came up, and dashing at them, started them again. On went the Yankees pell-mell at "a devil take the hindmost" kind of speed. Nothing but the fleetness of their horses saved any of them; as it was they lost not less than 200 prisoners and about fifty killed and wounded. We lost four men wounded. The 7th pursued them as far as Newtown. VALLEY.

RELIGIOUS REVIVAL IN GENERAL LEE'S ARMY.—A letter in the Richmond Enquirer from Fredericksburg says:—"The revival of religion continues with increasing interest among the soldiers.—Rev. Mr. Owens is conducting the exercises. Rev. Dr. Styles, who has been preaching so faithfully, ably, and acceptably, has left. Rev. Mr. Conling, of the Methodist Church, is now assisting Rev. Mr. Owens. But more help will be needed. The soldiers, many of them being from the South-west, express great anxiety to hear Rev. Dr. Schen, of Tennessee.—The conversions thus far number about seventy-five. Last evening there were fully 100 penitents at the altar. So great is the work, and so interested are the soldiers, that the M. E. Church South has been found inadequate for the accommodation of the congregations, and the Episcopal Church having been kindly tendered by its pastor, the Rev. Mr. Randolph, who is now here, the services have been removed to that edifice, where devotions are held as often as three times a day.

MR. THOS. E. MCNEILL, a highly educated machinist, of South Carolina, has invented a submarine torpedo combining additional advantages so as to render it terribly destructive. Mr. McNeill was educated in the large machine shops of England and this country, and is a practical machinist. He was engaged in establishing the first armoury in Montgomery, Ala., and has since been engaged in the manufacture of arms in Georgia.—Mobile Register.

PICKET TALK.—"You are almost starved out at Vicksburg," cried a Yankee picket cross the river the other day. "Oh, no! plenty of mules left!" was the reply. "Do you eat mules?" inquired the Yankee. "Certainly," said the Confederate. "We have plenty of beef and mutton," said the Yankee. "That makes you run so, you eat so much sheep," retorted the Confederate. "You all will make some money by going as substitutes under the Conscription bill," said a Confederate picket to a Yankee. "Don't care about making money that way, I am going home," replied the Yankee. Pickets will talk sometimes in spite of orders, and some good hits are made.—Fredericksburg correspondence of the Richmond Dispatch, March 10th.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

Our friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed; that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any date, will be useful and acceptable presents.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives, or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognized at this office.

Our subscribers in the South will have their paper supplied through HENRY HOTZE, Esq., the Confederate States' Commercial Agent at London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

Subscription, 25s. per annum—post paid, 30s., payable in advance.

All communications on business to be addressed, and Post-Office Orders made payable to, J. B. HOPKINS, 13, Boulevard-street, Fleet-street, London, E.C.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, APRIL 16, 1863.

The Repulse at Port Hudson.

A few months after the commencement of the war in America, a Northern newspaper founded an indignant appeal to the civilized world against the Confederates, on the fact that they were profane enough to fight on Sundays; and General McClellan gained some slight reputation by a general order enforcing a strict observance of the Sabbath, and reprobating the practice of selecting that day for a battle. It does so happen that a large proportion of the great engagements in history as revealed to us have been fought on the day of rest; and the campaigns in America have increased the list. Why this should be we know not, unless Sunday is a particularly good day for attack. But certain it is that even the Yankees have thrown over their Sabbatarianism by this time, and fight on Sunday with as much readiness as any day in the week. There was no rest for the men under Banks and Farragut's command on Sunday the 15th of March. On that day the combined operations of the military and naval forces of the Federals against Port Hudson came off; and the first of the series of movements directed to the liberation of the Mississippi from Confederate control met with a bloody and disastrous repulse. It appears that the continued resistance of Vicksburg, and the repeated losses of Federal gunboats on the Mississippi, determined the Northern commanders to attempt the passage of Port Hudson at all risks; the object being not so much the capture of the fortress itself, as the command of the Mississippi below Vicksburg, the cutting off of Confederate supplies from Louisiana and Texas, and the recovery of the district west of the Mississippi, a territory peculiarly adapted to maintain a large army in the field. With this view it was agreed that General Banks should land a considerable military force from Baton Rouge, at a point within seven miles of Port Hudson, and take the defences of the Confederate position in the rear, whilst Farragut engaged the river batteries with his flotilla of sloops of war, and gun and mortar boats. General Banks's advance was through a very difficult tract of country, and the enemy, with a vastly superior cavalry, retired skirmishing on the lines of Port Hudson, avoiding a general engagement. The arrangement seems to have been that the attack should be made simultaneously by land and water. But, as usual, there was no concert between the Federal officers. Banks found himself brought to a standstill before a position which could only be taken by an immensely superior force and a regular investment. Farragut, impatient at the delay, and apparently knowing or caring very little about Banks's proceedings, resolved to force a passage for himself. At nine o'clock on Saturday evening a red light hoisted on Farragut's ship gave the signal for advance, and the vessels of the squadron moved slowly up to the batteries; the Hartford, flag ship, leading; following her the Richmond, the Monongahela and the Mississippi—all powerful steam frigates. Lashed alongside of each was a gunboat, to give additional speed, and if necessary tow the big ships out of danger. A little fleet of mortar-boats headed by the iron-clad Essex, took up a position within shelling distance. The Confederates were prepared for them. As the leading ship neared the batteries, a rocket was sent up, followed by another and another, still higher up; and before the Federals came within easy range, a great fire was ignited in front of the principal battery, which cast its ruddy light far over to the opposite bank, and brought out the attacking squadron in bold and distinct relief. At Port Hudson the Mississippi narrows; there is a bend in the stream in the shape of a horse-shoe; and the deepest channel lies within some fifty yards of the Louisiana bank, with shoal water on the opposite side. At the bend of the river was the strongest battery, and it was here that the struggle was the fiercest. Farragut took the Hartford boldly in, and the flag-ship steamed along through a terrible fire to which she made but an ineffectual response, owing to the elevated position of the Confederate guns. One battery after another was passed, the exchanges taking place more than once at a distance of twenty to thirty yards; and finally the Hartford, with her escort, the Albatross, emerged, terribly riddled, from the storm of shot, shell, grape, and rifle balls poured upon her incessantly for three miles. The next ship, the Richmond, was less fortunate. An eighty pound solid shot passed through her side, smashing her steam-drum, closing the safety valves, and rendering her useless. Swinging round, she was towed at all speed down the river. The Monongahela was also disabled and towed off. The Mississippi, carried by the force of the current on to the shoal water, grounded immediately in front of the heaviest battery, and was set on fire either by her own crew, or the enemy's shells. After a time, some of her heavy guns having been thrown overboard, and her crew having left, she floated off, drifted past the batteries, to a point about fifteen miles below Port Hudson, and then blew up. The battle had long been over. The Hartford and Albatross had escaped; the rest of the squadron, shattered and utterly disabled, dropped down below the mortar boats. What the Federal losses are we are not likely to learn. They are fixed at 100 killed and wounded—an incredibly small number. Fifty years ago, there were many frigate engagements, in which the casualties far exceeded those now recorded. Yet in those days, a 24-pounder was a heavy gun, and shells were unknown in naval warfare. The failure of the river attack compelled Banks to fall back to his transports. But he did so with a true Yankee flourish, announcing that his expedition had completely accomplished the purpose for which it was despatched. Strange to say, for a week afterwards it was not stated that Banks's army had essayed to effect another landing at the same point and been driven off by the cutting of the levees.

Under these circumstances it is difficult to see that anything can be accomplished this season against Port Hudson. Farragut's flotilla is too weak to return to the attack. The commander himself is in a position of considerable peril. The Webb, the Queen of the West, the City of Vicksburg, and several smaller steamers are within a day's reach of the Hartford and Albatross. The Confederates may easily improvise a cotton-clad squadron such as captured the Harriet Lane at Galveston. We may possibly see the experiment tried. It is plain that very little help is to be looked for from Porter's gunboat squadron. Of two steamers that last made the attempt to pass the batteries at Vicksburg, one sank; the other, disabled and sinking, was run ashore a few miles below. The strength of Porter's squadron is frittered in expeditions down Yazoo Pass, or up the creeks and bayous that cut the State of Mississippi. And even here the iron-clads not only make no impression on the Confederate batteries, but cannot contend with light field-pieces and the rifle of the guerilla.

The Yazoo river has not been reached. At Fort Pemberton, and on the Sunflower River, the Federals have been repulsed. It is known that the sickness in Grant's army is rapidly incapacitating it from action. There seems no alternative for the Federals, but another assault upon the works which shook off Sherman so roughly—or retreat. Neither of these courses is palatable to the war administration, so the Federal flotillas are despatched constantly on fresh voyages of discovery, and the Northern ear is tickled with renewed promises of eventual triumph, though each day's persistency in the struggle only exposes the Federal forces to fresh disaster.

There is still one hope left to the North. Rosencranz is at the head of well-disciplined and well-equipped forces, comprising some of the best soldiers of the North. He still, it is said, outnumber the Confederates in front of him, and may yet strike a great blow for Tennessee. If he loses, Kentucky and Tennessee are gone. But if he remains inactive, the Confederate generals will gather in his rear; the transport and supplies and reinforcements, now an easy matter, will become a matter of great difficulty; and the relief of Vicksburg will enable the Confederates to throw an overwhelming force upon him and crush him. It is not likely that the two armies, numbering each of them over 60,000 men, can remain long confronting one another. When the mud is dried up and the torrents less swollen, there will be a great battle for Nashville, and on its issue possibly depends the question of another twelvemonths' war, or an early peace. The recovery of Tennessee, and the possession of Kentucky, would be arguments in favour of the South very few Governments in Europe could withstand.

Precedents for Recognition.

We have before us a pamphlet on Recognition, written by a gentleman whose bias is rendered sufficiently evident by one of his concluding sentences, in which he expresses a hope that "no Englishman can feel for the Confederate States the smallest enthusiasm." Despite this evidence of a neutrality by no means cold and unfriendly towards the North, the pamphlet is written in the calm and impartial tone which befits a student of historical precedents and international law. Its statements are, so far as we know, correct; and if we dissent from the author's practical conclusion, his own arguments and the facts which he himself cites afford the means of answering him. He displays neither the bitter spirit nor the disingenuous temper of "Historicus;" and he does not dream of introducing into a grave discussion of law and policy the wild declamations which such orators as Messrs. Bright and Taylor, and such journals as the Daily News consider a satisfactory substitute for truth and reason. The line of argument he pursues offers little temptation either to unfairness or to denunciation. His purpose is to examine thoroughly two important events in the history of the American continent, in order to deduce from them reasons against the immediate recognition of the Confederate States; and he has performed his task with fidelity, and not without skill.

The acknowledgment of the independence of the revolted Colonies of Great Britain in 1778 by the French Government, is said to be not only a thoroughly bad precedent, but a precedent involving exactly that kind of action towards a friendly Power engaged in a struggle with rebellious provinces that a neutral is bound to avoid. "Historicus," as some of our readers may remember, treats it as a precedent, showing that recognition durante bello affords to the dispossessed Power a just cause of war, inasmuch as the action of France was speedily followed by hostilities commenced by England. The chief value of the pamphlet before us is that it affords a complete answer to this argument, by showing that, so far from satisfying herself with the simple recognition of the United States, with sending an envoy to Philadelphia, and receiving an American envoy at Paris, France took part with the colonists in a manner which, independently of the question of recognition, was a sufficient justification of the declaration of war on the part of the mother-country. The Government of France, through unofficial agents, supplied the colonists with arms and munitions of war—an act admitted by all jurists to be one of unwar-takeable hostility. French privateers were cruising in all directions under American letters of marque, and found refuge at their will in French ports. In 1777, France was obviously and notoriously preparing for war; and in 1778, when she signed the treaty which acknowledged the independence of the United States, she also entered into an offensive and defensive alliance with them, to take effect in the event, foreseen and intended, of a rupture between France and England. All this was known to the English Ambassador, and to his Government, before the receipt of the extremely insulting communication, in which the French Minister announced that the United States "are in full possession of their independence," and that France had concluded with them a treaty of amity and commerce. "All the attendant circumstances proved hostility. The recognition was the open act which closed a series of clandestine intrigues. The communication was felt on all hands to be intended as an insult. It was accepted as an insult." War was the almost immediate consequence; but the cause of that war was—not the simple recognition of the de facto independence of the United States, but, in the first place, the previous and systematic hostility of the French Government, from which England had already endured many provocations in patience; and secondly, the flagrant insolence of the manner in which the recognition was announced, and the character of the engagements by which it was accompanied. It was the object of France that there should be war, it was her policy to seize a favourable opportunity for striking a blow at the pride and power of her great rival; and the recognition of the United States was intended as a defiance, and communicated in a tone which left no doubt of the intention. It is quite clear that by this case there is no precedent adverse to recognition established; no proof of the favourite assertion of Federal advocates, that the acknowledgment of a revolted State by foreign Powers affords the dispossessed Power a just cause of quarrel. If England were to furnish the Confederate States with supplies of arms purchased with public money, and shipped by agents of the Government; if she openly allowed her subjects to accept letters of marque from Jefferson Davis, and fit out ships to cruise in the Confederate service; if she concluded a treaty offensive and defensive with the Government at Richmond—then, indeed, the Northern States would have no choice but to declare war. They would be acting rashly, and engaging in a desperate struggle; but they could hardly do otherwise. This was the case of England when France communicated, in 1778, her treaty of commerce with the United States. But no one wishes or imagines it possible that England should do anything of the sort. And her resolution to resent by war the open hostility of France in 1778 certainly does not preclude her from receiving Mr. Mason on an equal footing with Mr. Adams as the Minister of an independent Power, sending a representative to Richmond, and asking the exequatur of the Confederate Government for her consuls. This would not be a cause of war; and this is all that she could be called upon to do.

The story of the Spanish American Colonies is much longer, but the gist of the case lies in a nutshell. They were immediately recognised as belligerent Powers; they were, after a time, and certainly before their independence was established, admitted to a sort of partial or commercial recognition; and finally, their independence was formally acknowledged, first by the United States, and afterwards by England. When this was done, some of them were altogether clear of Spanish troops, in others Spain only held a few strong positions, while in Peru alone she had still an army on foot—and Peru was not recognised. So far, the position of the South American colonies was stronger than that of the Confederate States. On the other hand, it was just as possible that Spain, availing herself of her hold on Peru, should reconquer the rest of her possessions, as it is now that the armies which possess no more of the Confederate States than the ground covered by their encampments or devastated by their marauding parties, should fulfil the ten times repeated promise of their Government to crush out the rebellion. It is true that Confederate ports are blockaded, and that those of the Spanish colonies were not; but this difference can hardly be held to affect in any way their respective claims to recognition. A blockade is in itself a quasi-acknowledgment of the de facto independence of the State whose ports are blockaded; and the superiority of naval force which enables the dispossessed Power to inflict this annoyance on its enemy, can hardly be thought to prove that it has not been effectually and finally ousted. It is true that the war between Spain and her colonies had lasted for some twelve or fifteen years before their independence was formally acknowledged by foreign Governments; but during that long period Spain had sustained fewer and less serious disasters than have befallen the Federalists, in the two years already occupied by the present conflict. Two years of war are now as long, for all practical purposes, as ten years of war were in times gone by; they involve sacrifices as extensive, loss of life as heavy, and a trial of strength quite as sufficient and conclusive. Independence maintained for eighteen months against a Power with a continuous frontier, able to send half a million of men into the field, is surely as sufficiently asserted as when defended against Spain, with a navy of no account and an army that hardly deserved the name, by colonies on the other side of the globe. Finally, it must be remembered that the Confederate States have an orderly and established Government, which the Spanish colonies had not; and that there is not in the South, as there was in Spanish America, a powerful party in arms, or ready to rise in arms, in support of the dispossessed claimant of sovereignty. We confess ourselves unable to see how, if the acknowledgment of the Spanish colonies was just and unexceptionable, any reasonable objection can be made to the recognition of the Confederate States, at least, as soon as the present campaign shall have terminated in their favour.

It seems to us, moreover, that the general rules deduced by the pamphleteer from his special examples are altogether in our favour. He says that "while the civil war continues, a foreign Power, desirous of preserving neutrality, should remain an impartial spectator. If, however, its own relations with the revolted province require, and the facts warrant such a recognition, the foreign Power may recognise the separate political existence of the revolted province, so far as regards its foreign relations, without prejudging the question as to its ultimate and absolute independence of the parent State. This is a limited recognition." It would, we think, be a recognition sufficiently ample to serve all purposes—for it is only as regards its relations with themselves that foreign Powers need enter into any engagements or negotiations with the aspirant to national existence. Again he says, "When independence is effectually established, recognition is a simple question of policy on the part of the foreign Power," and he admits that every Power is entitled to judge for itself whether or no independence has actually been made good. Is not this a distinct admission that England has a right to recognise the Confederate States? No impartial observer doubts the fact that their independence is established; no sane man questions the deep interest which England has in formally admitting that fact. Why then, on the pamphleteer's own showing, should recognition be any longer delayed?

We forbear to enter on two questions, always carefully avoided by the opponents of recognition—how far the Secession of States, acknowledged by England as sovereign, from a Confederacy which she has never formally acknowledged, can be treated by an English statesman as a simple case of revolt; and how far, after the precedent set by itself in the case of Hungary, the Federal Government would be entitled to complain of any recognition, however ill-timed and precipitate. Our endeavour has been simply to meet the pamphleteer on his own ground, and show that his precedents do not justify his conclusion; that the acknowledgment by France of the independence of the United States was not in itself the cause of war, and would not have been considered a sufficient ground of war, on the part of England; and that in the case of the Spanish Republics there was no greater justification for recognition than could now be pleaded on behalf of the Confederate States of America. And on these points we are content to leave the issue to the judgment of our readers.

The Illegal Seizure of British Vessels.

We elsewhere publish some diplomatic correspondence upon belligerent rights at sea, and no one can read it without feeling surprised that Lord Russell should have thought it necessary to submit the case of the Peterhoff to the law officers of the Crown, seeing that the law is so certain and defined; and it is not less surprising that her Majesty's Government should appear to sanction the doctrine that the mere allegation on the part of the Federal Government of a legal pretext will justify a palpably illegal transaction. Our merchants are determined not to submit to a construction of the law which will involve the stoppage of their trade with certain ports now, and be a precedent for interference with their commerce in the future. Messrs. Bennett and Wake, the brokers for a vessel "on the berth" for Matamoras, have written to the Post-office authorities, to inform them that the owners of that vessel refuse to carry a mail unless some guarantee be afforded against the violation of the same by the Federals, and the employment of the letters therein to aid in casting suspicion on ship and cargo. These gentlemen on behalf of the owners have expressed their willingness that the vessel shall proceed with the mail, if the Post-office authorities will send a mail agent in charge of the bags. Some shippers to Matamoras have appealed to Lord Russell for protection; and a dispute has arisen between the owners and shippers of a vessel, because the former refuse to allow their ship to proceed on the voyage without a proper guarantee.

There can, we repeat, be no doubt about the law. No matter what the cargo of a ship belonging to a neutral nation, and proceeding from one neutral port to another neutral port, consists of, the vessel cannot be lawfully seized. Such is the dictum of Lord Russell. In his Lordship's despatch contained in Blue Book No. 4 of this year, p. 237, he says:—"It is of the very essence of the definition of contraband that the articles should have a hostile, and not a neutral destination. 'Goods,' says Lord Stowell, 'going to a neutral port cannot come under the description of contraband, all goods going there being equally lawful.' The rule respecting contrabands," he adds, "as I have always understood it, is, that articles must be taken in delicto in the actual prosecution of the voyage to an enemy's port." And again, p. 238:—"Your own territory or ships of your own country are places of which you are yourself the master. The enemy's territory or the enemy's ships are places in which you have a right to exercise acts of hostility. Neutral vessels guilty of no violation of the laws of neutrality are places where you have no right to exercise acts of hostility." But Mr. Seward himself, under the pressure of the spirited protest of Admiral Milne, explicitly concurs in this doctrine. In his instructions to Federal naval officers he says, "And that if it shall appear that she is actually bound and passing from one friendly, or so-called neutral, port to another, and not bound, or proceeding to, or from, a port in the possession of the insurgents, then she cannot be lawfully seized." Here Mr. Seward distinctly disavows the pretext put forth by Mr. Adams in his despatch to Earl Russell about the Labuan, that "that vessel had become involved in a suspicion not unfairly attaching itself to all vessels sailing under British colours in the neighbourhood of the place where she was taken." The port may be only so-called neutral, but a vessel proceeding to it from another so-called neutral port cannot lawfully be seized.

It is not then a question of law that has to be decided. The Peterhoff was unlawfully seized, for she was sailing from a neutral port to a neutral port, and carrying her Majesty's mails, and we think, there is not the slightest doubt that the Peterhoff will be given up. But the issue to be tried is, whether the British Government will permit the Federals to systematically violate the law; or whether they will prevent by force Federal cruisers from seizing British ships proceeding from a neutral port to a neutral port for that, irrespective of the cargo is a lawful voyage. If not we must resign our trade with Matamoras and other ports to New York merchants, who, by the way, are not slow to take advantage of the action of the United States' Government and the inaction of the British Government, as may be seen from the number of vessels for Matamoras advertised in the New York papers.

Colenso on the Pentateuch.

It is affirmed of one Synesius, a later Bishop of the Alexandrian Church, that he openly refused to preach fables to the people unless he might be permitted to philosophise at home; and in our own Church, Bishop Peacock, in setting forth "the necessity and importance of the moral law of Kinde or moral philosophy" in opposition to those who derived all morality from Revelation, and in asserting the right of private judgment, incurred the high displeasure of the Episcopate. Parallels to these have re-appeared in our own day, and while the authors of Essays and Reviews may be regarded as antitypes of such as Bishop Peacock, Colenso approaches very nearly to the stamp of Synesius.

It is, perhaps, difficult to magnify the excitement which the publication of the first two numbers of "Colenso on the Pentateuch" has caused among the clergy of England and a portion of the laity, both of this and other countries; and in view of this fact our object will be to lay before our readers, as simply as possible, the question on which the Bishop takes issue with his brethren of the Episcopal Bench, and those who take the orthodox view of the Old Testament. Of the author himself and of his antecedents it will be sufficient to state that he took a very high degree in mathematics in the University of Cambridge, that he was for some time a master in one of the public schools of England, that he was consecrated Bishop of Natal in 1854, and that he is about fifty years of age. As a writer he had gained credit by the publication of an excellent treatise on arithmetic and algebra, and had already aspired to higher fame by a Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans, and a few other theological works—and here, perhaps, in order at once to clear this portion of the ground, it seems to us that, so far as regards his literary reputation, the less the Bishop, who really to some extent is affected with the "scribendi cacœthes," had concerned himself with composition the better would it have been for his renown; no one, whatever his opinion may be of Colenso's views, can possibly tolerate his feeble, rambling, and even childish style, his lack of logical powers, and his inveterate habit of repeating usque ad nauseam facts already stated and arguments sufficiently propounded. His reasoning is essentially feminine, but with a strong dash of the redundancy of an Old Bailey lawyer.

But the garb, after all, is unimportant, and the body may even gain by the contrast; into the substance of the latter we shall look more closely. Now Part I. of "Colenso on the Pentateuch" is purely negative and destructive. It has for its object to prove that very considerable portions of the Mosaic narrative are "not historically true," and that the doctrine of the verbal inspiration of that portion of Scripture is untenable. The difficulties which attach to the story of the creation and the fall of man, the flood, the ark, and the confusion of tongues at the Tower of Babel, whether as at variance with the moral nature of man, or with the results of geological and ethnological researches, are merely glanced at and acknowledged. A different field of criticism is chosen, and one more in harmony with a mind the characteristic of which is a restless love of arithmetical calculation. The Bishop takes the numbers of the Israelites who came out of Egypt as stated at 600,000 men, besides women and children—about two millions in all, and he then proceeds to start a thousand difficulties; he contemplates the whole congregation of men standing at the door of the Tabernacle, and pictures a column, the ranks of which would consist of nine men, and the depth of which would be twenty miles. He forms these two millions of human beings into a community, and places them in an encampment the area of which is equal to that of London; he stands aghast at the requisites of such a city, the supplies, the sanitary arrangements, and above all at the duties of the priests,—who being but three in number, are commanded to carry on their shoulders the carcasses of the slain bullocks to the outskirts of the camp; Joshua reads all the words of the law before "all the congregation of Israel, with the women and the little ones and the strangers that were conversant among them." The tents of the travellers are carried on the backs of 200,000 oxen; the flocks and herds number upwards of two millions, and are supported in a "waste howling wilderness," where miracles are required to furnish even the people with a supply of water. The first-born males are 22,273, and consequently every mother of Israel must have had, on the average, forty-two sons. The Israelites make the Exodus in the fourth generation from the sons of Jacob, and according to a reasonable calculation the males would at that time number 5,000, not 600,000; while the tribe of Dan would have boasted but twenty-seven warriors, instead of the 62,700 stated in the narrative. Sacrifices to an enormous quantity were to be offered daily by the three priests, to whom large portions thereof were allotted to be eaten in the most holy place, while at the Passover each priest must have sprinkled the blood of 50,000 lambs in about two hours.

Such is the line of argument pursued by Colenso in Part I., and having added thereto the force of a few passages, in which the actions approved or the commands given seem inconsistent with the idea of "the Father and Faithful Creator of all mankind," he asks his reader whether he can any longer believe that this portion of the Bible is none other than "the voice of Him that sitteth upon the Throne," and that every word, every syllable, and every letter, is the direct utterance of the most High.

Part II. of the work is partly negative and partly constructive. It first endeavours to show that the Pentateuch was not written by Moses, and then it attempts to fix approximately the dates at which and the authors by whom the various portions of the Five Books were composed. The negative proposition is demonstrated by the exposure of anachronisms involved in such a passage as this in the Book of Genesis: "These are the kings that reigned in the land of Edom, before there reigned any king over the children of Israel,"—as if such a passage could possibly have been written 400 years before the royal rule existed. The series of constructive propositions are necessarily of a highly tentative character, but the general results may be thus shortly summarised. The hands of two distinct authors are traced in the first four books of the Pentateuch; one of them always uses the word Elohim as the title of the Deity throughout the book of Genesis and the first five chapters of Exodus, while the other employs the term Jehovah, even from the creation. Samuel is pointed out as the author of the Elohist parts, while the Jehovistic division is ascribed to one or more writers living in the later days of David and the early days of Solomon. Many passages, in addition to the efforts of these authors, are said to be interpolated by the hand of the Deuteronomist, whose date is fixed in the reign of Josiah, and who was perhaps the prophet Jeremiah. The Psalms of David are analysed with great labour and some skill for the purpose of pointing out that it was during the life of David that the title Jehovah was brought into general use to supplement or to take the place of the former title Elohim. The latter word is the general name for Deity in the Hebrew language, and consequently may be used of a heathen god. Jehovah is the proper personal name of Him who is declared emphatically to be the covenant God of the Hebrews. Elohim in the English version is rendered God, Jehovah is translated Lord. The narrative of the Elohist is connected throughout, and never assumes a knowledge of facts; the Jehovistic passages are more disjointed fragments, and require the Elohist link to render them intelligible. The first, and perhaps the most striking, instance of the double nature of the Pentateuch is given in the first two chapters of the Book of Genesis; in them two distinct and, as Colenso maintains by the statement of some examples, two contradictory accounts, are given of the creation. The Elohist occupies the first chapter and the first three verses of the second, where the Jehovist takes up the narrative. The Jehovist is also the sole narrator of the Fall. Finally, as the two component parts are distinguishable even in the English version, the ordinary reader is conjured to take his Bible and work out the theory for himself.

So far then we have endeavoured, in a space that is too narrow for a just explanation, to convey to the reader some idea of the scheme of the first two parts of Colenso on the Pentateuch; and the first question that arises is, Are these things new? and, indeed, as far as our experience goes, great numbers of persons are perfectly satisfied, and delighted if they are only assured that these things are not new. Of course they are not. Difficulties brought to light by science and by all powers external to the book itself, have a birth coeval with the dawn of that science and the discovery of those powers. But internal difficulties—and on these Colenso takes his stand—are co-existent with themselves, or rather with the intelligence that detects them. We entirely agree with Colenso, that his arguments and discoveries are not new, though, as he says, it is very possible that they were new to him, and certainly so to the bulk of his readers. What he has done, whether well or ill, whether advisedly or not, is simply this: he has put before the public, wise and ignorant, theologian and man of the world, in a readable and tangible shape, questions and objections which, for the present generation, at any rate, have been hidden away in Greek folios, in musty English treatises of the eighteenth century, and the by no means popular literature of the German Neologists. At the same time he claims, and probably justly, the credit of perfect originality in certain portions of his work; but he goes no further. Indeed, the Elohist and Jehovistic controversy has long been a grand battle-field for the Germans; and we have the authority of the Archbishop of Canterbury himself, that many of Colenso's objections were utterly refuted by Archbishop Ussher and Bishop Watson. As to such a difficulty as the double history of the creation, that was transparent to a Jew who was the contemporary of the Saviour, for (we quote from the "Journal of Sacred and Classical Philology.") "Philo," observing that Moses described the creation of the universe twice—once in the first chapter of Genesis, and again in the second chapter—supposed that the first chapter contained an account of the intelligible world, κόσμος νοητός, and of the heavenly or ideal man, of whom the protoplast is the ignoble antitype, the creation of this Adam being described in the second chapter." The contempt of the same writer for the historical narrative of the Pentateuch is notorious, and yet he is imitated and panegyrised by such men as Clement and Origen, and surpassed in his wildest efforts of allegorical interpretation by the latter. These fathers, renowned in all ages of the Church, belonged to a school which succeeded in refining away the recorded facts of the early Jewish history, and therefore, though their method was different, they clearly venerated or believed the statements of Moses not one whit more than Colenso.

Perhaps the most remarkable fact in connection with the Bishop of Natal and this book, is his resolution to retain his office in the Church. We think him bound to resign, and for one very simple and substantial reason. He admits that he cannot conscientiously use the entire Liturgical Forms which he must use if he administer the Sacrament of Baptism or perform the rite of Ordination, and on his own principles he should be the last man to dare such holy things against his conscience. We are therefore at a loss to understand upon what grounds, satisfactory to himself, he has publicly contradicted the assumption of his inability to discharge the duties of his episcopal office. But we do not feel called upon to join in a general chorus of unchristian denunciation, or to aid the cause of legal and social persecution.

It is possible that the law may become a necessity, but social excommunication is only too speedy a consequence of an opposition to received opinions. The clergy may feel bound to sign an assurance that their faith is unshaken even after a careful study of "Colenso on the Pentateuch," (for we presume that no man has ventured to endorse protests against that of which he is ignorant); but it is not necessary that sarcasm, scurrility, and violent invective should be made the allies of an impregnable orthodoxy. The temptations to avowed scepticism are not so alluring to a bishop, but that he may, at least, retain the credit of an infatuated sincerity. The day has long since past when free thought was a synonym for irreligion, and when scepticism could be ascribed only to the passions of the libertine or the pride of the intellectualist. To use the words of the Bishop of London, quoted by Colenso, "we cannot for a moment admit any theory which, teaching that as clergymen they are bound to an unquestioning adherence to the Church's standards, removes the clergy out of the category of inquiring honest men." We appeal to the words of St. Augustine, equally applicable and more authoritative, that "the grand purpose of the Christian is that he should behold with the eye of reason also that which he already grasps with the confidence of faith." It is idle to call the attacks of Colenso "puerile and trite," and yet to be panic-stricken at the sound of his name; truth must triumph, and where the side of truth is, there at least security may also exist. If the clergy of the Church of England are aroused to a more minute, a more critical and accurate knowledge of that Scripture which they assume to teach, if the Universities are stirred up to prepare the candidates for holy orders by imparting even a moderate knowledge of theology, no great regret will pursue the publication of Colenso's book even in the most orthodox minds. The laity have a right to look to the clergy for guidance or instruction in such a crisis as the inquiries of the age are constituting. The hands of the latter, if they show themselves men, may yet be strengthened by the co-operation of the former, but assuredly it is not enough to appoint a committee of convocation, to issue mandatory letters* of excommunication, or to take refuge behind the signature of a thousand pretexts.

English Universities.

(Concluded from No. 50.)

The contemplation of youth in its struggles for glory, either in the stern field of war or in the more placid, yet not less varied contests of peace, is peculiarly interesting to every generous mind; indeed, if it is an impossibility to form an adequate conception of the frigid degradation of the man who is unmoved at the spectacle of a gallant people expending, with careless extravagance, the best blood of its young men, in the cause of liberty or patriotism, surely it is, at least, difficult to imagine that the toils and victories, the hopes and fears which attend the career of industrious youth can fail to excite the attention either of the philosopher or professed man of the world; and if those actions, in which the intellect and genius are concerned, those of the Senate, the Forum, or the schools, are admirable, it is, at least, pardonable to bestow a passing approval upon the efforts of the body and the results of physical strength and courage.

We have discussed the higher topics of interest in connection with one of the English Universities. Its constitution, its connection with the Established Church, and the mutual influences of these two institutions upon each other have been briefly explained, and the various objects of study, with the methods employed for ascertaining proficiency in them, have been surveyed. The governing and educational bodies, as well as the beneficiaries or recipients of academical rewards, have been partially enumerated and described; but there is one class for which all this vast machinery is, or rather ought to be, set in motion, and upon which a passing word has as yet been scarcely expended. To understand Cambridge and Oxford it is necessary to understand their students; to forget them would be to describe England and forget her middle-class, to describe Paris and ignore its sans-culottes.

In the summary taken of the members of the Universities last year, the students or undergraduates were found to number 1526. The increase during the present century has been steady and decided. Unfortunately there has been during the same period a strong concentration of students upon the two great Colleges, Trinity and St. John's, which now bear upon their books more than half the whole body of undergraduates. Considerable as the aggregate undoubtedly is, it perhaps falls short of the multitude which the wealth, the desire of knowledge, and the love of ancient places and ancient things characteristic of England might reasonably furnish. How far the defect is to be attributed to the system we cannot stay to examine, but in any inquiry the immense demands of trade in a commercial country and the prevalence of Nonconformist opinions in England must not be forgotten. Due weight must also be given to the age of the students and to the expense of the University career.

Now, so far as age is concerned, the custom, not the rule, of the two great English Universities is absolutely singular. The average age at which students enter is eighteen, and of course, therefore, the average age of departure will be between twenty-one and twenty-two. Many Universities are mere schools on a large scale; that aspect is the especial object of avoidance at Oxford and Cambridge, and experience shows that, at least, under their systems, the career of younger students is decidedly unsuccessful. As to the expense, perhaps no great error will be incurred by the estimate that £200 a year is a sufficient sum to cover every reasonable outlay; while we are quite sure that very many students who possess that peculiar gift of economy so natural to age, presumptively so rare in youth, content themselves with a much smaller expenditure. Many a vivid novel and many a dry discourse has been written to paint in feeble yet extravagant colours, the horrors of youthful recklessness, the unavailing regret of after-life, and the miserable despair of the despoiled parent. Who doubts prodigality in youth any more than swindling in manhood? Yet one has in it generous traits; it even commands our sympathies, and at least deserves pity rather than anger; the other, if successful, is not more condemned. We are not the advocates of folly or intemperance, but we are not void of the suspicion that in a money-getting age like the present, parsimony may well be left to take care of itself, and that the open hand of youth may be too quickly closed by the niggardliness of age; for in our opinion, there is more reason to apprehend that the deviation from the right path will be the result not of liberal impulse, but of a circumspect calculation. Yet our estimate of expense, though considerable, does not absolutely exclude persons of more limited means. So richly are the colleges endowed, and so carefully and honestly are the various scholarships, exhibitions, or other pecuniary aids now awarded to students of merit, that every undergraduate who possesses talent in a fair degree, may obtain such a share of the founders' liberality, as to render the expense of his education comparatively trifling.

As to discipline, the grand theory is to avoid unnecessary interference. The idea of liberty in its most tangible form is the privilege or right of being let alone. An Englishman hates paternal governments, imbued with the spirit of Paul Pry, and worked with the machinery of Bureaucracy; and, perhaps, the great glory of the University authorities is, that they have never been busybodies; they assert their existence by a moderate exaction of attendance at Divine Service in their chapels, and at dinner in their halls; and the very reasonable regulation that the hour of 10 o'clock in the evening, and midnight at the latest, shall be the limit of absence from the precincts of the college; they know well enough that general sound sense and the self-respect that waits on liberty are better guardians than petty restraints and official surveillance. Nothing, however, is more striking to the stranger, and, perhaps, nothing more gratifying to a generous and vigorous mind, than the physical contests by which the intellectual contests are varied, which are reckoned scarcely second to these, and which have, perhaps, contributed beyond all other means to the preservation of the physical and moral energies of the Saxon race. They are fatal to morbid melancholy and false sentimentalism; they help to adjust the balance between the material and spiritual agencies, and promote that strong, plain, practical common sense which is characteristic of the English nation. They are the best antidotes to the seductive influences of wealth and luxury, and annihilate indolence and effeminacy. So long as they are cultivated with the present devotion, the men of Oxford and Cambridge will never incur the censure of the satirist, or be reckoned among the

"Sponsi Penelope, nebulones, Alcinoique
In cute curanda plus æquo operata juvenus."

Tennis, football, rackets, and cricket are practised with ardour; huge pedestrian undertakings, emulating the forced marches of the swiftest of armies; games almost Olympic, with prizes for the fleetest runners and the stoutest jumpers, the most powerful in "putting the stone," all are pressed into the service of physical development. But the deepest energies and the most profound enthusiasm are reserved for the contests of the bar. No toil, no self-denial is considered too high a price to pay for victory in the struggles between the rival Colleges, or the grand annual match between the Universities. It is calculated that nearly one fourth of the whole body of undergraduates is engaged in the boating contests in the course of the year. The violence of that particular species of exercise, and the concentration of vast energies upon a race as brief as it is severe, constitute an ordeal which necessitates the most perfect health associated with the most consummate skill. The crews under the command of captains who are always disciplinarians, and occasionally martinetts, learn to do and to endure, to resist the wine-cup, the pleasant dishes, and the seductive pipe, and to subsist on fare rendered palatable by Spartan heroism and stoic patience.

"Qui stultet optatam cursu contingere metam, Multa tulit fecitque puer, sudavit et alsit."

It is true that the English climate is peculiarly adapted for such pursuits, and that in their fullest development they would be simply impossible under a more fervid sun; but wherever institutions are planted for the education of youth in its broadest sense, the means will doubtless be found, if the spirit be not wanting, to kill listless indolence and nourish self-imposed toil.

Those of our readers who have followed us to this the fourth notice which we have taken of the system of one of the English Universities, will readily have perceived how much has been omitted that might have been said with advantage, and how incomplete is the picture, not merely in detail, but even in outline. At least, however, we have endeavoured rather to portray the most striking features than crowd the canvass with insignificant accessories.

Perhaps, however, it will not be out of place to say a few words in conclusion on the establishment of Universities in countries where they do not yet exist at all, or only in an infantine condition, especially in relation to communities which boast an English descent, speak the English language, and respect or retain English manners. Of all the problems which such communities will be called upon to solve, none will equal in difficulty and importance that of education, for it is the solution of all others. Yet the advantages in this particular department of social science are all on the side of youthful communities. They have not to contend against the incubus of six centuries. If abuses are to exist they will be the creation of those who suffer under them, and not the "dam-nosa hereditas" bequeathed to the innocent heir. These communities, then, will take care that their educational institutions are supported by endowments, and not by annual grants from the Government of the day. They will endeavour that the principles upon which those institutions are founded shall be firm to resist the caprice of fancy or passion, yet capable of leading, not obstructing, the march of true public opinion. How far religious differences shall be ignored by recognising no particular sect or form as the established one, or whether, on the other hand, each great religious body shall possess its particular place of education and its particular endowment, is a question of paramount difficulty; suppressed rather than solved in England by the force of circumstances, but which can and must be definitively settled under new institutions. It is not, perhaps, an empty conjecture that in cases where common struggles and common victories have made a united people the grand consideration, that the men who compose the nation are fellow-Christians and fellow citizens may overcome the influences of antagonistic or rival forms of religion. At least, no preference will be given to clergy over laity, or to laity over clergy; the inquiry will be who is the best adapted by his intellectual power to fill the teacher's chair,—not what is his creed, whether he is a layman or a clergyman, or what is his particular set of opinions. Freedom of thought, freedom of expression, and freedom of action for all, teachers and scholars, will be the pride of a free country. In studies, ancient literature will occupy the foremost place, and amidst the contemplation of the grand thoughts and actions of Greeks and Romans, the language, in which those thoughts and actions are clothed will be appreciated no less diligently. History, and the philosophy of history will deeply occupy minds which have yet before them the task of moulding, if not of creating new forms of government, under circumstances that have no precedent. Mathematics, extended perhaps beyond expertness in the use of the "calculus," and physical science will not be disregarded; and a place will doubtless be found for such sciences as the Philosophy of the Mind, Jurisprudence, Politics, and Political Economy. To such studies as these, however, the intellect of the new world will rush perhaps too eagerly, and in a country where genius readily forces its way to political power the temptation to pursue so specious a form of learning will, perhaps, be irresistible. To train the intellect to the highest state of efficiency, to elevate the character, and to fill the mind with noble aspirations, will be the great objects of education; not to teach many things badly, or to fill the wearied and senseless brain with a thousand facts or dates, like a storehouse of ill-assorted goods. These great objects will be attained by concentration, not by distraction of the intellectual powers. Ample rewards will not be wanting to stimulate industry, and the problem will, perhaps, be solved of exacting continuous exertion for corresponding reward.

In such or similar projects for the progress of his nation, surely no true patriot will hesitate to join. He will recognise the doctrine that moral progress and material progress must advance with equal steps, and that the former is impossible, except by the advance of education. He will remember that the triumphs of literature are less costly, equally honourable, and more durable than those of statesmanship or war, and he will acknowledge that education alone can give light, and that that alone can render possible the union of absolute popular liberty with perfect order and security.

Henry St. John, Viscount Bolingbroke, was a noted man in a great era, and so played his part as a politician and a statesman as to entitle him to the remembrance, if not to the gratitude, of posterity; but his fame as an orator, as the leader of the House of Commons, as the Foreign Secretary of State at a critical period of our national history and of the history of Europe, is almost eclipsed by the recollection of his vices or, perhaps, we ought to say of the vices ascribed to him in an age when men esteemed virtuous thought it lawful and right to blacken the characters of, and to unscrupulously malign their political opponents. We do not mean that Bolingbroke does not merit the censure of his biographers. He was a drunkard, a profligate, a gambler, a faithless husband, and false to friendship, and it is no excuse for him, though it has been urged in palliation of his offences, that he was neither worse nor better than his compeers—that Addison sometimes took too much wine, that profligacy was fashionable, that clergymen gambled, that the observance of the seventh commandment was not in vogue and was even considered vulgar, and that sordid ambition sanctified ingratitude. That all his faults were exaggerated, and that many of the charges brought against him were untrue, we cannot doubt. He may have been a four-bottle man, and in his early life have evenly divided his waking hours between hard work and hard drinking; but it is absurd to suppose that during the whole of his ministerial career—when he was transacting an immense amount of public business as Secretary of State, intriguing at Court, managing the House of Commons, and writing a multitude of diplomatic letters and despatches,—that his nights were regularly passed in swilling champagne. There is sufficient evidence that he had more than one mistress, and we may even go so far as to say the presumption is he had, at least, half a dozen; but when we are told that all the prostitutes and maid-servants who came in his way were the partners in or victims of his insatiable lust, we reject the tale, because we know it cannot be true. We may admit that Bolingbroke was in his private life rather worse than the worst of his contemporaries, without representing him as an almost incredible monster of viciousness. It is, however, not with the man, but with the statesman, that we are concerned. A biography which reproduced in extenso all the scandalous stories about Bolingbroke that have come down to us would gratify the lewd, as well as the envious pignies who are delighted to find that the giants have weaknesses that degrade them in some respects to the level of the lowest; but such a biography would answer no good purpose—it would not even reflect the manners of a bygone generation. A public man with Bolingbroke's vanity and excessive greed of praise has no genuine private life. Even in retirement all his actions are stagey, and he tries, though he may not altogether succeed, to play the hero to his valet. Unfortunately for the fame of Bolingbroke, his public career was, so far as he was personally concerned, a career of shame, and though he rendered essential services to his country, he did so in spite of himself.

Henry St. John, in 1701, being then twenty-two years of age, entered the House of Commons for the family borough of Wootton Bassett. Harley, who from being almost a Puritan and a Republican, had become a Tory and a High Churchman, was Speaker, and leader of the Ministry, and to him, notwithstanding the Whig proclivities of his father and grandfather, the young member attached himself; and he had prudential reasons for so doing. The Whigs were then in what appeared to be a hopeless minority; and moreover, even 150 years ago, Whig exclusiveness was notorious, and political aspirants knew that talent, unless it appeared in a cadet of a great Whig house, was not a sufficient recommendation for promotion. St. John was received by Harley with cordiality, and allowed to take a leading part in the business of the session. He soon evinced unscrupulous partisanship. The Tories were not satisfied with the sweets of office, though in those days, when Ministers were sometimes paid by commission, and when their patronage was bought and sold, English ministers gained as much if not more money than honour; but they sought to utterly crush their political opponents. The Duke of Portland, Lord Somers, Lord Halifax, and the Earl of Orford were impeached, and the main charge was that they had negotiated the Partition Treaties. Their accusers could not, however, frame articles of impeachment that had even a shadow of justification for the charge of high treason, and in this extremity they petitioned King William to dismiss from his councils statesmen who had not been convicted of any offence. The Lords fixed a day for the trial, but the Commons did not appear to prosecute. In the same session occurred the affair of the Kentish petition. The grand jury and freeholders of Kent petitioned the House of Commons to have regard to the dangerous state of Europe, and to grant the King adequate supplies. The Tories voted this petition scandalous, insolent, and seditious, and the gentlemen connected with it were imprisoned. Both these tyrannical proceedings were warmly supported by Bolingbroke, who could not, like the country squires, plead ignorance, and who thus early, in defiance of what he knew to be right, sought the favour of the majority by pandering to its prejudices and its unreasoning hate.

But Parliament had other work on hand besides the impeachment of Whigs and the persecution of the Kentish petitioners. William had recommended from the throne that the Act of Settlement should be framed, limiting the succession to the Princess Sophia and the heirs of her body being Protestants. It is no reproach to the country gentlemen that they were averse to exclude the direct heir of James II. from the throne. Why should they condemn an untried man? And as to religion, they were repeatedly assured that the young prince only awaited the fitting opportunity for entering into avowed communion with the Church of England. Yet they could not, without precipitating a revolution which they did not desire, and for which they were not prepared, refuse to make the required settlement. They had their revenge. Instigated by dislike to the House of Hanover, they rivalled the Whigs in their zeal for securing the liberties of the people by stringently limiting the power of the Crown. Our Constitutional liberty is in no small degree due to the unpopularity of the first Hanoverian sovereigns with the gentry of England. Bolingbroke at once made a parliamentary reputation by the part he took in the debate on the Act of Succession. His early triumph in the House of Commons is not surprising. He was handsome, engaging in his manners, gifted with very rare talents, and with a genius for eloquence, and above all, he manifested an aptitude for business in that Assembly, which then, as now, did not allow eloquence to compensate for the lack of that practical administrative tact which is zealous about small as well as great matters, and can supervise the comparatively unimportant details of a department.

The death of King William was followed by the formation of the Godolphin administration, and though Bolingbroke did not immediately obtain office, it advanced the interests of his party, and assured him of a place at no distant date. He missed no opportunity of creeping into favour with those who had places to bestow. He advocated the Occasional Conformity Bill, the object of which was to make it imperative on the holders of temporal offices to take the Sacrament at fixed intervals, and so to exclude Dissenters from office. This bill was rejected by the Lords. In the celebrated case of Ashby and White, St. John maintained the doctrine that the House of Commons had the right to determine who could or could not vote at elections. The Lords again interfered on behalf of constitutional liberty, and they were supported by the people. The zeal of the young member did not long go unrewarded. Marlborough—who was then gaining those victories, which now-a-days it is the fashion to call barren victories, but which gave England European influence and laid the foundation of her vast commerce—exerted his influence with the Queen, and Harley was made Secretary of State, and his friend St. John Secretary at War and of the Marines. To Marlborough, and to Harley, St. John owed his speedy advancement, and he repaid the patronage of the one with unscrupulous treachery, and the friendship of the other with bitter hostility. There is no doubt that whilst he was professing deep-felt gratitude to Marlborough, he was a consenting party to the back-stair intrigues of Harley against the great Captain, and in 1708, when Harley resigned the seals of office, St. John ceased to be Secretary at War. He had betrayed his patron, though not with the intention of serving his friend.

After two years' retirement St. John was, in 1710, appointed Secretary of State for the Northern department—a position equivalent to Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs; his friend Harley being made Chancellor of the Exchequer. A coolness was soon apparent between them, brought about by the opposition of St. John to Harley's attempt to impugn the good faith of his predecessors in the Treasury; this was the occasion of the quarrel—the motive was St. John's jealousy of Harley. The enmity of St. John was increased by Harley being raised to the peerage under the title of Earl of Oxford, though, if he had been far-seeing he would have rejoiced at his rival being removed from the House of Commons. But he did not rest until he, too, was made a peer. He was mortified that he did not get so high a rank as Harley, but ere long he found more substantial cause for regretting the foolish step that he had taken. The House of Commons had become dominant, and he who swayed it was master of the situation. As soon as St. John became Lord Bolingbroke, Walpole seized upon the brilliant and powerful position that he had abandoned. But for this fatal mistake, the daring ambition of Henry St. John would probably have been completely gratified.

We need not dwell on the tedious negotiations that led to the peace of Utrecht further than to remark that for political considerations Louis XIV. was allowed to dictate terms to, instead of accepting them from, the victorious allies, and that Bolingbroke interposed delays when it suited his purpose, and cared not for peace, except when he thought it would promote his own advancement. The peace of Utrecht was in itself a poor return for the sacrifices made by this country, and for the brilliant triumphs of Marlborough; but fortunately the war had brought during its progress advantages that could not be thrown away by a selfish faction intent only upon its political aggrandisement. The Whigs thought Marlborough and the country had been sacrificed; the Tories thought the country had been saved from the dictatorship of Marlborough. Taking a hint from Lord Macaulay, but, by the way, not acknowledging it, Mr. Macknight quotes from the "Letters to the Earl of Shrewsbury" a description of the performance of Addison's play of Cato, when both factions attended and applauded the play, and Bolingbroke called the actor, Booth, into his box, and before the audience presented him with fifty guineas for so well defending the cause of liberty against a perpetual dictator. But the peace did not bring Bolingbroke the influence he expected, and to his intense mortification the Commercial Treaty with France was rejected by Parliament.

Bolingbroke now turned his attention to getting rid of Oxford, and to accomplish this he paid most assiduous court to the Queen's favourites. He was aware that Her Majesty could not live long, and he pressed forward his measures with vigour. We know not whether he thought the House of Hanover would succeed to the throne—most likely he did not, but at all events he corresponded with the Jacobites. Mr. Macknight very fairly states the case as to Bolingbroke's shuffling policy. "It is idle to say the Protestant Succession was in no danger. It is worse than idle, it is simply ridiculous to represent him as a real friend to the succession of the House of Hanover. Neither had he till the Queen's death fully made up his mind to bring in the Pretender. He showed no attachment to one cause more than to the other; but still thought to reserve to himself the power of dealing with the question according to what he thought might best suit the interests of his party, that is, of himself."

Never was lawless ambition more signally punished. At length the object for which he had been faithful to his patron, his friend, and to his party—the object for which he had trifled with the best interests of his country, and turned traitor to the House of Hanover—was within his grasp. At length his intrigues had prevailed with the poor Queen; and on the 27th of July, 1714, Oxford was dismissed without a pension, and without a dukedom that had been promised. Oxford was dismissed on a Tuesday. On the evening of the same day, whilst St. John was celebrating his triumph by giving a dinner to some leading Whigs, Anne was taken ill from the agitation produced by the struggle of Oxford to keep his place, or rather of Bolingbroke to have him dismissed; the two following days she continued indisposed; on Friday she was speechless, and on Sunday she died. Bolingbroke wrote to Swift—"The Earl of Oxford was removed on Tuesday; the Queen died on Sunday. What a world is this! and how does Fortune banter us!" At the moment of his crowning triumph, worked for so zealously and so shamefully, Bolingbroke was ruined. He was an infidel and cared not for Divine Providence; but surely he must, in the bitter agony of his disappointment, have thought of Nemesis.

Bolingbroke beheld his enemies in power, and George I. ascend the throne without opposition. He wrote an abject letter of professing loyalty to the King, but his hypocrisy could neither save his place nor his fortune. A month afterwards he was deprived of his office, and retired to the country, where he remained in terrible suspense till the following spring. Then he came to town to attend Parliament, heard that the Whigs had learnt, and remembered the lesson of revenge that he had taught them, and that they in turn intended to persecute their political enemies, and that he was to be one of the first victims. He knew that in his case there would be no difficulty in drawing up articles of impeachment; and, trembling for his liberty, and even for his life, he fled in haste to Paris, disguised as a valet to the French messenger. In default of his appearance a bill was passed by both Houses, attainting him of high treason, and his name was erased from the roll of Peers.

The rest of Bolingbroke's career is of less political or historical importance, but it is worth attention both from the strangeness thereof, and from the light it throws on the tactics of parties. A few months after his arrival in Paris Bolingbroke became Secretary of State to the Pretender, and so far from this offending, it secured him a great deal of warm and active sympathy at home. He seems to have served the Pretender faithfully, and we may believe in his sincerity because he could gain nothing by treachery. He was summarily dismissed from the service of the Pretender upon the accusation of some women whom he had offended, and we cannot blame James for assuming on slight testimony that such an unscrupulous intriguer and avowed traitor was in turn false to him. After a long exile the English Government very wisely permitted him to return home, for the act of clemency took from him the pretence of martyrdom; it conciliated many who were not altogether friendly to the House of Hanover, and it produced the impression that the Government was confident of its strength, or it would not suffer a known enemy to be at large. Of course Bolingbroke busied himself with sneaking intrigues, and proved that his talents for deception and promoting discord had not been impaired by his ignominious flight and exile. So far from feeling grateful for the permission to return to his native land, and to enjoy his hereditary estates—wonderful concessions from a new dynasty to one who had intrigued against it in secret and openly served its enemy—he thought that he was very ill-used, and that he was not indebted to Walpole. So he put himself in communication with Pulteney, who was a thorough Whig, but not ashamed to use such a tool as Bolingbroke. Once more his hopes were high, and he dreamt of being Minister to George I. That was impossible, but it is probable that he was about to receive some mark of royal favour when the King was stricken with apoplexy and died. Again his crooked plots and unrighteous schemes were frustrated by the sudden death of the monarch.

Bolingbroke did not abandon himself to despair. He intrigued with the new King's mistress, but to his intense disgust found that George II., in matters of business, listened to his wife and not to his mistress, and that the Queen was the firm supporter of Walpole's administration. It is usual to feel a little pity for the disappointments of the worst of mankind, but there was so much poetical justice in the disappointments of Bolingbroke that they inspire a sentiment of satisfaction. We find him, for instance, doing the dirty work for the Whigs with his pen. He reviled the Stuarts, he reviled Walpole, and the meet reward he received for such services was that Pulteney hinted to him that it would be better for the cause if he left the country, as his presence rendered it odious. Bending to the mortifying necessity, and half afraid that Walpole might punish him for his ungrateful and unseemly virulence, Bolingbroke left England in 1735, and went to reside in France. Three years afterwards he returned, and intrigued with Prince Frederick, but he found little encouragement, and again retired to the continent. He finally came to England in 1744, and took up his abode at the family mansion at Battersea. He was intimate with Pope, attended the death-bed of the poet, swore there was nothing worth living for but friendship, "sobbed like a child" when all was over, and—five years after, did his best to blacken Pope's character. Of Bolingbroke it may be truthfully said, he never had a patron he did not betray, or a friend he did not scandalously malign.

The wily plotter had made it all right with Prince Frederick. The King was old, the advent of Frederick to the throne seemed near at hand, and when that event took place Bolingbroke was to be created an Earl. Once more his calculations were confounded by a royal death—Prince Frederick unexpectedly died in March, 1751. This was his last disappointment. After long suffering, Bolingbroke died on the 12th of the following December.

With regard to Bolingbroke's philosophical writings, we may remark, that though they display undoubted merit, it is certain that his fame does not rest on them, but rather they are remembered because the writer of them was otherwise notorious. His infidelity was, we are inclined to think, of use to the cause of religion, for it roused the spirit of the Christian world, and the good effects of the revival did not cease with the refutation of his heresies. Mr. Macknight observes in the concluding paragraph of his able work:—"It has been endeavoured in these pages to give a just delineation of his life as it really was. Even from drawing any general conclusion of my own, I deliberately refrain. The facts must speak for themselves." The facts do speak for themselves. Putting aside Bolingbroke's vicious private life, and only looking to his public life, we cannot resist the conclusion that, as a politician, a statesman, and an author, Bolingbroke, above all men whose deeds are recorded or whose writings are preserved, merits the detestation and execration of mankind.

PUBLISHING IN THE CONFEDERACY.

(From the Richmond Enquirer.)

War being the great present business of this people, it is natural that our first efforts in publishing should be military works. The defence of our rivers, harbours, mountain passes, is at this moment a more urgent business than the poetic contemplation or fanciful description of those features of Nature. The founding of cannon and manufacture of rifles and ammunition—nay, the tanning of leather and collecting boots and shoes, are our philosophy and belles lettres. We are too young to woo the Tuneful Nine. In truth, we are only being born, for during the evil days of the Compromises this people did not live; it was in embryo, and was in danger, too, of being choked. To be sure, it is a Herculean child, and strangles serpents in its cradle; but still it is an infant; it starts on first principles to learn the first elements.—And the first elements of national existence are the principles of artillery practice, drill march, storm and victory. The books which teach all the details of these fundamental arts and sciences are the primers and primary reading lessons; and these have been provided in very creditable quantity and style by the enterprising house (principally) of West & Johnston, of Richmond. They are not generally new books, nor is it needful that they should be. The Practice of War, as inculcated by Jomini and acted on by Napoleon, is no bad ground-work, subject to modification, of course, according to the nature of the country. The works also on special departments of the Service, prepared by boards of officers for the use of the army of the United States, are to us as valuable as to our enemies; and we have a good right to most of these, inasmuch as the said boards of officers consisted mainly of Southern officers, and bear on their face the sanction of some of our present generals, and of others who have fallen in our cause. Accordingly the publishers have done a good service in reprinting this handsome volume, entitled, "Instructions in Heavy Artillery." It is a book of 272 pages, largely illustrated with excellent plates; a beautiful specimen of typography, and printed on very fine paper. Indeed, no one would suppose that it had been got up in a time of war and blockade, for it would be creditable to any publishing house even in days of peaceful trade. To the credit of South Carolina, it should be mentioned that this work, as well as all the best and handsomest specimens of luxurious typography before us, was printed by Messrs. Evans & Cogswell, of Charleston. It is pleasing to find that even while Charleston was shut up by blockade, constantly threatened with bombardment, and half devastated by conflagration, quiet and assiduous printers were still composedly composing, as if they were not under an enemy's guns, for the production of these lessons of war. We have a peculiar respect for types drawn up in line and column at such a time and for such a service. To them more aptly than to any other types, may be addressed the poets apostrophic—

Oh! silent myriad army, whose true metal
Ne'er flinched nor bleached before the Despot wrong!
Ye brethren linked in immortal battle
With o'ergrown falsehoods tyrannous and strong;
Fragments of strength and beauty standing idle,
Each in its place until the appointed day,
Then, swift as wheels the squadron to the bridle,
Ye spring into the long compact array!

The praise of excellent typography must also be awarded to the Ordnance Manual, another elaborate work of West Point origin, containing 475 pages with plates, and neatly bound in cloth; but in a still more emphatic manner, to the splendid work of Mahan, on "Permanent Fortification, and the Attack and Defence of Permanent Works," with its large folio of plates; both of which are due to the enterprise of West and Johnston, and have also been printed for them by the Charleston printers. Professor Mahan's book is a serious undertaking for publishers at any time, and at this time especially, is one which involves immense expense. The subject, however, will long be a deeply interesting one to this country, not only while the war lasts, but so long as we shall have a single ford or pass undefended round all our vast frontier, and a vindictive enemy on the watch for crevices in our armour. The publication, then, although brought out in a style of great elegance, and even luxury, will doubtless take its stand and keep it, as one of the needful accessories of every military library. Of the intrinsic interest of these books we say nothing. They are already judged, and passed.

"A Manual of Military Surgery." For the use of Surgeons of the Confederate States Army. By Julian Chisholm, M.D., Professor, &c. A neat volume of 500 pages, giving ample directions for the treatment of every species of wound, organization of hospitals, ambulance corps, and the like. Its appendix contains the "Rules and Regulations of the Medical Department of the Confederate States Army."

Mahan's "Treatise on Field Fortifications" is another well-known military work of high character. It is brought out in a small and portable form, which aims at none of the typographical elegance of the other volumes above mentioned. It is clearly printed, however, and supplied with the requisite illustrative diagrams. It gives full instructions for the construction and defence of all kinds of intrenchments, and has a valuable chapter on the passage of rivers by every species of military bridges.

"The Judge Advocate's Vade Mecum" was noticed by us a few days ago. It is essential both to soldiers and civilians; to officers and to Judges of Military Courts.

There is also quite a swarm of smaller publications of Messrs. West and Johnston:—"Volunteer's Camp and Field Book"—"Carey's Bayonet Exercise," with plates—"Cavalry Drill and Bayonet Exercise"—"Napoleon's Maxims of War"—"Field Manual," for ordnance officers, &c., &c. No need to dwell upon these, which pretend not to be ornamental, but only useful.

It is needless to say that the "Army Regulations" of the Confederate States form an indispensable volume. Two rival editions are published—one by Mr. Randolph, the other by West and Johnston. Each is sanctioned by the Secretary of War; and, what is singular, each is the authorized and only correct edition.

The "Trooper's Manual," and "Volunteer's Manual" are published by Morris. They are in that compact and useful size which fit them for the knapsack. And here we may take our leave of the War literature.

There is, however, an octavo volume before us, which does not treat of the technical arrangements of the march, the hospital or the battle, though, indeed, it also is strictly a war-book.

"Cause and Contrast," by Mr. McMahon, has a title which perplexes many. On perusal, however, it proves to be a philosophical and historical essay, exposing the nature and origin of the cause of the South, and the essential contrast between Northern and Southern character and society—or, as Mr. Seward justly termed it, the "irrepressible conflict." Then, the title is not only alliterative, but almost tautological also; for what is the Cause, if not the Contrast? What is the Contrast but the Cause? As the divorce suits say, there was "an incompatibility," and that is the first and last cause. Mr. McMahon gives a learned review, mythological, hagiological, and Egyptological, of the history of slavery in all nations; and exposes the hypocrisy and atrocity of the Lincoln Government and Republican faction with right good will, but with a violence of passion which we regret. Nobody like McMahon to scathe a Puritan. Why could he not be good-humoured like us? There is no use in calling names, especially such very hard names, that the persons scathed by them will never understand what their learned vilifier may possibly mean. The author draws a parallel, for example, between Mr. Lincoln and King Cambyse. Well, it is probable Mr. Lincoln may feel flattered by being likened unto that celebrated character in Shakespeare. Then he says Mr. Buchanan behaved like "the traitor son of Carioth;" and goes the length of terming Seward (Oh, fie!) Ahmad Khamakin! The volume, nevertheless, repays a reading; and we are pleased to perceive that Mr. McMahon also is preparing a history of the war.

The reader sees that it is all war. This work also, "Cause and Contrast," is war to the knife; and undoubtedly our books will breathe forth nothing but slaughter, at least, until the famous "six months after ratification of a Treaty of Peace."

LETTER FROM RICHMOND.

RICHMOND, February 27, 1863.

The removal of the bulk of the Federal "Army of the Potomac" from its position so long held beyond Fredericksburg, has altogether changed the character of the meditated attack on Richmond by "Fighting Joe Hooker." It is now supposed that the design of the Yankee commander is a combined movement upon the capital by land and water, the army to be pushed forward from Suffolk, either via Petersburg, or by pontoon bridges across the mouth of the Appomattox, while a fleet of iron-clad gunboats ascends James River to assail the batteries of Drewry's Bluff, or what the Yankees insist upon calling Fort Darling. This purpose may have been conceived for weeks or months, but the withdrawal of Hooker's forces was undoubtedly sudden. There are those who maintain that it was a matter of absolute necessity that the Federal army should be placed, as it were, under lock and key, to check the desertions which were fast reducing it to a skeleton, and that Fortress Monroe was selected as a place of transfer, both as affording large accommodations for troops within the walls, and as a good point d'appui for future operations. Desertions were numerous beyond question from the line of the Rappahannock, but I cannot suppose that the Yankee army was in danger of disintegration from this cause, or that in itself it furnished the reason for an entire change of plan with the Commander-in-Chief. It is more probable that the Generals of Division, influenced by the dispirited and even mutinous condition of the troops, were unwilling to make another attempt to carry the entrenchments of General Lee, or else that Hooker himself, despairing of good roads before the middle of April, and committed to a speedy advance upon the Confederate capital—the "vipers' nest," which is to be purged of its reptiles before the 1st of May—determined to try another, and, as he hoped, a more expeditious approach. All this is mere speculation, however, while the removal of the main body of the enemy from Fredericksburg is a fact. As for what they intend doing, time must develop the same, and the preparations of the Confederate generals to meet them.

The attack upon Charleston, which was thought imminent at the date of my last letter, has not yet been made. The preparations of the enemy were complete more than a fortnight ago, but a misunderstanding which arose between Generals Hunter and Foster with regard to rank delayed the movement of the land forces, and the fleet was not willing to risk the success of the expedition unassisted by the army. General Foster made a visit to Washington to settle the point in dispute, and has recently returned to Hilton Head, so that we may reasonably expect the combined assault at any day. As the time approaches, the Northern papers are sedulously preparing the public mind of Yankee Doodle for possible discomfiture by paragraphs upon the immense magnitude of the enterprise. Charleston, they say, is another Sebastopol. The Confederates have mounted more than a thousand guns in the harbour. Sumter is iron-clad. The channels are dangerously obstructed. Torpedoes are strewn at the bottom of the bay, all along from Moultrie to the city. They even begin to fear the perils of infernal enginry, hitherto unknown to the science of war. It will occur to any foreign observer, that if the Confederates have not done all in their power to render Charleston defensible, with a full knowledge, for eighteen months past, that its reduction was a purpose fixed in the Northern heart and mind, they have been criminally negligent of their own interests, and of the plainest duties that devolve upon a people struggling for nationality and for free trade with the other nations of the earth. Still it must be borne in mind that the capture of Charleston has been the dominant idea with the Yankees ever since the day that saw the "sacred flag" go down upon Sumter before the batteries of Beauregard. The success of McClellan or Burnside in the movement upon Richmond had been indeed sweet, but the cup of rejoicing would not have refreshed their souls while Charleston yet held out defiantly; this would have supplied the aliquid amari to mar the festival of triumph. For the capture of Charleston capitalists have poured out their gold. For this a thousand fires have been kept aglow, night and day, in the Cyclopean forges of New England, New York, and Pennsylvania this weary time. For this all the energy and all the skill of an industrious and inventive people have been taxed to the utmost. Charleston was to be the last signal test—the crucial experiment—of the comparative strength of the two belligerent powers. If the Yankees cannot take it, the subjugation of the South is an impossibility confessed—vela va sans dire. It is not worth while to discuss the probabilities of success when the actual issue is so near at hand. It is likely enough that, with their supposed indestructible and tremendous batteries, they may lay the city in ruins. But they will never be able to land troops within sight of the city, nor to possess the forts in the harbour. Such is the confident belief of the military men and the people of the South. The effect of projectiles upon turreted ships of war, the capacity of resistance in iron to a furious cannonade maintained for hours—this is a matter undetermined as yet; but the power of the Federal army to cope with the "ragged rebels" under Beauregard has been settled at Secessionville and Pocotaligo, and the result of these encounters is not likely to be reversed.

It will not have escaped your notice that the Senate of the United States has passed a Conscription Bill for the compulsory enrolment into the Federal army of all men capable of bearing arms between the ages of twenty and forty-five. There is little doubt that this measure will speedily pass the House of Representatives, a body as at present constituted wholly subservient to the wishes of the Federal Executive, and become a law. It was rendered absolutely necessary by the fact that three hundred thousand of the Yankee troops now in the field would be mustered out of service, by the expiration of their term of enlistment, on the 15th May next. The Conscription will retain these reluctant patriots in the army willy nilly, and it will place at the disposal of President Lincoln not less than three millions of soldiers—a host more numerous than the mighty army of Xerxes. Surely the war in America is assuming colossal proportions. Seventy-five thousand men were thought sufficient in the outset to "crush the rebellion;" four hundred thousand more were demanded and obtained in three months thereafter, and six hundred thousand additional troops were subsequently called out and marched against us: and now, millions are wanted to subdue a handful of rebels! Is this Conscription a practicable measure? As for the army, no misgivings need be entertained by Lincoln that they will rebel against it. They are under military discipline, and cannot, if they would, break loose from their bonds. But will there be resistance on the part of the States and the people? Undoubtedly there are signs of ominous discontent in many parts of the North and North-West. The action of the Western Legislatures show a widespread desire for peace, though it were purchased at the cost of recognising the independence of the Confederate States; and even in Connecticut there have been large popular meetings, at which free speech expressed plainly a determined opposition to the Government. The ultra branch of the Abolition party—the extreme gauche of the extremists—is itself disposed to terminate the struggle, if we may regard Mr. Conway, of Kansas, as a fit exponent of its views, upon the basis of recognition, provided (Oh, rare Mr. Conway!) we will adopt the Yankee tariff and establish free-trade with the Yankee Government, declaring the Monroe doctrine as a joint policy with regard to Foreign interference with the States of the American Continent! Just as if commercial vassalage to New York and New England had not been a long-standing grievance of the Confederate States. The Conscription might, indeed, be reasonably thought calculated to rouse a spirit of resistance at the North, which it did not and could not provoke among the Southern people, for the obvious reason that with us the maintenance of the army was a very necessity of existence, while with the enemy the army is only needed to prolong a war whose objects are plunder, and the gratification to satiety of malignant passions. There is no reason upon earth why the Yankees should continue the strife for a perfectly hopeless end, except that the demoniac hatred of the South and Southern society which possesses Seward and his followers, may have further indulgence.

An important decision has just been rendered in the Superior Court for the Richmond Circuit, by Judge John A. Meredith, which will add a considerable number of conscripts to the Confederate armies. The gist of the decision is this:—That by volunteering in the military service of a country, a person acquires a domicile in that country, which makes him a subject of military conscription. The facts of the case before the Court were these:—Two brothers, natives of Virginia, but living at the time of the commencement of the war with their father, an office-holder in Washington City, came across the lines in May, 1861, and enlisted in a volunteer company, to serve for a period of twelve months. The term of their enlistment having expired, they claimed a discharge from the army, upon the ground that they were not citizens of the Southern Confederacy. The claim was admitted by the enrolling officer at Charlottesville, Colonel Taliaferro, who granted them exemption papers. Remaining in the State, however, they were subsequently arrested, by order of the Colonel of the regiment in which they had served, and held as conscripts under the Act of Congress passed April 16th, 1862. Thereupon the brothers applied for and obtained a writ of Habeas Corpus, for the purpose of testing the question of their liability to enforce military service. The case was argued with ability on behalf of the petitioners by Shelton F. Leake, Esq., of Albemarle county, Virginia, and on behalf of the Government by P. H. Aylett, Esq., the district attorney for the Confederate States. Evidence was introduced to show that the petitioners, in entering the Confederate service, did not in any manner abandon their right of domicile in Washington, but volunteered for a stated period with the animus revertendi. Rebutting testimony was brought forward to establish the contrary in the facts that one of the brothers had voted for President Davis, and was now engaged in mercantile business in Charlottesville, while the other was a student at the University of Virginia. The Counsel for the petitioners relied principally upon the animus with which they volunteered, as protecting them against a forfeiture of their domicile in the district of Columbia, and upon the exemption papers granted by the enrolling officer, as an estoppel to the Government from now claiming their services. On the other hand, the district attorney maintained that the residence of the father, in an official capacity in Washington, did not operate an original change of domicile at the time of his removal from Virginia, and that the sons could consequently be regarded in no other light than as citizens of the Commonwealth, subject, in like manner with all others born here and dwelling here, to the operation of the Conscript Law; furthermore, that by the act of volunteering, they had re-acquired a domicile in Virginia, supposing the same to have been lost by the father's removal to Washington; and that the erroneous decision of the enrolling officer in exempting the petitioners, presented no obstacle whatever to that officer's superior in authority reversing the decision, and compelling the petitioners to perform the military duty required of all persons liable to conscription. The Court sustained all these positions, and enforced with much learning and ability the point that the domicile of the soldier was that of the country in whose service he had enlisted. Nothing could be clearer, the Judge said, than that by entering the military service of a country you acquire a domicile in that country. This had been established by repeated decisions in England, France, Germany, and the United States; and it was the opinion of the Court that every citizen of Maryland, and every foreigner who had once enlisted in our armies, for ever so short a period, was a proper subject for conscription, if between the ages of eighteen and forty. As no appeal was taken from Judge Meredith's decision, it will probably be regarded as final by the War Department, and the action of the enrolling officers, in all future cases of the kind, will be conformed to it. The effect of it will be in the highest degree salutary, in relieving our cities of a worthless redundant population, hitherto considered as beyond the reach of the Conscript Act. The streets of Richmond are full of men who have been discharged from the military service of the Confederacy, after having served for six, eight, or twelve months, and who shelter themselves from conscription behind consular papers authenticating their foreign citizenship, or the facile plea of "Maryland my Maryland." These worthy persons, such of them as have not resorted to Rabelais' honest way of obtaining a livelihood by petty larceny, are engaged in various practices of extortion, or act as decoys to the lower class of gambling houses. It will be a great point gained to have them sent back to the army or made to cross the line into the United States.

I have spoken of Marylanders as dodging the conscript officers. Unfortunate Maryland! it has been her hard lot to be betrayed by base or craven sons at home, and degraded by the conduct of lawless and brutal sons abroad. The worst class of the population of Baltimore came in considerable numbers to Virginia upon the opening of the war, and entered the Southern army, attracted by the hope of plunder or the opportunity of licence, as in all times of popular turbulence "lewd fellows of the baser sort" rush to the points of greatest commotion; but having no moral purpose, and inspired by no lofty feeling of patriotism they gladly withdrew, when their terms of enlistment were over, from the ranks, as the prospect of a long struggle every day grew more decided. Thrown loose upon society, they naturally betook themselves to the modes of life to which they had been accustomed at home. They became again familiar with the use of the billy and the slung-shot, the brass-knuckles and the revolver, for purposes of midnight robbery. Some of them entered the detective police service, and colluded with the thieves it was their business to expose. The better class of the population of Baltimore, unable to repress the indignation they felt at the tyranny of the Washington Government, soon found their way to the Northern Bastiles of Fort Lafayette and Fort Warren, where they languished in captivity for months and months, and from which they have but recently been liberated, to find their State and City overrun by hordes of Yankee adventurers, and kept quiet by the bayonets of a hireling army. Their humiliation must have been extreme when, last week, they saw the highest honours held out, in the name of Maryland and of Baltimore, to Benjamin F. Butler, of immortal infamy. Let it not be thought in England that the thirty-four children who personated the States of the Union in the Butler pageants were daughters of Maryland parents. Nor let it be supposed for one moment that the proud commonwealth of the Calverts and the Carrolls wavers in her hatred of oppression, or in her determination finally to be free, with her Southern States, because such things are possible in her largest city. Sooner or later the weight which oppresses her must be removed. The soldiery of the tyrant must be withdrawn, and then it will be seen that Maryland is Southern in all her feelings and impulses. The fiasco of Frederick is not to be taken as conclusive against her. The army of General Lee marched into a portion of Maryland, settled chiefly by non-slaveholders, which had for eighteen months been under the domination of the Yankees, and from which every inhabitant of Southern sympathies had long since been compelled to fly. It was not to be expected that the great Southern leader would be welcomed by these people or encouraged by their assistance. But even in this case, if his army had not been compelled to withdraw from the want of clothing, transportation and supplies, and because of its thinning out by sickness and straggling, thousands of Marylanders would have flocked to his standard. Three weeks more at Frederick, and Maryland had been redeemed. The day may yet come, before this dreary war is brought to a close, when General Lee will lead his gallant troops to the banks of the Susquehanna, amid the acclamations of a grateful people, and Beauregard shall plant on the Washington monument of Baltimore the flag which was given him by one of Baltimore's loveliest women, to be hailed by tens of thousands as the pledge of their perpetual deliverance.

The very general and cordial approval which has been manifested by the Northern masses for the official conduct of Butler at New Orleans ought not to excite astonishment anywhere, for the Beast did nothing more than put in practice the diabolical hatred of the Yankees for the whole population of the Confederate States. The spirit of Butler animates the entire Yankee army, as the numberless atrocities committed by officers of high rank, not less than by the ignorant and brutal private soldiers, most sadly attest. Something has been said already in this correspondence of indiscriminate spoliation; give me leave at this time to record instances of individual plunder, with the names of the parties, in order that the intelligent Christian community of England may know and understand the character of the war that is waged against us. These instances might be multiplied till their bare enumeration would fill columns of THE INDEX; I shall give but a few, which have been related to me upon indisputable authority.

Colonel William Preston Johnston, of Kentucky, son of the illustrious lamented Albert Sydney Johnston, and now serving on the staff of President Davis, dwelt at the beginning of the war in the immediate neighbourhood of Louisville. When the oppressions of the Federal Government became insupportable in Kentucky, this gentleman, to avoid arrest, was forced to fly from his home, leaving all his property, with his lares and penates, behind him. An Indiana general, one Webster, took possession of his dwelling-house, brought his family over from across the Ohio river, made free with Colonel Johnston's stores, wines, books, and horses, and finally, when ordered to join his brigade in the field, packed up everything, plate, crockery, furniture, library, and sent them, under charge of his wife, to Indiana. It is pardonable to feel a certain satisfaction in knowing that Webster was soon afterwards killed on the battle-plain of Shiloh.

Colonel Lewis W. Washington, one of the nearest living relatives in the third generation of George Washington, is the owner, or, perhaps, more properly speaking, I should say, was the owner, two years ago, of a very pretty country seat three miles from Harper's Ferry, where, on the night of the 17th of October, 1859, he was arrested in his bed by John Brown, when that miscreant made his memorable attempt to excite an armed insurrection of the slaves in Virginia. Colonel Washington, being a "rebel" by hereditary right, could occupy his estate no longer than the country around him was held by the Confederate forces. He had no time to remove his household effects, among which were some interesting memorials of Mount Vernon that had descended to him as heir-looms. To his mansion, soon after his departure, came Mrs. N. P. Banks, of Massachusetts (Pro pudor!), wife of Major General Banks, and pillaged it, sending off all the movables, by Adams and Co.'s Express, "to him," where the chairs and tables of the pater patriæ will doubtless be shown with the furniture that came over in the Mayflower, as curious objects, of which the possessors are proud.

William Henry Trescott, Esq., of South Carolina, who was at one time Secretary of Legation of the United States at the Court of St. James's, and subsequently Assistant Secretary of State under the administration of James Buchanan, a gentleman of taste and culture, favourably known in letters as the author of the "Diplomatic History of the American Revolution," had just finished building a large and comfortable dwelling-house on one of the islands in the Atlantic Ocean off the Carolina coast, and was beginning to establish himself to his liking among his books and MSS., when the swarming fleets of the enemy drove the proprietors of the island estates into the interior. The Yankees stripped the house, and sent the library, embracing about four thousand volumes, to New York, where it was advertised for sale, with much flourish of trumpets, as the collection of a noted rebel, and brought a considerable sum of money to the pillaging officer, whose name I regret it is not in my power to give you.

William G. Cazenove, Esq., is the Representative in the House of Delegates of Virginia of the town of Alexandria, and as such has, of course, been an exile ever since the day that Jackson, the proto-martyr of our revolution, was killed by Ellsworth's Zouaves. The keys of Mr. Cazenove's house were demanded of his agent, some months ago, on the plea that the building was wanted for a Federal hospital. The agent surrendered them, having previously removed the greater part of the contents of the house to an unoccupied wooden building on an adjoining lot. The Yankees had no sooner discovered the fact than, breaking open the repository of Mr. Cazenove's effects, they took what they could carry off, and reduced the rest to ashes in the wanton destruction of the building by fire.

It is well known that, when the Yankee gunboats first commenced going up and down the Mississippi, their object was nothing beyond the plunder of the mansions upon the banks, and one of these vessels acquired the familiar designation of the "piano gunboat," from the fact that it made regular trips to and fro with the pianos which were stolen from disloyal parlours. Other boats, we may suppose, were set apart for the deportation of treasonable carpets and revolutionary rose-wood. It is strange, indeed, that a people, so systematic in their stealings, should not have established a "Deportation Office" in connection with the Quartermaster's Department.

The burning of William and Mary College, at Williamsburg, involving the loss of a fine library and expensive philosophical apparatus, has been disavowed by the Yankees as their wilful act, but it was, notwithstanding the disclaimer, a piece of deliberate and cowardly malice. The circumstances, as related to me by a lady of Williamsburg, who witnessed the conflagration, were these. On the night of the 4th September, 1862, the college building was found to be on fire, but through the efforts of the noble women of Williamsburg, who rushed, with buckets of water in their hands, to the spot, the flames were extinguished before much injury had been done. On the 5th September, the citizens of the town saw with delight the Yankees flying through the streets in wild alarm before the sweep of the Confederate cavalry. Our gallant horsemen pursued the enemy as far as Fort Magruder, dealing them some hard blows, and then retired before superior numbers, leaving Williamsburg as they found it. The Yankees came back, like the unclean spirit that had gone out of a man, bringing other devils with them. That night the college burst out in flame, but when the faithful women again hastened to its rescue, they found a strong file of Yankee soldiers drawn up before the gateway of the campus to prevent any attempts at extinguishment. Such is the boasted civilization of the enemy!

There are few spots on the American continent of more pathetic interest to the intelligent visitor than Jamestown Island, the site of the ancient capital of the Colony of Virginia. Here the first white settlement was made by Smyth and Gosnold, and here still stands a mouldering tower entwined with ivy, a fragment of the earliest brick church edifice erected in Jamestown, probably in the reign of Charles II. Around it lie buried the ashes of the eminent citizens of the old town, the Colonial ladies and gentlemen who graced the society and conducted the affairs of the rising States; and above the places of their repose were to be seen monuments and head-stones of marble, more or less imposing, carved with armorial bearings in bas-relief and quaint inscriptions in Latin. One would have thought that even a savage would spare these antique memorials of the dead. But the Yankees have removed them. The marbles were put on board their gunboats and carried off, whether to enrich the collections of the Historical Societies of New England, or to be exhibited in Barnum's Museum, or to be worked up in mantel-pieces, it is impossible to determine.

But I weary of this recital of Yankee Vandalisms, and your readers have, perhaps, already had too much of them.

The question of food for the army and the people of the Confederacy begins to excite some apprehensions for the future, and certainly, if the prices of all manner of supplies in Richmond were to be taken as indicating alone their scarcity, we might be thought on the very verge of famine. Much of the distress to which the army is subjected is due to defective railway transportation. There is, probably, grain enough and meat enough in the country to avert starvation, or even stint, if it could be readily conveyed from place to place. In Mississippi there is great dearth of flour, and Pemberton's troops subsist chiefly on molasses. Here molasses is a luxury to be enjoyed by few, while flour and meal are abundant, though dear. In Richmond many causes have conspired to inflate the prices of all articles of daily consumption. The population of the city is, probably, little short of 120,000, against 50,000 in 1861. The over-issue of Confederate notes is, probably, felt more decidedly as tending to depreciate the currency at the very door of the Treasury than anywhere else. These facts, rather than a total disappearance of beoves and an extinction of hens, explain why a sirloin is a dollar and a half a pound, and eggs two dollars the dozen. All things else that one eats, drinks, wears or uses are in hideous proportion. Milk is fifty cents a quart, butter three dollars a pound; for seventy-five cents the thirsty soul can obtain a drink of the vilest whisky yet known to the commercial world; brandy is eagerly sought for at charges varying from sixty to one hundred dollars a gallon, according to age and character; a common morning business coat costs seventy-five dollars. You must pay thirty dollars for a hat, and as much for a pair of good shoes, and so cap-à-pied the whole man is expensive. Many articles which had come to be regarded almost as necessities of life—such, for example, as tea and coffee—are almost unknown except upon the tables of the wealthiest citizens. When those of moderate means are thus straitened, it is impossible that there should not be suffering among the poorer classes. Yet there is little or no murmuring on the part of the people. The cheerful endurance of privation for principle's sake challenges respect. Nay, there is something almost sublime in the sight of a whole nation, long accustomed to abundance and luxurious living, for whom the Côte d'or dressed its vineyards and Lyons worked its looms, submitting cheerfully to the plainest fare, and wearing the coarsest of homespun with grace, rather than yield an inch in their adherence to right. There are very few men or women in the Confederate States who would tomorrow purchase profusion at the expense of liberty; and though even the heaviest sacrifices should be demanded of them ere peace returns, such as the heroic people of the Netherlands underwent at the hands of Alva, I think they would prove equal to the trial.

Ariosto tells us of a bird that built its nest among thorns, and yet gave out always a blithe and cheery note. Though the people of Richmond are sadly troubled by the blockade and by short allowance of provisions, they seem to be gay enough, if one should judge by what is to be seen of them in the streets, or in their newspapers. A few days ago, two divisions of a certain corps d'armée, numbering possibly 25,000 to 28,000 men, passed through town with music and banners. Each division was an hour or more passing a given point. The brave fellows had been on half-rations for more than a month, but their step was firm and proud, and the enthusiasm they excited knew no bounds. Benevolent citizens ran out to the line with huge trenchers of bread for distribution among them. One eccentric man stood on the pavement with a pile of soft felt hats, and when he saw a poor soldier with a dilapidated "tile," knocked it off and replaced it with a new one. The fun that prevailed was almost like the carnival, and but for the ragged uniforms, bespattered with mud, and the bronzed faces of the men that spoke of exposure, it might have been taken for a holiday parade. The Washington Artillery of New Orleans have organized a theatrical company in winter quarters, and give such pieces as Toodles and Box and Cox with great effect. In this city we have four places of amusement open nightly, and serenades are of frequent occurrence.

Generals A. P. Hill and J. E. B. Stuart have been in town recently, and were honoured with a public reception by the Legislature of Virginia. General Gustavus W. Smith has resigned his commission in the Confederate army, and General Longstreet has been assigned to his command.

The weather has been rainy and disagreeable during the whole month of February, with occasional twinges of severe frost. On the night of the 21st there was a fall of snow to the depth of twelve inches, with a temperature of 22° Fahrenheit. For two days the sleighs came out merrily upon the streets, but heavy rains have since carried off the snow, and James River is now in inundation.

You have received, ere this letter can reach you, the inspiring news of the capture of the Queen of the West and the Indianola on the Mississippi.

The President issues to-day a Proclamation for a day of Fasting, Humiliation and Prayer on the 27th day of March, a copy of which I enclose.

A SOUTHERNER.

OUR TRADE WITH MATAMORAS.

(From the Times of 15th April.)

The subjoined communication furnishes an example of the questions that will be forced upon our Government by the affair of the Peterhoff, and the general conduct of the United States' squadron under the command of Admiral Wilkes. The point to be determined is whether the British Cabinet intend to initiate and uphold the doctrine that any belligerent Power may seize neutral vessels trading between neutral ports on any pretext they may think fit to devise. No respectable British ship-owners would protest either against the right of search or the right of seizure on any obvious and reasonable plea; but an intimation lately given by the Foreign-office seems to indicate that in the opinion of the law officers of the Crown the United States' Government, provided they "allege" a legal pretext, no matter whether it be totally unsupported by direct proof or even by rational assumption, will be fully entitled to carry off our vessels for adjudication in their prize courts. It is seen by the commercial classes that if a precedent of this kind is to be definitely admitted, it will virtually put it in the power of any belligerent to stop or embarrass our trade with the whole world, since there has been no attempt to modify the doctrine by any distinction, such as to the effect that a voyage is illegal between the neutral ports of England and Mexico, but not between other neutral ports. Of course, any such attempt would be absurd, but unless the distinction be made, it then logically follows that the United States would be justified in seizing a vessel crossing from Dover to Calais. Even, however, if the doctrine could be restricted to the trade with the neutral ports of Mexico, we must not lose sight of the fact that any Power that may hereafter be at war with the United States will then be entitled to seize, detain, and harass every ship that leaves our shores for Nova Scotia or Canada. It will, therefore, be well to weigh the tremendous consequences that may arise at some future day to our commerce from recognising such a legal right, and placing it as a weapon in the hands of any nation, however small or poor, that may be at war with another nation, and may wish with impunity to insult or vex us. The fact that damages may be claimed would very little alter the case. Nothing that the owners of the Peterhoff are likely to obtain will compensate them for the disturbance of their arrangements, and in cases where seizures were effected by an insolvent Power, the prospect even of obtaining such insufficient sums as might be awarded would be almost valueless. The feeling of the mercantile public of London is as strong as ever in its approval of the prudence of our Government in straining every consideration to the utmost that may allow the Washington politicians to carry the enterprise they have in hand to an end without its being disturbed by even a single glance of foreign intervention; but they have also a lively sense, which has been greatly strengthened by the experience of our Chinese and Russian wars, that there is no surer method of rendering peace hopeless than that of permitting direct wrongs to pass unnoticed. Few persons can doubt that if the Trent outrage had been tolerated it would have been followed by acts which long before this would have brought us into war, and there are many who believe that whatever danger may now exist is more likely to arise from our forbearance on that occasion, in not demanding the removal of Admiral Wilkes, than from any other cause:—

"Sir,—A singular difficulty has arisen between the merchants and charterers and the owners of a steam vessel 'on the berth' for Matamoras in consequence of the correspondence with the Foreign-office respecting the Peterhoff, in which the law officers of the Crown appear to a limit the right of a belligerent to capture any neutral vessel on an alleged suspicion. The owners of the steamer in question have applied to the authorities for some assurance that their vessel, being bound on a legal voyage, should not be detained on any frivolous pretence, as its predecessor has been. Failing to obtain any such assurance, they decline to let the vessel proceed on her voyage. The charterers and merchants whose goods are on board, and who would be large losers by the delay, insist on her leaving, and threaten the owners with law proceedings and a heavy claim for damages in case they do not fulfil their contract. The owners reply that they engaged to send the vessel to Matamoras, believing it to be a neutral port and a legal voyage; and that if it is, the law is bound to protect them in the prosecution thereof; but the law officers of the Crown state that the law is powerless to do so, and that therefore it cannot be a legal voyage, consequently the law cannot enforce a contract the execution of which is not legal, and cannot compel owners to despatch the vessel on a voyage beyond the limits to which its protection extends. Can you, sir, elucidate this knotty point, and tell us who is right and who is wrong? "I am, Sir, yours faithfully, "D."

CONFEDERATE CAVALRY EXPLOITS IN NORTH VIRGINIA DURING THE WINTER.

The following general order has been issued by General Lee:—

Head-quarters, Army, Northern Virginia. February 28.

The general commanding announces to the army the series of successes of the cavalry of Northern Virginia during the winter months, in spite of the obstacles of almost impassable roads, limited forage, and inclement weather.

1. About the 1st of December, General Hampton, with a detachment of his brigade, crossed the upper Rappahannock, surprised two squadrons of Federal cavalry, captured several commissioned officers, and about one hundred men, with their horses, arms, colours, and accoutrements, without loss on his part.

2. On the 4th of December, under the direction of Colonel Beale and Major Waller, with a detachment of sixty dismounted men of the 9th Virginia cavalry, General William F. Lee's brigade crossed the Rappahannock below Port Royal, in skiffs, attacked the enemy's cavalry pickets, captured forty-nine, including several commissioned officers, with horses, arms, &c., and re-crossed the river without loss.

3. On the 11th December, General Hampton crossed the Rappahannock, with a detachment of his brigade, cut the enemy's communications at Dumfries, entered the town a few hours before Seigel's corps, then advancing on Fredericksburg, captured twenty waggons with a guard of about ninety men, and returned safely to his camp. On the 16th December he again crossed the river with a small force, proceeded to Occoquan, surprised the pickets between that place and Dumfries, captured fifty waggons, bringing many of them across the Occoquan in a ferry boat, and beating back a brigade of cavalry sent to their rescue, he reached the Rappahannock with thirty waggons and 130 prisoners.

4. On the 25th December, General Stuart, with detachments of Hampton's, Fitzhugh Lee's and W. F. Lee's brigades, under the command of their officers, respectively, made a forced reconnaissance, in the rear of the enemy's lines, attacked him at Dumfries, capturing men and waggons at that place, advanced towards Alexandria, drove his cavalry with considerable loss across the Occoquan, captured his camp on that stream, burned the Accotink bridge on the Orange and Alexandria railroad, then passing North of Fairfax Court House, returned to Culpeper with more than two hundred prisoners and twenty-five waggons, with a loss on his part of six men wounded, and Captain Bullock, a most gallant officer, killed.

5. On February 16, Captains McNeil and Stamp, of General Imboden's cavalry, with twenty-three men, attacked near Romney a supply train of twenty-seven waggons, guarded by about one hundred and fifty cavalry and infantry, routed the guard, captured seventy-two prisoners, and one hundred and six horses, with equipments, &c., and though hotly pursued, returned to his camp with his captives without the loss of a man. This is the third feat of the same character in which Captain McNeil has displayed skill and daring.

6. General W. F. Lee, with a section of his artillery, under Lieutenant Ford, on February 25, attacked two of the enemy's gunboats at Tappahannock, and drove them down the river, damaging them, but suffering no loss on his part.

7. General Fitzhugh Lee, with a detachment of 400 of his brigade, crossed the swollen waters of the Rappahannock on February 25, reconnoitered the enemy's lines to within a few miles of Falmouth, broke through his outposts, fell upon his camps, killed and wounded many, took 150 prisoners, including five commissioned and ten non-commissioned officers, and re-crossed the river with the loss of only fourteen killed wounded, and missing.

8. On 26th February, Brigadier-General W. E. Jones, with a small force, attacked two regiments of cavalry, belonging to Milroy's command, in the Shenandoah Valley, routed them and took 200 prisoners, with horses, arms, &c., with the loss on his part of only two killed and two wounded.

9. Major White, of General Jones's command, crossed the Potomac in a boat, attacked several parties of the enemy's cavalry near Poolsville, Maryland, and besides those he killed and wounded, took 77 prisoners, with horses, arms, and some waggons, with slight loss to himself. Captain Randolph, of the Black Horse Cavalry, has made many bold reconnaissances in Fauquier, taking more than 200 prisoners, and several hundred stand of arms. Lieutenant Mosby, with his detachment, has done much to harass the enemy, attacking him boldly on several occasions, and capturing many prisoners. A detachment of seventeen men of Hampton's brigade, under the brave Sergeant Michael, attacked and routed a body of forty-five Federals, near Wolf Run Shoals, killing and wounding several, and bringing off fifteen prisoners, with the loss on our part of Sergeant Sparks, of the 2nd South Carolina regiment, who, a few days before, with two of his comrades, attacked in Brentsville six of the enemy sent to take him, killed three and captured the rest.

In announcing these achievements, the Commanding General takes special pleasure in advertising to the promptness of the officers in striking a successful blow whenever the opportunity offered, and the endurance and gallantry with which the men have always supported their commanders.

These deeds give assurance of vigilance, fortitude, and activity, and of the performance of still more brilliant actions in the coming campaign.

ROBERT E. LEE, General.

THE LATEST NEWS.

The following is the telegraphic summary, per City of Washington.—

New York, April 10, Afternoon.

The New York Evening Post says it is rumoured in Washington that Mr. Seward has sent despatches, containing strong remonstrances to the British Government, concerning the war vessels fitting out for the South in England, and that hints will soon be thrown out of reprisals, and non-intercourse. If the Federal agents now in England do not succeed in purchasing the vessels fitting out for the South, and these vessels are permitted to leave England, trouble between England and America is anticipated.

New York, April 10, Evening.

Southern papers state that the attack on Charleston commenced on the 7th. Four out of seven Federal iron-clads were engaged. The firing from Forts Sumter and Moultrie and from Morris Island was very heavy. The Federal steamer Ironsides was hit, and ran ashore, but subsequently got off.

At two in the afternoon eight Monitors and the Ironsides concentrated their fire upon Fort Sumter at a distance of 3,000 yards.

The firing on both sides continued incessantly until 5 o'clock, when it diminished.

The Ironsides and Keokuk withdrew from the engagement at four, apparently disabled.

The Confederate Monitors went out to take part in the fight.

The casualties in Fort Sumter were one boy killed, and five men wounded. The casualties in the other batteries are unknown.

Upon the following day seven Monitors and the Ironsides were inside the bar. Twenty-two of the blockading vessels were off the bar. The Keokuk was sunk on the beach off Morris Island. There was no disposition on the part of the Federals to renew the conflict.

Great anxiety exists for further intelligence.

The Richmond Whig asserts that the Federals have withdrawn their troops from the peninsula opposite Vicksburg, and have cut the levee, turning the water into their old camping ground.

Commodore Farragut, with three vessels, remained above Port Hudson. He has landed and destroyed the Confederate stores at Bayou Sara.

The attack on Vicksburg is expected this week.

The Federals have contracted their lines at Memphis.

General Foster's position at Washington (North Carolina) is still critical. One gunboat from Newbern is reported to have reached him, but the others were repulsed. Some accounts say that Washington was burnt, but do not say by whom.

The Richmond Despatch says:—"The Confederates have captured a battery seven miles below Washington, and sunk one steamer, which was going to the assistance of General Foster. General Foster has refused General Hill's demand to surrender."

The Confederates under Van Dorn have attacked the Federals at Franklin (Tennessee), and, after two hours' fighting, retreated, leaving their dead on the field.

General Wright has issued a proclamation to the people of California, stating that, although the great mass of the people on the Pacific coast are loyal, there are traitors who are endeavouring to involve the country in a civil war. He warns such that retributive justice will be their doom.

The arrest of four persons charged with being knights of the Golden Circle, caused a large mob to assemble at Reading, Pennsylvania, but order was preserved. One witness swore he was at a meeting of knights, when the abduction of Mr. Lincoln and the establishment of the North-western Confederacy was proposed, but the importance of affairs seems to have been exaggerated, and the testimony of the witnesses not very credible.

The Bavaria, Glasgow, and Africa have arrived out.

The City of Washington takes out 189 passengers, $187,284, and £11,480 in specie.

New York, April 11, Morning.

The New York Herald is of opinion that there are strong probabilities of a speedy rupture between England and America, growing out of the offensive attitude of England on the privateer question.

The motion in the Confederate Congress to change the seat of the Government was rejected.

The New York World thinks that the ridicule which the arrests at Reading, Pennsylvania, will excite, will be an excuse for the Government to abandon arbitrary arrests.

COMMERCIAL.

New York, April 10, Evening.

The bill forbidding loans to be effected in gold has only passed the Senate of the New York Legislature, but it is not supposed that it will pass the House.

Money abundant. Gold at 49 per cent. premium.

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

AMERICA.

There has been an important movement in North Carolina. Washington, a town in that State held by a Federal force under General Foster, has been surrounded by the Confederate forces under Generals Hill and Pettigrew. The Confederates have erected a battery five miles below Washington, commanding the channel between that place and Newbern, thus cutting off the Federal communications with Newbern. General Foster sent to Newbern for reinforcements, and several gunboats started, but none have yet passed the Confederate batteries below Washington. General Hill has notified General Foster to remove the women and children, as he was going to shell the city.

News has been received at New York from New Orleans of the capture by the Confederates of the Federal steamer Diana in the Atchafalaza river.

The Diana left Brashear on a reconnoitering expedition, but encountered some Confederate masked batteries at Patersonville, and, after a sharp engagement, in which Captain Paterson and several gunners were killed, the Diana surrendered.

Besides the intimation that another ditch is to be dug, there is little news from Vicksburg. General Grant, we are told, has placed a battery of 84-pounder Parrots beyond the levee, in a position to reach Vicksburg easily; but he did not commence the bombardment in consequence of a storm. The movement on Haines's Bluff has failed, the Yazoo Pass expedition has been abandoned, and the Mississippi has not been swallowed up by the Great Union River. Altogether the news from the Mississippi is not very encouraging to the Federals, despite the report of a Confederate battery being silenced, and a Confederate gunboat being captured in consequence of her breaking loose from her moorings.

The Federal authorities have reported that the Confederates were about to evacuate Port Hudson. Whenever the Federals utterly fail in their attempts to capture Southern cities, they always report that the Confederates are about to evacuate them. They follow closely the example of the Chinese mandarin, who being unable to conquer his enemy, assured the Son of the Moon, that the rebels were engaged in cutting off their own heads. At least half-a-dozen times Richmond was on the point of being evacuated. The evacuation of Vicksburg has been rumoured, but not confirmed, and now Port Hudson is to be deserted by the Confederates. If these tales amuse the Federals we have no right to complain of them, for they do not hurt the Confederates or deceive Europe. With regard to the rumoured evacuation of Port Hudson, all we can say is that the latest direct advices from the South give no intimation of such a proceeding.

Amongst the other war news is a report that the Federal forces broke up a Confederate camp with 600 men, near Woodbury, and that several of the Confederates were killed and wounded, and thirty captured. From our experience in translating Federal reports, we suppose that this is a mild way of announcing that there has been a skirmish near Woodbury, and that the Federals were worsted.

General Rosencranz officially reports that the Federal General Stanley has defeated a portion of General Morgan's forces, but that the Confederates escaped with their artillery.

General Curtis, St. Louis, reports that a band of Confederates captured the boats Murdock and Sam Gatty, and that Colonel King pursued the enemy, and after two engagements completely routed them.

The Federal gunboats have been repulsed on the Tennessee River, and two of them burned.

The following items are from the late telegrams:—

Confederate despatches from Fort Pemberton, dated the 5th inst., state that the Federals had embarked on their steamers, and were in full retreat.

A Federal expedition to Pontchatoula and Pass Manchac is reported to be successful. The Federals had occupied both places.

A Federal expedition has reached a point on the west side of the Mississippi, half-way between Port Hudson and Point Coupe, and after destroying a Confederate steamer loaded with molasses, and burning Confederate stores, returned to Baton Rouge.

General Curtis officially announces from Missouri that General Hicks's band of guerillas, who robbed the steamer Samsaky, have been destroyed, seventeen being killed and two hung.

The Confederates have crossed the Rio Grande into Mexico, and captured two Federal officers and three privates. The Mexican authorities, however, having demanded the surrender of the prisoners, they were all released except one, who was reported to have been hung by the Confederates.

The negro expedition has evacuated Jacksonville, Florida. Some days before this event Colonel Higginson had been reinforced by two regiments of white infantry—the 8th Maine, Colonel Rust, and the 6th Connecticut, Colonel Chatfield. Colonel Rust being the senior officer took the command of all the forces. Jacksonville was burnt to the ground, not by the negroes, but by the white troops. The correspondent of the New York Tribune writes, "It gives me pleasure to report that the negro troops took no part whatever in the perpetration of this vandalism." The white man is teaching the negro how to carry on warfare.

Governor Todd, of Ohio, has been arrested by the Sheriff of Fairfield County, in that State, for kidnapping, or illegally imprisoning, Dr. Olds, a member of the Legislature. He was taken before Judge Johnston on a writ of Habeas Corpus, and admitted to bail to answer the charge before the Court of Common Pleas in June next.

In Connecticut a Republican governor and Republican State officers have been elected. Three out of the four Republican nominees for Congress have also been elected.

and the Legislature is also strongly republican. The Democrats lose one member of Congress. The governor's majority is 3,000, being a Republican loss of 6,000 since last year.

The story of the "Great Bread Riot in Richmond" is worthy of Yankee genius. The author of it is the Federal Colonel Stewart, of the 2nd Indiana Regiment, who was lately released from custody at Richmond and sent to the North. This reliable person says he saw from his "prison window," on the 2nd of April, "about 3,000 women" rioting for bread,—a pretty considerable army of women for a city of the size of Richmond. The 3,000 women were armed with "guns, clubs, and stones," from which we conclude that the Confederates have more arms than they know what to do with. As we proceed the story becomes pathetic. The 3,000 women, armed with guns, clubs, and stones, broke open the Government and private stores, and helped themselves to bread and clothing. The militia were called out, but could not check the riot. Mr. President Davis and other high officials made speeches to the infuriated women, and behold, they became calm! What a wonderfully complete view Colonel Stewart must have had from his "prison window." From that "prison window" he saw and counted about 3,000 women, armed with guns, clubs, and stones; saw them break open Government and private stores, and take out bread and clothing; saw the militia vainly essay to check the riot, and President Davis and other high officials calm the infuriated women with speeches. The site of the Richmond prison must be very eligible.

Just now the way to win favour in the North is to abuse and malign the English Government, and Irish poverty is a splendid opportunity. Accordingly, on the 7th instant, a meeting was held in New York, at the Academy of Music, in aid of the suffering poor of Ireland. The New York Times says "the entire edifice was filled with beauty and fashion." General McClellan, whose entrance was greeted by the orchestra playing "Hail to the Chief," made the first speech. He declared his sympathy with the object of the meeting, said that the "loss of Ireland had been the gain of America," and he denounced the English Government, observing:—"It is unfortunate, perhaps, for Ireland, that laws, with the making of which her people had so little to do, and a Government in which they have been so little represented, should have compelled so many of them to leave their native land, and seek refuge in foreign climes." The General eulogised the valour of the Irish, and said:—"It has often been my sad lot, but pleasant withal, to watch the cheerful smiling faces of the Irish when suffering from painful and ghastly wounds." Cheerful smiles are somewhat inconsistent with ghastly wounds; and it is rather a queer idea to find anything pleasant in seeing men suffer from painful and ghastly wounds. General McClellan had admirable opportunities for indulging his strange taste whilst he commanded the army of the Potomac.

Archbishop Hughes was not very lucid. He remarked that since the last famine in Ireland "that poor country has been dodging on in her usual way." The reverend speaker was less hazy when he began to abuse England. He compared the distress in Lancashire with that in Ireland, and lauded the people of New York for their contributions to Lancashire. "They have done honour to themselves; they have heaped coals of fire upon heads that did not understand what the meaning of heat was—heat of that character." We are not quite so devoid of understanding as his Grace imagines. We are not deluded by the sham philanthropy of New York. We know that the North has been the means of starving Lancashire, and adding greatly to the misery of Ireland, and that only a week before this speech was made the Federal Government, fearing that Europe might get a little cotton, issued fresh trade regulations, one of which strictly forbids the payment of gold for cotton. We know the contribution to the Lancashire distress was a political move, and we certainly do not feel the heat of sham charity.

The Hon. Judge Daly illustrated the present condition of Ireland by a reference to the history of Joseph and his brethren, and appealed to the audience to act the part of Joseph in extending their charity to the Irish people. In one respect Mr. Lincoln certainly is like an Egyptian potentate—like the Pharaoh who knew not Joseph, and who, in spite of plagues would not let the people go.

The meeting wound up with the announcement of two subscriptions; one for $1,000, and one for $50—rather a small result for so much grand talking.

Whilst the beauty and fashion of New York were assembled at the Music Hall, to abuse England under pretence of aiding Ireland, the large hall of the Cooper Institute was crowded by a meeting of the Democrats, and which evidently intended business, for the New York Times assures its readers that "amidst the vast concourse, one—and only one—of the gentler sex was observed." Resolutions, expressing opposition to the policy of the Administration, demanding a change of measures, denouncing official interference with the rights of citizens, and congratulatory upon the secession of prominent members of the Democratic party from that ancient organization, were passed by acclamation. Mr. Fernando Wood then made a vigorous speech. He denounced the pretended patriotism of New England, which, before the commencement of this war, "subsisting, as she does, entirely upon her manufactures—had her best customers in the South, notwithstanding her politics, notwithstanding her hypocritical professions of hatred of the institution of slavery. New England has been supported for a hundred years by the institution of slavery, and she held slaves herself until it ceased to be profitable, and when she could make no more money out of slave labour, she turned philanthropic, and set her negroes free. She finds now a profitable substitute in getting contracts from the Government, and in supplying the arms and receiving immense disbursements of the public money. And so long as New England can participate in the dollar, so long as she can participate in the profligate expenditure of the public money, by the hundreds and hundreds of millions, just so long will New England be patriotic, and go for a vigorous prosecution of the war." He declared the war had proved a failure, and that peace ought to be made. If, at last, the South would not come back to the Union, "I will tell you," said Mr. Wood, "then what, in my judgment, the President of the United States should do; he should submit a course, or at least a proposition, that the people should be called upon to vote directly upon the question, and that the decision should be final, then and for ever, whether they would resume the war, or recognise the independence of the South. That is my peace programme."

General McClellan's official report of the Seven Days' Battles, claiming a series of glorious victories for the Federals, reads curiously enough at this time, when all the world has agreed that the change of base to the James River was not a Federal triumph. General McClellan's own countrymen do not think him a military genius. The joint Committee of the Federal Congress on the conduct of the war have presented their report. It censures General McClellan's whole military course since his appointment to the command of the Army of the Potomac, and points to him as the cause of the failure of the army to take Richmond. In December, 1861, the Army of the Potomac was 185,000 strong, and it finally left the Peninsula, a beaten and disgraced remnant. One of the curious revelations of the Congressional report—we do not, of course, vouch for its accuracy—is, that on the 28th of June, whilst Colonel B. S. Alexander was at head-quarters receiving his instructions, "he was shown, as he testifies, a printed order, not then issued, directing the destruction of the baggage of officers and men, and the tents, camps, equipage, and things of that kind, appealing to the army to submit to this privation, as it would be only temporary—'only for a few days.' He remonstrated with General McClellan against issuing such an order; that it would have a bad effect, would demoralise the army, as it would be telling them more plainly than they could be told any other way that they were defeated and running for their lives. The order was not issued, and General McClellan testifies that he has no recollection of any such order."

The report treats the career of General Burnside very fully, and declares that Mr. Lincoln directed and controlled Burnside's movements. The report concludes by stating the belief of the Committee that the rebellion can be subdued only by fighting, and their confidence that the present campaign will produce decisive victories to the Federal arms. "And your Committee believe this to be the sentiment, not only of the army and navy, but of every man in the country—traitors and cowards alone excepted." If faith in Federal success is the sole test of loyalty and bravery, we expect there are a great majority of traitors and cowards in the North.

The majority of the Pennsylvania Senatorial Investigating Committee in their report declare General Cameron guilty of the charges of bribery preferred against him.

The New York Tribune continues to assert that the relations of the Federal Government with England is the topic of anxious interest in official and unofficial circles at Washington.

The prize steamer Dolphin, captured by the Federal steamer Wachusett, has arrived at Havana.

The British steamer Aries, captured on the 28th ult., while attempting to run into Bull Bay, South Carolina, has arrived at New York, on her way to Boston.

ENGLAND.

The weekly report of Mr. Farnall to the Central Relief Committee at Manchester, shows a net decrease in the number of persons receiving parochial relief of 2,890; the larger part of the diminution arising from Manchester and Oldham, and a total decrease of 69,498 since the 6th of December. There are, however, more than 200,000 persons still receiving parochial relief in the unions included in this statement, against about 47,000 in the corresponding week of 1861. There is no sign, therefore, that this great misery nears its end. The decrease, satisfactory as it is, is due not to any revival of the cotton manufacture, but to exceptional causes, as emigration to other countries, and, perhaps, in some degree, to an adoption of other employments. Emigration, if the blockade is to be allowed to continue, seems the only remedy for the evil, and a resort to that remedy, upon a large scale, it is now generally agreed, must be made at once.

The Mansion-house Committee have voted £5,000 to aid and encourage emigration; and the Lord Mayor made an appeal to the public from his magisterial chair on Monday, for contributions to a separate fund, for the especial object of assisting the unemployed mill hands to emigrate.

The merchants and brokers interested in the Peterhoff and the Sea Queen, now lying at Falmouth, have addressed a letter to Earl Russell, explaining the very awkward position in which the singular doctrines propounded by his lordship as to the rights of belligerents have placed them, expressing their readiness to act upon any suggestion his lordship might make, in order to satisfy the authorities of the lawful nature of their operation, and renewing their claim to protection. They pointed out that vessels sailing under the French flag to the same port had not been molested, and they also gave a list of vessels which were actually allowed to clear from New York for this very port of Matamoras, for which the Peterhoff had been destined. Earl Russell replied by offering to see them, and a deputation, introduced by Mr. Crawford, the member for the city of London, waited upon his lordship on Thursday. Mr. Crawford drew his lordship's attention to the illegal detention of the captain, officers, and supercargoes of the Peterhoff at New York, and pointed out that the Federal Government assumed the right to dictate the kind of trade to be carried on by British subjects, and to exercise a general supervision over it, supplying his lordship with a most extraordinary document addressed by Mr. Adams to Admiral Dupont, certifying that a particular cargo was really intended for Mexicans—arms to be employed against the French. One of the deputation suggested that the Government should send a mail agent in the ship, which would supply an official guarantee that the vessel was intended for the port for which she was cleared. Earl Russell, who is reported to have expressed his surprise at several of the statements made him, promised to consider the suggestion, and the deputation retired. His lordship did consider it, and came to a conclusion marvellous in its imbecility. The merchants wanted a mail agent on board, not to protect the mails, but to save the vessel and cargo, and Earl Russell graciously relieves the owners of the vessel of the obligation of carrying a ship letter mail. That is to say, his lordship, instead of giving them the protection they ask, deprives them of the little they had, and by the avowal of the British Government Admiral Wilkes has the right to upset all the rules of international law, and seize vessels trading from one neutral port to another. The Yankees have shrewdly calculated the timidity of the English Government. Admiral Wilkes would not have dared to stop a vessel making a similar voyage under the French flag.

The particulars of an equally flagrant violation of neutral rights have this week been published. The British steamer Dolphin, on a voyage from Liverpool to Nassau, called at St. Thomas to coal, and leaving that island was captured by the Federal cruiser Wachusett on the 24th of March. The crew, after being shamefully maltreated, were landed at St. Thomas. The cargo does not appear to have included any goods of a suspicious character, although, even if it had, the act of the Federal commander would still have been a gross violation of law. The owner of the Dolphin has claimed the protection of the British Government, and has been informed by Mr. Hammond that "this case shall be considered."

Sir George Cornwall Lewis was buried on Saturday by the side of his father, in Old Radnor Church. Earl Russell, Earl de Grey, and Mr. Villiers were the only members of the Government present, and the latter represented rather his own personal grief at the death of his brother-in-law than the affliction of the Cabinet,

The place of the statesman whose loss will be so long lamented by the few who knew his great powers, and expected for him the highest position, has been taken by Earl de Grey, his Under Secretary of War; a young nobleman of great wealth, fair ability, and considerable application. Earl de Grey made a very fair Under Secretary of State. For the higher position which he has now taken he has no qualification but his acquaintance with the details of the office work, and that is not the qualification demanded for an English Secretary of State. Such a principle, if admitted, would lead to the elevation to the leading posts in the Government of the chief clerks of the respective departments. Earl de Grey will carry nothing to the deliberations of the Cabinet, and contribute nothing to its prestige with the country. He will do the work of his office fairly as long as things go on in a smooth jog-trot manner; if an emergency arises, he will break down. His place is taken by the Marquis of Hartington, the eldest son of the Duke of Devonshire; a young nobleman who moved the resolution by which the Derby Government was expelled from office, and since that time until a few weeks ago, when he was appointed a Lord of the Admiralty, has been little heard of. He has lately been travelling both South and North, and described his experiences to his constituents in North Lancashire when seeking re-election. His talents are unquestionable, and Lord Palmerston has by this appointment thoroughly satisfied his supporters.

Mr. Stansfeld, the very Radical member for Halifax, has accepted the Lordship of the Admiralty, vacated by the Marquis of Hartington. Mr. Stansfeld is nominally a barrister, but actually a brewer. He has made some reputation in the House of Commons as a debater, and has now turned it to good account. The principles of the honourable gentleman, who was the intimate friend of Mazzini and Orsini, and whose name figures very frequently in the trials, par contumace, of conspirators against the Emperor of the French, differ as widely as possible from those entertained by Lord Palmerston, and acted upon by his Government; but naturally enough, an official position has built an easy bridge over the at one-time impassable gulf, and Mr. Stansfeld will "roar for the future as gently as any sucking dove."

The proprietors of the Saturday Review have failed in their attempt to set aside the verdict given against them, and in favour of Dr. Campbell. The ground upon which the application rested was the finding of the jury that the article was written in the bonâ fide belief that its statements were correct, and that the writer was not actuated by malice. Counsel contended that the article was consequently privileged. The contention, however, was unanimously rejected by the judges; and the law, as laid down by the Court of Queen's Bench may, therefore be taken to stand, that no belief in the correctness of his assertion will justify a writer in imputing base, sordid, or dishonest motives; he must prove that the motives of the persons upon whose conduct he comments were base and dishonest, or he must pay damages and costs.

Lord Seaton has died, full of years and honours. Born in 1777, he entered the army in 1794, and after serving with great distinction in Egypt, Sicily, and throughout the Peninsular war, crowned his military achievements by his famous charge at the head of the 52nd Regiment at Waterloo. Some time Governor of Guernsey, Sir John Colburne was appointed, in 1830, to the command of the forces in Canada, and subsequently to the post of Governor General of the colony. He suppressed the rebellion, was made a peer for his services, and, in 1843, accepted the Lord High Commissionership of the Ionian Islands, a position which he held until 1849, but in which he comparatively failed. He was subsequently Commander-in-Chief in Ireland, was created a Field-Marshal in 1860; and now, in his 86th year, has passed away, one of the last survivors of that great family of soldiers who in the giant struggles of the dawning century raised so high the honour of England.

EUROPE.

The English, French, and Austrian notes have been delivered to Prince Gortschakoff, and the answer is anxiously expected. There can be little doubt, we should think, as to its character; but the world is anxious to see what next. Will the three Powers be content with the amnesty and the promise of autonomy—or will they make larger demands, and, in default of obtaining them, will they or one of them go to war? The Pays publishes what it calls a complete analysis of the French note. Its terms are just those which were expected. France says that the political convulsions of Poland are symptoms of inveterate disease, and hopes that Russia will recognise in her wisdom and benevolence the necessity of adopting means to give Poland lasting peace. If an analysis given by the Cologne Gazette may be trusted, the Austrian note is couched in much the same terms. Such words may mean a great deal, or nothing at all. The mode in which the French Government receives the answer to them will alone tell. There is much talk of war in Paris, but we must profess our belief in peace. No doubt war would be popular in France. The commercial classes of course deprecate it, but the army and the ordinary Frenchmen of the towns would hail its declaration with enthusiasm; and if Russia could be attacked on the Rhine, war would be probable enough; as she can only be reached on the Baltic, it is extremely improbable. It is very easy to talk of landing an army at Riga, but it would be hard work to get it there, and when there it would be of very little use to Poland. France has made one campaign in Russia, and the Emperor of the French is too wise a man to wish for another. His soldiers may be a great deal more than a match for the Russians, but space, time, and elements fight for Russia.

Rumours of an alliance between France and Sweden have been floating about. The French papers tell us that Sweden is arming, that the Swedish Government has ordered a number of vessels to be iron-plated, is generally re-organizing its fleet, and fortifying and improving the harbour of Carlscrona, and hence they infer that Sweden is likely to go to war with Russia. Sweden may be taking all these steps, although no reliance can be placed upon the French statements, but they by no means indicate war. If Russia is to be attacked in order that Poland may be assisted, the attack must be made at once, and ironclads require months for their construction, whilst a year is small time for improving a harbour, so that the squadrons of friendly powers may shelter there. It is not, indeed, certified by any authority worth a moment's attention, that the relations of Sweden with Russia are particularly unsatisfactory. The telegrams of one agency contradict those of another, and neither show any decent claim to credence. It is possible that the enthusiasm shown for Prince Czartoryski may have been disagreeable to the Russian Government, but that Government is not foolish enough to quarrel with the Swedes for partaking a universal feeling, and the conduct of Sweden in stopping the Ward Jackson must have convinced it that she will act as befits a friendly power.

The Warsaw Central Revolutionary Committee have issued a proclamation, in which they definitively declare that they reject all pardons. "We have entered on the struggle," they say, "not to gain more or less of free institutions, but to emancipate ourselves from an odious yoke, and reconquer independence and complete liberty. Away with your Imperial pardons! We have taken up arms, and it is arms alone that must settle our quarrel with the Russians." This was to be expected; but the rejection of the amnesty by the revolutionary Government by no means implies its rejection by the insurgents. The Revolutionary Government will keep up the fight to the last moment,—as long, in fact, as it can find people who will fight. But the amnesty addresses itself to the separate bands, and they will accept it or not according to the chances they have of saving themselves without it. So long, no doubt, as the hope of intervention survives, the insurrection will continue, but that hope dispelled, the Poles, for all the dictates of a central Government, will shift for themselves. They will escape from the kingdom if possible; if not, they will accept the amnesty.

The Revolutionary Committee repudiate the liberties which Europe has asked for them; they say they will be content with nothing but independence. If they speak for their countrymen, this is a notice to Europe to interfere no more unless by arms. That is to say, it throws all the hopes of the movement upon the chance that the Emperor of the French will embark in a hazardous war. It is true, the Poles have the authority of Mr. Pope Hennessey for expecting their independence. That young gentleman, who has a practical turn of mind, and having busied himself in the earlier part of his parliamentary career in trying to prove that revolution was a pestiferous thing for Italy, has taken up the Poles; has visited Cracow to receive the reward of his speeches in the enthusiastic welcome of its citizens. He reaps his glory before it begins to wither, and we cannot blame him. But the Poles will make a great mistake if they give the slightest heed to his words. Mr. Hennessey can only speak for himself, and that is for a very small and unimportant personage.

There is very little war news from Poland this week. A Russian bulletin from Warsaw trumpets forth the defeat of a body of insurgents, not far from Warsaw itself, an announcement which, upon the safe principle of accepting reports from Polish or Russian sources only as far as they are against the side which supplies them, may be taken as an admission that the insurrection has the hardihood to show itself in the very sight of Warsaw and its immense garrison. Telegrams from Cracow tell of the formation of new bands, and one, professing to come from Wilna, speaks in a vague way of the spread of the insurrection, which justifies us in believing that it is a Polish invention, just as that portentous story sent us two or three weeks ago about a rising en masse in Samogitia. A telegram from Lemberg announces the defeat of Lelewel, a partisan leader, who has given the Russians a great deal of trouble upon the Galician frontiers of the Government of Lublin. One point is now put beyond all doubt. The peasants go with the Government. The most vehement partisans of Poland are reluctantly compelled to make this admission, and it is one which ought to satisfy all careful observers that the movement has little hopes of success. Another great blow to the hopes of the Poles is the change which has come over the spirit of the Austrian Government. At the first it winked at the assistance which the inhabitants of Galicia gave to the insurgents. And it may safely be said that without this aid the insurrection would have been suppressed almost in its inception. Now the Austrian Government displays considerable energy in preventing, as far as possible, the Galicians from aiding their countrymen. In Pesen, the Poles have, in defiance of the careful watch of the Prussian troops, for a long time given the insurgents much aid in men and material of war, but the last two or three expeditions of this kind have been very unsuccessful. In the district of Pleschen the Prussian frontier guards have captured a number of waggons laden with material of war, and have had, if we may believe the majority of reports—the Prussian Staats Anzeiger contradicts them—a sharp engagement with a band of insurgents who crossed the frontier, and trespassed on Prussian territory, in order to secure the supplies on the way. The insurgents were routed, and some thirty were taken prisoners.

The throne of Greece is not yet disposed of. The Fædrelandet of Copenhagen does, indeed, state that the difficulties which opposed the acceptance of Prince William have been removed, but it is quite evident, from the language of the members of the English Government in both Houses of Parliament, that they are by no means assured of the acceptance. Amongst the conditions imposed by Prince Christian are, it is said, the abdication of King Otho, and the education of the children of Prince William in the religion of their father. If the former of these conditions is insisted upon, Prince William will certainly not fill the Greek throne. Otho would be willing enough to resign in favour of one of his nephews, but the Bavarian Royal Family will not abandon the rights given it by treaty, and the Bavarian Gazette assures us that a circular has been addressed to the different courts of Europe protesting against any infringement of those rights. The second condition will be a very hard one for the Greeks to swallow; and it can only be in their very sore need of a sovereign, and their anxiety to bind England to assist them by adopting her recommendation, that they will accept it. A king whose religion differs from that of his subjects can hardly earn their loyalty or confidence. There must always be some disagreement between their views, and this must especially be the case where, as in Greece, the people aspire to form a great empire by the attraction of a common religion. The objection on the part of Prince Christian is, politically and morally, fully justified. Prince William or his children may be called to occupy the throne of Denmark, and the Protestant faith is the faith of the Kings of Denmark. This cool proposal to a young man like Prince William to change his religion in order to accept a throne, or at least to undertake to bring up his children in a creed which he must regard as erroneous and idolatrous, shows a very small regard in the ministers of the English Crown for the Protestant faith of which their mistress is the defender. Certainly Earl Russell cannot deem it a matter of the slightest importance to what creed a man belongs, when he thus suggests to Prince William to change his religion for a crown; and we recommend the Episcopal bench, instead of denouncing the spirit of scepticism which manifests itself in the newspaper press, to rebuke this flagrant encouragement to unbelief and superstition, of which Earl Russell has just been guilty.

The Berlingske Tidende announces, so a telegram from Copenhagen informs us, that at a long interview with the British Minister at Copenhagen, Prince Christian declared the obstacles which had hitherto opposed the acceptance of the crown of Greece, namely, the abdication of King Otho and the state of the finances, removed, and accepted it for Prince William. This statement is not very intelligible. Otho has not abdicated, and the financial difficulty could only be removed by a loan guaranteed by the British Government. We are not disposed to hold the matter yet settled.

The deputation bringing the offer of the crown landed at Trieste a few days since, and must by this time—assuming that, through the economical tendencies or the utter poverty of the Government, they have not been laid up for want of funds at Trieste—have reached Copenhagen. Mr. Elliott has reached Paris on his way to London.

The National Assembly has appointed a new ministry. The names of the persons who compose it are hardly known out of Greece.

The German Diet has referred the ordinance of the King of Denmark regulating the position of Holstein in the Danish monarchy to a committee. In a few weeks a ponderous memorandum combating every one of the assertions of the Danish Government, will probably be presented by the Committee. The Diet has not, however, waited for the report to declare its opinion. The President protested against the assertion of the Danish Government, that the Diet had no right to interfere in the question of the duchies—that is, we presume, the relations of Holstein to Schleswig—and the Diet adopted his protest. Protests, however, will not impede the execution of the Danish scheme, and the Diet is not in a position to go beyond protests. It might, at another juncture, order Federal execution in Holstein, but that is the extent to which it can go; and execution in Holstein, when the Duke means to regulate the internal condition of Holstein just as it chooses to demand, would be an absurdity, because it could not affect the relation of Holstein to Schleswig, or of Schleswig to Denmark proper. To occupy Schleswig would be to enter into war with Denmark and the Powers which have guaranteed Denmark its possession.

Austria and Prussia have also protested, but neither of them is in a position to do more than protest. The Danish Government has chosen well its opportunity. The Prussian Liberals, who are rampant partisans of Schleswig-Holsteinism, and a little time ago would have liked nothing better than war with Denmark, now repudiate war altogether, because they cannot trust their own Government. Herr Twesten, in the House of Deputies, whilst calling upon the Government to declare that the proclamation of the King of Denmark was an infringement of the assurances given by Denmark in 1851 and 1852, and to repudiate as null and void all the agreements based upon these assurances; to withdraw its assent, for instance, from the Treaty of London regulating the succession to the Danish monarchy; insisted that war must not be resorted to; and declared that the House would oppose it. Herr Von Bismarck replied characteristically enough. He said the Government did consider the proclamation an infringement of the assurances of 1851-52, and had already protested, as had Austria, and that it would consult with its Federal allies, and with Austria especially, as to the measures to be taken; but that if it deemed it desirable to go to war, it would do so without asking the consent of the House. However, the Prussians need not have much apprehension that he will go to war. He would like it well enough in the hope of thereby shelving the House of Deputies; but he is not mad enough to expose Prussia to the terrible losses and humiliation which war at such a juncture must bring upon her.

A curious incident occurred in this discussion. Herr Von Bismarck was followed by Dr. Lowe—one time President of the Frankfurt National Parliament, and one of the most extreme Liberals in the House. He assailed the Minister very strongly, and the latter soon retired to the Ministerial retiring room adjoining. It is very little satisfaction to abuse a man unless he hears you, and the Liberals were annoyed that Von Bismarck did not stay and hear Dr. Lowe's invectives. The Prussian Constitution, which gives the Ministers a place in the House, and the right of speaking as often as they please, also gives the House the right to insist upon their attendance at any particular time, although the provision scarcely means that they are bound to sit through a long debate, the only object of which is to relieve the pent-up indignation of some violent opponents.

A member proposed, therefore, that the House should adjourn until the Minister made his appearance; whereupon Herr von Bismarck at once entered the House, and declared that he had heard everything that had been said, the speaker being very loud; and as he had a great deal to do and many people to see, it was much more convenient to sit in the minister's room. This remark threw the House into a state of intense indignation, which, however, had no effect upon the Minister. No doubt Herr Von Bismarck is very offensive; but the House is rather exacting in insisting that he shall make his appearance to listen to speeches which are, in the main, only invectives against him. It is hard to see what public purpose can be served by such a demand. The Minister appeared and answered the questions put to him, and that was all that could fairly be asked of him.

THE EAST.

A telegram from Shanghai announces another discomfiture of the Imperial troops, attended, it would seem, by the loss of several European officers. The Taepings are much more formidable opponents than Mr. Layard and the Times would make them out to be; and we fear that Captain Sherard Osbourne will only succeed in involving England in another wretched war in China. From his point of view such an achievement would be a success; but Englishmen generally are not prepared for more China expeditions, in which much money and many lives are wasted, only to encourage unscrupulous traders to cheat the Chinese Government.

The same telegram says that Admiral Kuper had left for Japan with the English fleet, in consequence of the outbreak of hostilities there. Another little war is brewing here.

PARLIAMENTARY NOTES.

THURSDAY, APRIL 16.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

The Earl of Malmesbury, on rising to inquire what was the present state of the negotiations respecting the Crown of Greece and the cession of Corfu to that country, said he thought that the conduct of her Majesty's Government had been most disrespectful towards the Crown of this country and the nation at large in making use of Prince Alfred's name as a means of shaking the candidature of the Duke of Leuchtenberg. After the Duke of Saxe-Coburg had refused the throne of Greece the noble earl, who seemed to have stood at the door of the Foreign-office with the Almanac de Gotha in his hand, selected Prince William of Denmark as a candidate for the Greek crown. He (Lord Malmesbury) wished to know whether the noble earl had obtained the consent of Prince Christian and the King of Denmark to such a proposition? The Great Powers to the treaty of 1815 had a right to be consulted in the matter, seeing that the King of Greece should at least consent to have his children brought up in the faith of the Greek Church—a condition that would bar the succession to the Danish throne.—Earl Russell declined to give an answer to the inquiries of the noble earl whilst the matters to which he referred were still under negotiation. The Greeks had positively refused to be governed by King Otho, and had determined upon establishing a constitutional monarchy. As to the candidature of Prince William of Denmark, the nomination of his Royal Highness was made conditional upon the assent of the Danish sovereign and of Prince Christian. With regard to Corfu, it should be remembered that England, as one of the protecting powers, had a perfect right to propose its cession to Greece if she thought proper. Should the Ionians themselves assent, then the other protecting powers would be invited to concur in the arrangement.—The Earl of Derby observed that the Foreign Secretary had avoided the question put to him by his noble friend—namely, whether the noble earl had ascertained, before he proposed Prince William to the Greeks, that the Prince, with his father and the King of Denmark, was willing to accept the offer of the crown. As to the Ionian Islands, it was necessary that the consent of the Great Powers as well as that of the Ionians themselves, should be obtained before their cession could be effected. He thought Her Majesty's Government had acted with great rashness with regard to the nomination of the sovereign of Greece and the cession of the Ionian Islands.—Earl Granville vindicated the course taken by his noble colleague, and said that the assent of the King of Denmark was communicated to him before the name of Prince William was submitted to the Greeks. After some further remarks from the Earl of Malmesbury and Earl Russell, the subject dropped.

Upon the motion of Earl Granville, it was agreed that a select committee should be appointed to inquire into the merits of the several schemes before Parliament for the construction of lines of railway within the limits of the metropolis.

THURSDAY, APRIL 16.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

In reply to Lord R. Cecil, Sir G. Grey stated that it was not true that spies had been employed to attend upon persons at Liverpool who were supposed to be Confederate agents in this country, and to watch the private dockyards there. The facts were simply that, upon a representation made to the Foreign Office by the United States Minister in England, alleging that certain vessels which he named were fitting out at Liverpool in violation of the provisions of the Foreign Enlistment Act, and at the request of the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, he (Sir G. Grey) had written to the mayor of Liverpool, requesting him to institute inquiries whether such vessels were being so equipped and furnished with arms in contravention of the law. He had prescribed no mode whatever in which the inquiries were to be carried out, but the mayor had informed him that had employed a certain number of the detective police for the purpose, though it did not appear why he had so employed them.

The House then went into a Committee of Ways and Means; the body of the House, the Members, Strangers, and Reporters' Galleries being all crowded. Prince Alfred and Prince Louis of Hesse were present in the front gallery appropriated to diplomatists and distinguished foreigners. Mr. Gladstone rose at five and twenty minutes before five to make the financial statement for the year. He referred to the resolution passed by the House last session demanding a reduction of expenditure; and remarked that his budget would be the answer thereto. Expenditure had, undoubtedly risen to a very high point; owing partly to increased outlay on education, on the Civil Service of the country, on prison discipline, and on similar objects; but partly also to the extra outlay on the army and navy, made necessary by the progress of military science, and partly perhaps to a "spirit of expenditure" excited among the people, in Parliament, and in the Cabinet by the very fact of a rapid increase in our establishments and our expenses. A large part of our expenditure—that on the debt—was fixed; and for purposes of comparison it was necessary to exclude the cost of the collection of the revenue, only of late years included in the accounts. With these omissions our variable expenditure was in

1860-1	42,125,000

With regard to the finance of the past year, notwithstanding the distress in Ireland and the more serious sufferings of Lancashire, he had a satisfactory report to give. The income had been £70,603,000, exceeding the estimates by £543,000. The expenditure had been £69,302,000, or £806,000 less than the estimate. The customs had exceeded the estimates by £484,000; the Income-tax by £467,000. The Excise had fallen short by £4,185,000, a deficiency to be attributed partly to certain peculiar conditions in the levying of the malt duty, and partly to the distress of the labouring classes in certain districts; their distress always immediately affecting their consumption of excisable stimulants. There had been an excess in the miscellaneous receipts, and China indemnity. The result was a surplus of £1,301,000. The Right Hon. gentleman made the following comparison between the expenditures of the last few years:—

EXPENDITURE.
1859	£70,017,000
1860	72,504,000
1861	70,838,000
1862	69,302,000

He pointed out that, side by side, with a diminution of expenditure last year, to the extent of a million and a half, there had been an increase of actual revenue to the amount of £805,000, after deducting the receipt from taxes repealed or reduced during 1861. He now came to the budget of the present year. He showed that the probable income would be from the retention of all the taxes at their present amount, £71,490,000, and the expenditure £67,749,000, giving a surplus of £3,741,000. He proposed, however, to impose a few new taxes. He would equalize the duty on chicory with that on coffee; require clubs to take out a retail spirit license; make a trifling alteration in the law relative to publicans' beer-licenses, and in the licenses of wholesale beer sellers. He would levy a license duty on carriers' carts, and commute the present duty on the receipts of railways from their passenger traffic from 5 to 3½ per cent., doing away with the exemption at present enjoyed by trains running at fares of less than 1d. per mile—which included excursion traffic. He would abolish the exemption of charitable legacies in Ireland from legacy duty, and would subject the incomes of charitable institutions to the income-tax. These taxes would add £138,000 to the revenue, making a surplus of £3,874,000. Of this he proposed to dispose as follows:—He would abolish the charges imposed by himself of 1d. on goods entered inwards, and the 1s. 8d. stamp on bills of lading outwards. He would abolish the distinction now drawn by the Income-tax at incomes of £150, and charge the same rates all incomes above £100; but he would allow the deduction of £60 from all under £200 a year; so that the man with £100 would pay on £40, the man with £180 on £120, and so forth. This would entail a loss of £300,000. The Income-tax would be reduced by 2d.,—a loss in this year of £1,600,000.

With reference to indirect taxation, there were the rival claims of tea and sugar to a remission of duty to be considered, and this, perhaps, was the first time in their history that these articles had been placed in antagonism. Upon weighing their relative claims, however, and seeing that the duty levied on tea was more than 100 per cent. upon the value of the article, whilst that upon sugar was only a little more than half the value, it was the intention of the Government to propose to reduce the duty on tea to 1s. per lb., but not to disturb the sugar duty. He proposed that the reduction of the tea duty should take immediate effect after the resolution had been adopted by the House, so that he hoped on Saturday week the public would be in a position to profit by the remission. This change he estimated would entail a loss to the revenue of £1,300,000.

The losses by all these changes in the present year would be:—

Small charges on commerce	£143,000
Abatement on small incomes	300,000
Reduction of tea duty	1,300,000
Abatement of Income tax	1,600,000
			£3,343,000

which, deducted from a surplus of £3,874,000, left £531,000, with which the Government did not intend to part.

After reviewing the commercial circumstances of the country during recent years, and congratulating the House upon the general advance of national prosperity as a result of the fiscal policy inaugurated by Sir Robert Peel twenty years ago, the right hon. gentleman concluded by expressing a hope that the example we had set would be followed by other countries, and that the result would be to promote the cause of peace, progress, order, and civilization. For it would be an additional satisfaction if, over and above the benefit that our own people might derive from an alleviation of burdens, we thereby contributed to the allaying of unhappy jealousies and producing a more solid harmony among the great civilized nations of the world.

A number of members took part in a short subsequent discussion, and the House adjourned early.

FRIDAY, APRIL 17.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

Lord Chelmsford called attention to the case of the removal of two of the Judges of the Supreme Council of Justice of the United States of the Ionian Islands, and moved for the correspondence and the papers on the subject.—The Duke of Newcastle said, in accordance with the Constitution of the Ionian Islands the Judges were removable every five years. It had been represented to him that the removal of these Judges would increase the confidence of the Ionians in their courts of justice. He believed it was a wise and proper step, and beneficial to the people of the Ionian Islands.—Lord Derby said the question raised by Lord Chelmsford was, whether the removal of these Judges was not repugnant to the maxims held on the subject in this country. He expressed his astonishment at the position laid down by the Duke of Newcastle, that the Lord High Commissioner should arbitrarily remove men of eminence, of ability, and of integrity from their office without assigning any cause whatever. He was at a loss to reconcile the action of Her Majesty's Government in the present case with the position they had taken up on a recent occasion in refusing to dismiss an Australian Judge—that it was necessary above all things to uphold the independence of the Judges. He trusted the House would not sanction the steps taken by the Government, and hoped that the Duke of Newcastle would reconsider his objection to produce the correspondence on the subject. As, perhaps, the Ionian Islanders were about to separate themselves from us, he hoped that the last action of the Government would not be one which would rankle in their minds—viz., an interference with the independence of justice.—The Duke of Newcastle had no objection to produce the papers moved for.—The Lord Chancellor contended that, as these Judges were removable after a fixed period, there could be nothing more inexpedient than assigning reasons for not re-appointing them. No one in the Ionian Islands had complained of the removal except the two gentlemen affected. He expressed his conviction that the reticence of the Duke of Newcastle in regard to the dismissal of the two Judges had been kinder than the speeches of their advocates, which had brought down a species of condemnation upon them.—Lord Grey dwelt with much force on the necessity of upholding judicial independence, and stated that it was his habit, when Secretary for the Colonies, to refer questions of such great importance as the dismissal of Colonial Judges (who held their office during pleasure) to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. It was better to put up with a bad Judge for a time than violate the great principle of judicial independence. If the two Judges were removed for being political partisans, that was a good ground for removal, but the charge ought to have been made known and investigated before they were dismissed.

The motion was agreed to, and the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, APRIL 17.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

On the order for going into Committee of Supply, conversations took place on harbours of refuge, and the utilization of sewage, without result. The report of the Committee of Ways and Means, approving parts of the Budget, the day before being brought up—Sir S. Northcote observed that the feeling of the House and the country could not fail to be one of satisfaction at the general complexion of the Budget. He feared, however, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had again fallen into the error of the three preceding years, and over estimated the revenue from the excise. That error was based upon the idea of the right hon. gentleman that he would get from the duty upon spirits the increase which he had calculated upon in the year 1860. They must not deceive themselves with the supposition that the people in the manufacturing districts would not continue to suffer, and if the people suffered the revenue must suffer also. Besides the condition of things in Lancashire and Ireland, there were likewise points of uneasiness in our foreign relations which must influence the revenue of the coming year. But, although the consuming power of the country had been over-estimated and, therefore, the revenue from the excise, the estimates of the right hon. gentleman were not, upon the whole, too sanguine. He believed moreover that, taking one thing with another, those estimates would be realized, and that the surplus he reckoned upon would remain. The reductions of taxation proposed were large and wise, nevertheless he begged it to be understood that they had not come to the end of the policy of reductions yet.

Some other business was transacted, and the House adjourned.

MONDAY, APRIL 20.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

The Duke of Somerset, in reply to the Earl of Ellenborough, who called attention to the loss of the Orpheus, said that all masters of Her Majesty's ships were bound to report the discovery of any new rock or shoal to the Secretary of the Admiralty, and that information on those points was also received from colonial governors, consuls, harbour-masters, merchant captains, and the hydrographic department. The route taken by the commander of the Orpheus was the proper route according to chart No. 53. Yet that chart had been since revised in consequence of the shifting of the sand, and the information had been communicated to all the officers on the station. He had seen one of the officers saved from the wreck of the Orpheus, who told him that when the ship was crossing the bar, the commander held in his hand the very notice of the change which had taken place in the position of the bar.

The Earl of Hardwicke brought under notice the holding of a court of inquiry upon Lord Elphinstone for running the Vigilant upon the Gunfleet Sand. He strongly condemned the treatment which Lord Elphinstone had received at the hands of the Lords of the Admiralty, and animadverted upon the censure which had been cast upon him.—The Duke of Somerset said it was a great blunder and gross negligence to run the Vigilant on such a well-known shoal as the Gunfleet Sand; that the Admiralty were forced to censure Lord Elphinstone, to whom a copy of the evidence had been sent.—Lord Elphinstone had been offered a court-martial and refused it.—Earl Granville thought that Lord Elphinstone had been worse treated by his friends, who had compelled the noble duke near him to reiterate the censure, than by the Admiralty itself.—The Earl of Derby thought it was contrary to notions of British justice to try, condemn, and censure an officer in her Majesty's service without giving him an opportunity of defending himself. He was of opinion that Lord Elphinstone had been very hardly dealt with.

MONDAY, APRIL 20.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Mr. Peacocke inquired whether the Government had received any communication from the Federal States' Ministers with reference to the representations made by Mr. Crawford, the member for the City of London, on the occasion of a recent deputation to Earl Russell on the subject of the seizure of the Peterhoff; whether they had inquired into the authenticity of an alleged certificate given by Mr. Adams in favour of a certain vessel bound to Matamoros; and also what course the Government intended to take with reference to Mr. Adams.—Mr. Layard replied that the matter was still under the consideration of the Government, and that no representation had as yet been made to Mr. Adams.

Sir George Grey moved the second reading of the Prison Ministers Bill. Under the present law a chaplain or a clergyman of the Church of England is appointed to each prison, under whose spiritual charge all the inmates of the prison are placed. He visits them, and talks with and exhorts them, whatever may be the religion which they profess. If, however, a prisoner professing any other creed makes a special request for the attendance of a minister of his religion, the visiting justices may allow the attendance of such a minister. The Roman Catholics especially complain that the practical effect of this system is to deprive prisoners of their creed of all catholic religious teaching.

It is very seldom that a prisoner will express a desire to see a clergyman. Sir George Grey proposes, therefore, to allow the visiting justices of a prison, where there are a considerable number of Catholic prisoners, to appoint a Catholic chaplain, with a salary, and in every case to allow a minister of each religious profession to visit the prisoners of that profession. For that purpose a careful register is to be kept of the prisoners' religion. He observed that he could not understand in what manner it involved any question connected with the faith of any church or any principle which would be injurious to those Protestant doctrines to which the vast majority of the House and the country were attached. In fact, it was simply the application to county and borough gaols of a principle which was already in operation in the army and navy. By returns then before the House it appeared that a very large number of the prisoners in the county and borough gaols of England and Wales consisted of Irish Roman Catholics.—Mr. H. G. Langton moved as an amendment that the bill be read a second time that day six months. The title of the bill itself was objectionable, for the number of Protestant dissenters in the gaols of the country was extremely small—not more than twelve per cent. of the whole—and in no instance did they decline the ministrations of the regular chaplain. The bill was, therefore, a measure exclusively for Roman Catholic prisoners, and its title did not truly represent the object it was intended to carry out. By the law as it stood, under the "special request" section, Roman Catholic prisoners might see their own clergy, and in no instance where that request had been made had it been refused. True, the bill was only permissive, but he had no great predilection for bills of that sort. He believed their authors usually doubted their propriety, or, if they did not, proposed them as a means of attaining other and ulterior objects. In the present instance he thought the bill would entail upon the visiting justices an endless controversy on the one hand with the ratepayers, and on the other hand with Roman Catholic congregations urged on by their priests. But his objections to the principle of the bill rested upon far higher grounds; for since the period of the Reformation this was the first occasion on which Parliament had been called upon to sanction the appointment of priests paid out of the public money in every gaol throughout the country; and if the proposal were agreed to they might rely upon it that the next step would be the appointment of Roman Catholic chaplains to workhouses.—Mr. Henley could not agree that the bill was unnecessary and uncalled for. It was utterly unreasonable to expect that any priest, however zealous and kind-hearted he might be, would attend and administer the rites of religion to some hundred or two hundred prisoners without any remuneration. The fair principle on which this measure should be judged was that of doing unto others as you would they should do unto you.—Mr. Selwyn, member for the University of Cambridge, opposed the bill. It gave to persons, the visiting justices, whose duty it was to administer the law, the power of altering it. Under its operation there would be one law in one county and another law in another, and even different laws in the same county. And lastly, its real object was and its certain effect would be to give to the Roman Catholic priesthood—a status and position recognised by the law, and which would be antagonistic to our Protestant institutions.—Lord E. Howard, as a Catholic member of the House, thanked the Home Secretary for introducing the bill, which he argued was well adapted to remedy a great and serious grievance.

Mr. Disraeli observed that if he thought the bill had even a tendency to impair the authority of the Church of England, he should oppose it; but he looked at the privileges of the Church as representing popular rights, and that was the real source of her strength. Now, then, could her power be endangered by allowing persons who were not of her communion to enjoy the consolations of their peculiar religion? The application of the bill would be intrusted to the discretion of the natural leaders of the people, and if there were any body of men who did faithfully represent the popular feeling, it was those who administered the office of the magistracy; and who could suppose that under such an influence, proceedings would be sanctioned that would misrepresent the feeling of England and impair the Protestant spirit of the realm? The bill would, in short, perform an act of justice, not only to Roman Catholics, but to the community, and he hoped the House would assent to it, because it was in harmony with the legislation of recent years.—Lord Palmerston, speaking in support of the bill, remarked that the question at issue was not one between Protestantism and Catholicity—it was a question between sound sense and most respectable and honourable prejudice.—Mr. Newdegate vindicated his opposition to the bill against the insinuation that he was actuated by an ignorant prejudice or by any other feeling than a sincere conviction. The bill was a dishonest bill, and its true object was to gratify the ambition of the Church of Rome.

The debate closed with a speech by Mr. Whalley, against.

the bill; after which the House divided, and the second reading was carried by 152 to 122.

TUESDAY, APRIL 21.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

Business of no public importance was transacted.

TUESDAY, APRIL 21.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

In answer to Mr. Denman in reference to the Russian offer of an amnesty to the Poles, Lord Palmerston said that more than one version had appeared of the amnesty, and that different interpretations had been put upon it, some giving it the comprehensive sense attached to it by the hon. gentleman, and others a more limited and restricted meaning. All he could say was, that he hoped the larger interpretation was the just one. It was impossible not to feel that the Russian Government, and their troops in Poland, had committed so many acts of ferocious violence, that there was a great arrear of mercy and indulgence due from that Government, to set them right with the public opinion of Europe.

In reply to Mr. Griffith Lord Palmerston said that all the answer he could give was, that it had been his endeavour to make such arrangements as would combine as many advantages and as few objections as possible. It might be desirable that the distribution of Secretaries of State between the two Houses of Parliament should be different, but he was persuaded that the House of Commons would not experience any inconvenience from the present arrangements with respect to the full and proper explanation due to the House on all matters connected with the public service.

Sir George Grey moved for leave to bring in a bill for the amalgamation of the City of London police with the Metropolitan police. It was rendered necessary by the altered circumstances of the metropolis, which in population and area had far outgrown the limits of the City. In this respect, therefore, the Corporation of the City of London differed from every other in the kingdom. Its position was entirely exceptional, inasmuch as it had a separate jurisdiction independent of the surrounding district; so that no other corporation need be under any apprehension that the measure could possibly be applied to them.—Mr. W. R. Crawford would not oppose the motion for leave to bring in the bill, but he intended at the proper time to move as an amendment that it be read a second time that day six months.—Mr. Ald. Sidney opposed the bill.—The Lord Mayor took a similar view, and contended that the bill was uncalled for and unconstitutional.—Sir George Bowyer denounced the measure as one of a most pernicious character, which was not justified by any special circumstances which had occurred of late.—Lord Alfred Paget thought it most advisable that there should be two separate and distinct police authorities in the metropolis.—Mr. Bovill recommended the Government to consult, for their own interests and those of the country generally, by withdrawing the bill, and so avoid a conflict with the municipal authorities all over the kingdom.—Mr. Hibbert objected to the principle of centralisation involved in the bill.—The bill was supported by Mr. Ayrton, Sir Henry Stracey, and Mr. Sergeant Pigott, and opposed by Sir H. Bruce.—After a short reply from Sir George Grey, the motion for leave was agreed to.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 22.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, April 22, 1863.

Our market this week has presented no new feature of interest; prices have been well sustained by a good trade demand, and though less animation is now shown than at the close of our last report, our quotations remain the same.

On Thursday, Friday, and Saturday, the business reached 12,000 daily; the trade and exporters bought freely, the demand being met by holders at previous prices.

On Monday the sales were 10,000 bales, and on Tuesday 7,000, at firm prices.

To-day the tone of our market is not quite so strong, and with sales of 6,000 bales, prices are rather in favour of the buyer. We quote Middling Orleans, 22d.; Fair Saw-ginned Dharwar, 19d.; Fair Dhollerah and Omrawuttee, 17½d.

The state of Continental politics has to-day had a slightly depressing effect; the fear of further complications arising out of the Polish question has inspired caution here, and curtailed Continental business in Manchester. Our relations with America, moreover, are still unsatisfactory, and it is feared that continued illegal seizures by the Federals in neutral waters may so exasperate this country as seriously to endanger the friendly relations existing between the two countries. This change, however, is so remote that the influence it exerts here is barely perceptible.

The accounts from America still fail to bring us any decisive engagement, the combatants continue to hold their old ground, the Confederates still maintaining the defensive, and the Federals delaying their oft-predicted attack on Vicksburg and Charleston.

MANCHESTER, Tuesday, April 21.

Business has again during the past week continued its steady course, at the prices current the previous week, and altogether it may be considered of quite a legitimate character as far as it goes. Most spinners and manufacturers who have received orders to make, can, after buying their cotton and yarns, see a trifle more than their own money back again, a satisfactory state of things as compared with the transactions of many months before.

In yarns from Nos. 40s to 60s mule, spinners are working to order at good prices, for India shippers, and as the demand is still good, more firms are preparing their mills for running again.

Home trade yarns continue very steady in price, the inquiries of manufacturers being very freely met.

Shirtings, mulls, and Jaconets are still in good demand for India shipment, the makers of mulls being quite satisfied, for the present, with the prices obtained for them, as they readily assert that they can cover their orders with yarns at prices which will leave them a profit of about 3½d. per piece, each loom being capable of turning out fourteen pieces per week.

T-cloths and long cloths are also in steady demands for the Levant at, in most cases, paying prices.

Maddapollams and Printers are fetching a slight advance on last week's quotations.

To-day, although our market has been quiet, it has nevertheless been steady, with an improved amount of business doing, during the latter part of the day.

The German exporters showed more disposition to enter into transactions for mule and water-twist, also for pin-cops than has been the case for many months past.

THE SEIZURE OF THE BRITISH STEAMER DOLPHIN.

The following are the facts in relation to the capture of the British steamer Dolphin, by the United States' war vessel Wachusett, as they appear in the correspondence between the owners of the Dolphin and the Foreign Office, published in the Times of the 21st inst.

Mr. W. J. Grazebrook, the owner, writes to Earl Russell under date of Liverpool, April 13, 1863.

My Lord,—I have to call your attention to another flagrant outrage on British property by Federal cruisers, as detailed in newspaper paragraph herewith.

By the West India mail reaching Southampton yesterday, I learn that on the 24th of March the United States' ship Wachusett has captured my steamer, Dolphin, upon her leaving St. Thomas's, West Indies, while on her legitimate voyage from Liverpool to Nassau, with a general cargo of merchandise on board.

I beg to hand you an attested copy of ship's manifest, also ship's bill of lading; copy of my letters of instructions to her commander, Captain R. H. Eustace (original letter-book, folio 697); and copy of my letter of instructions to the agents for the ship, Messrs. Chambers and Raw, of Nassau (original letter-book, folio 690).

These documents will plainly prove the nature of her voyage, and that her destination was Nassau, New Providence.

As Nassau is a part of the British possessions, and no notification of the blockade of Nassau or of the Danish island of St. Thomas's has yet been issued, I have to claim the protection of the British Government to obtain her immediate release, with full compensation for the injury done to my trade and the insult to my captain and crew.

I am, your Lordship's most obedient servant,

W. J. GRAZEBROOK.

The letters to the captain and consignees of the vessel referred to in the above, are as follows:—

Liverpool, Feb. 6, 1863.

Dear Sir,—I have written to Messrs. Broad and Sons to have ready 40 to 50 tons best Cardiff coals for your service at Falmouth on Tuesday morning. On reaching Madeira it will be necessary to coal there, drawing on me at as long a date as possible. I will endeavour and write to you, care of W. Broad and Sons, with a letter to parties having coals at Madeira; if not, do the best you can. I think it likely after leaving Madeira you may be able to go under half steam to St. Thomas's, and must request of you to use your endeavour to cause engineers to economise fuel as much as possible. I enclose letter herewith to Messrs. Lamb, Ball, and Co., of St. Thomas's, who will give you coal, &c. You must endeavour to draw at as long sight as possible upon me for what coals you may get. These gentlemen will also inform you as to what freights are likely to be offering at St. Thomas's and neighbouring islands, and it would be well to get as much information as you can on these subjects with an eye to future trade. I expect the French army at Vera Cruz will want rum and many articles which you may obtain after discharging at Nassau. I am sure a good trade is to be done in these latitudes after we have got rid of your present cargo. Coals also are sure to be wanted at Nassau, and the coals at Prince Edward's Island are good and cheap—cost 15s. per ton. At Nassau, New Providence, you are consigned to Messrs. Chambers and Raw, my agents, who, I have no doubt, will give you quick despatch. I am told it has become very expensive since the place has been frequented by so many blockade steamers. I rely upon your keeping all charges down. Messrs. Chambers and Raw will probably have the charter arranged for the French Government they wrote about; if not, you must find, in concert with them, some profitable employment. Perhaps trading between Boston or New York with goods for the Nassau market would pay well.

I will write again soon.

Yours truly,

W. J. GRAZEBROOK.

P.S.—I send letters to Chambers and Raw.

Captain R. H. Eustace, steamer Dolphin.

(A true copy—W. M. Roonie.)

Liverpool, Feb. 6, 1863.

Dear Sirs,—This will be handed to you by Captain Eustace. I hope the cargo will have arrived in good condition, and will be found suitable for the requirements of the place. I have sent more crockery than we intended, and it has filled up the ship. I think they have sent too many chambers for the assortment. However, the goods are very much according to your specifications sent me from time to time.

I am a little afraid your market may be ordered from New York and the States. If the French charter for the army stores, rum, &c., has fallen through, I fancy a fine trade is to be done between Nassau and Boston, or New York, or it may be through the Canadas, if this war continues, and coal must be greatly wanted for the blockade runners. You might arrange for a return cargo of coals from Prince Edward's Island. I have no doubt you will find plenty of employment for my steamer. If the Federal or any one will pay a right down handsome sum for her I might sell her, but I will have none of your Federal or Confederate paper in exchange for my tight little ship; it must be hard cash.

Yours truly,

W. J. GRAZEBROOK.

Messrs. Chambers and Raw, Nassau

(per steamer Dolphin).

(A true copy—W. Roonie.)

The receipt of the above is acknowledged on behalf of Earl Russell by Mr. Hammond, under date of 14th inst., with promise "that this case shall be considered by her Majesty's Government." On the 15th Mr. Grazebrook sends to the Foreign Office some further facts, an attested copy of protest before the British Consul at St. Thomas; and attested copy of protest before a notary at Liverpool, giving further details. Mr. Grazebrook adds:—"This detention is seriously affecting my business, and also the commerce of all West India merchants."

The protest before the Notary at Liverpool is signed by sixteen of the mariners and engineers of the said steamship Dolphin, who, after "solemnly and sincerely declaring that they, these appearers, were only shipped for a voyage to Nassau," continues:—

On the 10th of February last set sail from Liverpool in the said steamship or vessel, bound on the voyage thence to Nassau with a cargo of lawful merchandise properly stowed, and the said vessel being tight, staunch, and strong, and well and sufficiently provided and fitted, and named for the intended voyage, nothing worthy of record occurred until Wednesday, the 25th day of March last, on which day, at one A.M., these appearers sailed from St. Thomas's for Nassau, and on the same day, when about three miles from Calabra Island, off Porto Rico, were fired at and stopped in their course by the Federal ship of war Wachusett, the British flag at the same time flying at the stern of these appearers' ship. The Federal ship Wachusett immediately sent a boat full of armed men on board these appearers' ship; the officer in charge, as soon as he boarded, demanded to see the ship's papers, but before seeing them armed men took possession of the engine-room, and a petty officer took possession of the bridge. The United States' officer and Captain Eustace then went into the cabin to see the ship's papers. In about twenty minutes the United States' officer and Captain Eustace reappeared, when the officer ordered all hands aft and called the muster roll, ticking off the names, and calling out which men must go on board the Wachusett. The men thus picked out were hurried off as they stood, some from the stokeholes, without their coats. They then struck the British flag and hoisted the stars and stripes, and ordered Captain Eustace to go on board the Wachusett, who said, "I protest against these proceedings, and I will not go unless I am forced to do so." Four men from the Federal ship then seized Captain Eustace, lifted him over the gangway, and forced him from the deck of his own ship into the boat alongside belonging to the Wachusett, the men who were picked out accompanying the captain of the first boat load. The boatswain, William Hales, one of these appearers, seeing one of the United States' men handle roughly the cabin-boy, who is twelve years old, and who was crying, pushed down the United States' man, and locked the boy in the captain's room, and flung the keys to Captain Eustace. Hales was, in consequence, roughly handled and shoved into the boat. Some of the United States' men returned drunk to the Wachusett, and it is these appearers' belief they must have broken into the Dolphin's cargo in the fore hold, as a box of champagne was upon the deck of the Dolphin, and the coxswain of the first boat's crew was in irons three days for returning drunk from the Dolphin, and for striking one of these appearers, George Macdonald, when he was a prisoner on the Wachusett. Captain Eustace was kept on board the Wachusett for two hours. In the meantime they ordered the engineers who were on board the Dolphin to start the engines, who refused, saying, "We are British seamen; we did not ship to serve under the stars and stripes." Finding they could not start the engines themselves, they came and asked the engineers again, who said if they had got written orders from Captain Eustace they would do so, but not otherwise. Captain Eustace was then sent back to the Dolphin, and the second and third engineers, the fire men, and the remainder of the crew were ordered on board the Wachusett, where they were detained until Her Majesty's ship Nile had left St. Thomas's, when they were landed at the American Consulate, and afterwards proceeded, of their own accord, to the British Consul, and acquainted him with these facts, who very kindly forwarded them per Atrato, to Southampton. Wherefore these appearers declare and protest, and I the said notary at their request have protested, and by these presents do protest, that all and whatsoever loss, damage, delay, or injury, which have happened to the said vessel, her cargo, or voyage, are wholly owing to the circumstances herein set forth, and not to any default of these appearers, who did their utmost for the preservation of the said vessel.

The Protest before Her Majesty's Consul at St. Thomas's, is signed by fourteen of the crew of the Dolphin, and is substantially to the same effect as that before the Notary at Liverpool.

A MARITIME PASSPORT.

At the interview granted by Earl Russell on the 16th instant to Mr. Harving and other merchants interested in the case of the Peterhoff, the following letter was read, to show the utter want of good faith, and the monstrous pretensions of the Federal authorities, to regulate British commerce by their convenience alone; it having been circulated at Lloyd's, in an attempt to effect an insurance for a cargo of munitions of war, going from England to Matamoras, and to be used by the Mexicans against the French:—

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

London, April 9, 1863.

Amid the multitude of fraudulent and dishonest enterprises from this kingdom to furnish supplies to the rebels in the United States, through the pretence of a destination to some port in Mexico, it gives me pleasure to distinguish one which has a different and a creditable purpose. Messrs. Howell and Zirman have furnished me with evidence, which is perfectly satisfactory to me, that they are really bound to Matamoras with a cargo intended for the Mexicans. I therefore very cheerfully give them this certificate at their request. It is not the disposition of the Government of the United States to interfere in any way with an honest neutral trade, and it is deeply to be regretted that the frauds which have been so extensively practised in this country have contributed so much to throw it under suspicion.

CHARLES FRANCIS ADAMS.

Admiral Dupont, &c.

As a pendant to the above we quote the following from the Times City article of April 23rd.

The following correspondence has passed between the owners of the steamship Sea Queen, now waiting to sail for Matamoras, and Mr. Adams, the United States Minister in London. It appears that as Mr. Adams, in his certificate granted to the New York contractor, Mr. Howell, and the Mexican officer, General Zirman, had stated that he had pleasure in giving a certificate to any parties engaged in an honest neutral trade, the owners of the Sea Queen considered themselves entitled to apply for a similar protection, provided they could satisfy Mr. Adams that that vessel is honestly destined for a neutral port with a cargo totally free from a single package that could be liable to the shadow of an objection that it is not a fair article of honest commerce. In reply, however, they have been informed by Mr. Adams that they are under a misconception as to the course he has heretofore taken, and that he has no authority to exercise any discretion in regard either to the vessels or voyages of Her Majesty's subjects. But his Excellency does not state that the certificate to Messrs. Howell and Zirman was a forgery, and it is therefore difficult to understand wherein consists the misconception to which he alludes. Messrs. Howell and Zirman are not British subjects, but Mr. Adams can hardly intend to intimate that he is anxious by means of his certificates to secure a monopoly of the trade between Mexico and this country for Americans and Mexicans, or for British shipowners who will employ Americans or Mexicans to make interest for them. In the certificate which has been quoted he made no allusion to questions of nationality, but simply announced the cheerfulness with which he was prepared to assist honest parties. Under these circumstances, there can be little doubt that although the Sea Queen is not engaged for such a purpose as that which Mr. Adams has pronounced to be especially "creditable"—namely, the transport of arms and ammunition to enable the Mexicans to resist the attempts of the French Government to obtain redress for a long series of outrages,—the public will consider that her owners were not seeking any undue favour in putting forward their present solicitation. It is true Mr. Adams seeks to console them with the assurance that they are certain to obtain protection from their own Government, but indications that have transpired during the past few days leave room to doubt whether on that point he is not indulging in a little irony:—

2, Cowper's-court, Cornhill, E.C., April 21, 1863.

Sir,—Referring to your letter to Mr. Gourley, in which you state it is not the wish of the United States' Government to subject honest traders to any inconvenience, and to the fact that you have recently granted a certificate to the naval officer in command of the United States' squadron, in favour of a vessel proceeding to Matamoras, I would respectfully ask you to give me a similar certificate in favour of the steamship Sea Queen, which vessel is about proceeding to Matamoras with a cargo of merchandise.

To satisfy you that the venture is perfectly legitimate I am prepared to submit to you the manifest of the cargo, all the documents embodying the arrangements under which the ship proceeds on the voyage to Matamoras and back, and I wait upon you for the purpose of affording you any further information or explanations you may desire.

Not wishing to withhold anything, I think it is as well to mention that the Sea Queen was formerly called the Lloyd's, and that, when sailing under that name, she successfully ran the blockade into and out of Charleston; but this circumstance cannot, of course, affect the present voyage or the present owners, she having changed ownership since that occasion.

To satisfy you that the vessel is intended, bonâ fide, to proceed to and return from Matamoras, I should be quite willing that any person you may think proper to appoint should proceed to Matamoras, in the vessel, at my expense.

In making this application, I trust you will rest assured that I am influenced by no other consideration than a desire to afford you the opportunity of averting a repetition of the proceedings with the Peterhoff.

As the steamer is lying at Falmouth ready to sail I beg the favour of an early reply.

I have the honour to be, Sir, your most obedient,

JOSEPH SPENCE, of Pile, Spence, and Co.

To the Hon. Charles F. Adams, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from the United States of America.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

London, April 22, 1863.

Sir,—I have to acknowledge the reception of your note dated yesterday. I regret to perceive that you labour under a misconception of the course taken by me heretofore. It must be obvious to you that I have no authority to exercise any discrimination in regard either to the vessels or the voyages of Her Majesty's subjects. When they are engaged in legal undertakings, they have a right to rely upon the protection of her Government, and they will undoubtedly obtain it. When it is otherwise, of course they would not expect it from her, or ask it from a representative of the United States.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

CHARLES FRANCIS ADAMS.

THE POST-OFFICE AND THE MATAMORAS MAILS.

(From the Times City Article, April 21.)

The following correspondence has passed in reference to the mails for Matamoras intended to be despatched by the steamship Sea Queen, the sister ship of the captured Peterhoff, which is now waiting at Falmouth until the Government shall have decided whether they will grant her any protection. From the style of the communications made by the Postmaster-General it would almost appear that the Government, instead of being disposed to grant any extra protection, were desirous of avoiding trouble upon the matter by withdrawing an indirect form of protection which our mercantile marine at present enjoys; but, with the tone of feeling that now prevails in Parliament, it is scarcely likely that this can be the case. In their recent interview with Lord Russell the parties interested suggested that the difficulty might be met by the Government sending a mail agent on board, whose presence would be a sufficient guarantee of the bonâ fide character of voyage, and they offered to pay any expenses that this arrangement might involve. Nothing could have been more moderate than this proposal, and Lord Russell promised to consider it. It has been met, however, by a curt refusal on the part of the Post-office, followed by an intimation which looks as if an idea had occurred to the Postmaster-General, and been eagerly seized, by which the Government might get out of its responsibility with regard to the vessel altogether. The owners are informed that, if they will land the mails already received on board, the Government will relieve them of the duty of carrying any. They had pointed to the danger of the mails being violated by the Federal functionaries, with the view of compromising the ship, and the Post-office, instead of reassuring them on this head, have apparently considered it suitable to the dignity of this country to try, as far as they are concerned, to back out of all, even the most customary, connexion with the vessel. Possibly the correspondence may admit of a less derogatory interpretation, but the manner in which it was thought fit to conduct the affair from the first certainly warrants a surmise that there was every disposition to treat the applicants as troublesome persons, to whom it would be officially unwise to give even the encouragement of courtesy. Finally, it is to be remarked that our merchants are entitled to the opportunity of sending letters by this vessel, and that in any case an explanation will be due to them of the grounds on which the Post-office would have been a party to depriving them of it:—

April 11.

Your Lordship,—We have this day received a letter from Messrs. Pile, Spence, and Co., the owners of the steamship Sea Queen, declining to allow that vessel to carry the mail to Matamoras, for which we applied to you on the 2nd inst.

They state as their reason that they have been unable to obtain any assurance of protection from her Majesty's Government against the capture of the vessel by Federal cruisers, and, further, that in the case of the Adela, captured on her voyage from Bermuda to Nassau, and taken to Key West, the seals of her Majesty's mails were broken open by the authorities, and the judge then informed Captain W. N. W. Hewitt, R.N., commanding her Majesty's steamer Rinaldo, that the seals of all bags and letters would be opened, and letters read for information relative to vessels seized.

We also learn that in the case of the steamship Peterhoff, despatched by us, and lately seized by the Federal war steamer Vanderbilt, that the mail had been taken possession of by the Federal authorities.

In making this communication to your Lordship we beg to point out the danger incurred under these circumstances by taking a mail, as it is not in our power, or that of the owners of the vessel, to control the nature of the letters which may be forwarded through the Post-office, and it would be quite possible for designing persons to forward by the Sea Queen fictitious letters of the most compromising character entirely without the knowledge of ourselves or shippers. We are, therefore, desirous of ascertaining, in the event of illegal seizure of the Sea Queen on her present voyage, whether such violation of her Majesty's mails can be justified, and whether we should, in that case, incur the risk of having their contents produced to strengthen alleged suspicion, and delay the release of the ship and cargo.

We have the honour to be, your Lordship's obedient servants,
JAMES J. BENNETT and WAKE.

To the Right Hon. Lord Stanley of Alderley,
Postmaster-General.

No. 77, Cornhill, E.C., London, April 15.

My Lord,—We had the honour of addressing a communication to your Lordship on the 11th inst., informing your Lordship of the refusal on the part of the owners of the steamship Sea Queen, now despatching by us to Matamoras, to carry mail bags, under the impression that their contents if opened by the Federal authorities might compromise the ship and cargo.

We have not yet been favoured with any written reply to our letter, but a messenger who represented himself as sent by the Post-office authorities called on the 13th inst., to say that the mails had that morning been placed on board, and wished to know how they could be recovered, the vessel having left the river.

There being nothing in the appearance of the messenger to indicate the authority under which he professed to call, we waited some more official communication, but the vessel being now at Falmouth, we hasten to inform your Lordship that the owners are aware they cannot legally refuse to carry a mail, and being, indeed, desirous to give the services of their vessel, if they can do so without undue risk, now ask your Lordship to place on board a mail agent to take charge of the bags, and, if your Lordship consents to their request, are willing with ourselves, in the interests of all parties, to support the expense attending on his voyage out.

We have the honour to remain, my Lord,

Your Lordship's most obedient and humble servants,
JAMES J. BENNETT and WAKE.

To the Right Hon. Lord Stanley of Alderley,
Postmaster-General.

P. Registered No. 27,623.

General Post-office, April 16.

Gentlemen,—Referring to your letter of the 11th inst., respecting the steamship Sea Queen, about to sail for Matamoras, I am directed by the Postmaster-General to inform you that previous to the receipt of that letter three ship letter mails for Matamoras, containing eight letters and two newspapers, had been placed on board the Sea Queen.

The Postmaster-General must decline to express any opinion with respect to the question raised in the concluding paragraph of your letter.

I am further to state that his Lordship cannot accede to the proposal made in your second letter, dated the 15th inst., that he should place on board the Sea Queen a mail agent to take charge of the mails.

I am, Gentlemen, your obedient servant,

F. HILL.

Messrs. Bennett and Wake, 77, Cornhill.

P. Registered No. 27,623.

General Post-office, April 17.

Gentlemen,—With reference to my letter of yesterday's date, I have further to inform you that, if the owners of the steamship Sea Queen shall desire that the mails for Matamoras, which had been embarked before your letter of the 11th inst. reached this office, should not be carried by that vessel, and will instruct the commander to put them on shore at Falmouth, the Postmaster-General will authorise the Postmaster at Falmouth, by means of the electric telegraph, to receive the mails and to return them to London.

I am, Gentlemen, your obedient servant,

F. HILL.

Messrs. Bennett and Wake, 77, Cornhill.

77, Cornhill, E.C., London, April 17.

My Lord,—We have the honour to acknowledge receipt of your letters of 16th and 17th inst. (No. 27,623), and in reply we beg to inform your Lordship that the shippers and owners of the Sea Queen have applied to the Foreign-office for some protection for their goods and vessel, and until the reply has been received the owners are unwilling to return the mails, in the hope that the extreme position which caused them to dread having them on board may be somewhat modified.

We may add that the letters and parcels of the merchants in our care have not been posted while the question remained pending, and we are also aware of many houses anxious to avail themselves of the opportunity of forwarding their letters by the Sea Queen through the post if possible.

We have the honour to remain, my Lord,

Your Lordship's most obedient and humble servants,
JAMES J. BENNETT and WAKE.

To the Right Hon. Lord Stanley of Alderley,
Her Majesty's Postmaster-General.

(From the Times' City Article, April 22.)

The public have to be informed to-day of the most unpleasant circumstance that has yet transpired in the proceedings to which the Peterhoff case has given rise. A correspondence was published yesterday, showing that the Post-office, after treating the parties who had addressed them regarding the precautions to be taken for the safety of any mails that might be transmitted by the Sea Queen, a sister ship of the

Peterhoff, now about to sail for Matamoras, with a certain amount of rudeness, had wound up the affair by notifying that the suggestion that a mail agent should be sent with the vessel would not be acceded to, and that the mails now on board might be taken out of her and handed back to the Post-office authorities. To mercantile minds the only object of this course seemed to be that the Government, instead of affording any protection to the vessel, might back out even from the risk of having to make reclamations for the mails in case she should meet with the fate of the Peterhoff. Any outrage on our merchant ships is of course aggravated, if it is accompanied by seizure and detention of her Majesty's mails, and the withdrawal of these mails would therefore so far smooth the way for a continuance of the proceedings of Admiral Wilkes that they would enable our Government to exercise a degree of forbearance even greater than that which has hitherto been shown. But it was assumed that the determination was merely departmental, and that it proceeded from the Post-office prior to any decision having been arrived at by Lord Russell. It will now be seen, however, from the following letters that the British Government have actually thought fit to propose that the Sea Queen and the other vessels of the steam line established to Matamoras should refuse to carry mails, and that thus, at the sacrifice of a privilege which is the undoubted right of our merchants and of all who are interested in having the advantage of a speedy means of communication with Mexico, they—the Government—should be allowed to meet, or rather to evade, the embarrassments of the case. It was "by the recommendation of Lord Russell" that the Postmaster-General gave the answer published yesterday. If the precedent is allowed to be established, we may have our ship mail services interrupted all over the world, since the same defence that is now shown to the United States, in setting aside the convenience of our commercial houses in order to reduce the danger of having to remonstrate on the conduct of Admiral Wilkes, must, in fairness on future occasions, be extended to all other nations. In the present instance the result will be that the Federal squadron will have to boast not only of putting a stop to British trade with Mexico, except such as is sanctioned by the certificates of their Minister in London, but they have also gained the further advantage of intimidating our Government, so as to restrict our means of correspondence. If the affair admits of any other view, the merchants of London will be heartily glad to discover and accept it; but in the absence of explanation, the announcement appears to be one of the most unsatisfactory that has ever emanated from the Foreign-office, while, at the same time, from its tendency to invite a repetition of arrogant bravado, it will to a majority of experienced persons appear especially calculated to lead the way to war:—

FROM THE REPRESENTATIVES OF THE STEAMSHIP SEA QUEEN TO LORD RUSSELL.

77, Cornhill, E.C., April 17.

My Lord,—We had the honour of submitting to your Lordship yesterday our reason for soliciting the interference of Her Majesty's Government to afford some protection for the steamship Sea Queen, now lying at Falmouth, and detained by the owners in consequence of the capture of the Peterhoff. It is not necessary for us to dilate on the inconvenience and loss arising to us merchants whose goods are on board the Sea Queen by such detention and stoppage of our legal trade. We, therefore, respectfully suggest to your Lordship that the presence of a mail agent on the vessel would offer a guarantee to the Federal authorities that the vessel would proceed to the port for which she was cleared, and we earnestly solicit of your Lordship the appointment of such an official. Should our request meet with the approbation of your Lordship, we are prepared ourselves to support any charges arising from such appointment.

We have the honour to remain, my Lord,

Your Lordship's most obedient servants,

JAMES J. BENNETT and WAKE.
The Right Hon. Earl Russell, K.G., Her Majesty's
Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

LORD RUSSELL TO THE REPRESENTATIVES OF THE STEAMSHIP SEA QUEEN.

Foreign Office, April 18.

Gentlemen,—I have laid before Earl Russell your letter of yesterday's date, requesting that instructions may be given for placing a Government mail agent on board the Sea Queen, which is now at Falmouth, and I am directed to state to you in reply that, at Lord Russell's recommendation, the Postmaster-General will for the present relieve vessels proceeding to Matamoras from the obligation of carrying ship letter mails.

I am, Gentlemen, your most obedient, humble servant,

E. HAMMOND.

Messrs. Bennett and Wake, 77, Cornhill, E.C.

BRITISH SUBMISSION TO YANKEE INSULTS.

(From the Morning Herald of April 21.)

The determination of the Federal Government to put a stop to British trade with the West Indian Islands and with Mexico produces from day to day, and will probably continue for some time to produce, unpleasant discussions, if not between Mr. Adams and the Foreign-office, certainly between the Foreign-office and the owners of plundered property and vessels piratically seized. It should not, however, be left to the latter to conduct the case on behalf of neutral rights. Naturally, they strengthen their own cause by pleas which are unnecessary and irrelevant, but which serve to place in a stronger light the absolute want of any excuse or provocation on the part of the Americans; and by so doing they inevitably weaken the general argument in favour of the freedom of commerce, and help to mislead their countrymen as to the real extent and nature of belligerent rights at sea. For instance, the owners of the Peterhoff pleaded that their ship had no contraband of war on board—meaning to show thereby not only that the Federal cruisers had no right, but also that they had no provocation to seize her. Taking up this plea, Lord Russell answered that the Americans had certainly no right to capture a vessel proceeding from neutral port to neutral port, and not carrying contraband of war destined for the Confederate States. The fact is—and Lord Russell's own previous despatches show that he knows it—that the Federalists have no more right to meddle with a British vessel bound for Matamoras than the Confederates would have to meddle with a British vessel bound for Quebec; that her destination being lawful the character of her cargo is not a subject of concern to the belligerent; that the vessel being innocent, her cargo is free; and finally that, by the dictum of Lord Stowell, as well as by every maxim of common sense and public law, it is clear that there can be no contraband of war between neutral ports. The case of a British ship sailing for Matamoras with a cargo of arms, ammunition, and warlike stores, reasonably supposed to be intended for the Confederate States, and the case of the packet between Dover and Calais carrying a letter from Mr. Mason to Mr. Slidell are in law precisely alike. All trade between neutrals is lawful, whether or no its object be the assistance of a belligerent. Neutrals have a right to supply arms and munitions of war to any country, provided only they do not send them direct to the ports of a belligerent power. On their way to such ports they are liable to seizure; on her way to a blockaded port a vessel with an innocent cargo is liable to confiscation. But neither vessel nor goods on their way from one neutral port to another, whatever their previous history or subsequent destination, are subject to capture. The trade between Liverpool and Nassau, and between London and Matamoras, is a lawful trade, even though it be in arms and munitions of war intended at the first opportunity to be transhipped and sent into the Confederate States; and in seizing British vessels engaged in such a trade the Federalists are breaking the law of nations in exactly the same manner and degree as if they were to seize one of the Peninsular and Oriental Company's steamers in the Mediterranean, or to way-lay an Australian gold ship. The right of capture in any case is an exception to the general liberty of the seas, strictly defined and closely limited; the trade in arms is a lawful trade, except when carried on directly and immediately with a belligerent port; and it can not be allowed that a belligerent, who as a neutral was remarkable for his extreme tenacity of neutral liberties, should be permitted to carry the exception so far as to supersede the rule, and to suspend a lawful trade because he finds that it feeds an unlawful trade, which he is unable to suppress. It is because shipowners allow themselves to lose sight of these plain facts; and statesmen find it convenient to ignore them, that we press upon public attention rules of international law so exceedingly trite and familiar. It is no trifling disgrace to the British Ministry that it should have so acted as to make such a reiteration of the first principles of public law seem necessary—that, owing to the failure of the Government to enforce our national rights, it will probably surprise many people to be told what and how extensive those rights are. It is not the fault of the Foreign-office if any gentleman is aware that he has as much right to send a cargo of arms to Nassau as to send a fowling-piece to his friend in the country, and that in seizing such a cargo Admiral Wilkes commits precisely the same violation of law as would a policeman in confiscating a gun duly sent per rail to a sporting squire.

In view of this absolute right of trade between neutral ports we must perceive the peculiar offensiveness of such a document as the certificate by which Mr. Adams gives a license to a particular British vessel to carry on such a trade. It is this which renders so utterly inexcusable the captures made by the United States cruisers. It is this which makes the instructions given to those cruisers to seize particular vessels whenever and wherever found almost a declaration of war against England. If ships having munitions of war on board were liable to be seized on a voyage between neutral ports, then the detention, at least, if not the condemnation, of all vessels trading to Nassau or Matamoras might be palliated if not justified. It is the certainty that, whatever their cargo, these vessels are legally free that forms the gravamen of the offence involved in their capture. That offence is greatly enhanced by the fact that it is committed systematically, and with a definite and well-understood purpose. It is the object and intention of the United States to use the right of search as a means of preventing British ships from carrying on a trade which, though provoking to the Federal Government, is perfectly lawful. We say to prevent British ships from carrying on that trade—for ships are allowed to clear from New York for Matamoras, and vessels under the flags of nations whose Government will assert their rights are rarely molested by the subordinates of Mr. Gideon Welles. Their advocates in this country endeavour, as a matter of course, to gloss over the outrageous illegality of this course, sometimes by ignoring the law, oftener by ignoring the facts; while one of them was driven to the desperate resource of alleging the escape of the Alabama as an excuse (wholly irrelevant by the way) for conduct which began long before the Alabama's keel was laid down. Mr. Adams answers the complaints made of the arrest of British ships on voyages to neutral ports by saying that many British ships have carried aid for the Confederates. But if they carried that aid to neutral ports they did only what they had a right to do; and it is no excuse for the capture of a vessel, confessedly bound to Matamoras, that another vessel ran the blockade of Charleston. Nor, by the way, is it any excuse that the same vessel on a previous voyage had run the blockade. But, so long as we suffer it, the Federal Government will strain and violate the law of nations with the same shameless audacity. They will seize ships bound on lawful voyages; they will issue black lists of suspected vessels; they will assert the right to confiscate whenever and wherever they find a vessel that has once offended them. Nothing will stop them but a peremptory warning that England will endure no more.

But that warning our Government seems by no means disposed to convey. We publish to-day the correspondence between the Foreign-office and the owners of the Sea Queen. The latter vessel, bound for Matamoras, was to carry her Majesty's mails; and, being threatened by the Federalists, the owners requested that a mail agent might be placed on board, as his presence might afford her some sort of protection. It was clear that compliance with this request would secure that the voyage should be lawful; because, with a mail agent on board, the vessel dare not go anywhere but to her nominal destination. And it is equally clear that the British Government is bound to protect a British ship on a lawful voyage; and that the kind of protection asked was perfectly legitimate, peaceful, and proper. But the Foreign Secretary, with the fear of Mr. Bright and Mr. Peter Taylor before his eyes, thought it best to neglect his obvious duty; and preferred to order the mails to be left at home rather than to protect them and the ship which was to carry them from piratical seizure. While our Government acts in this way we are not entitled to complain very angrily of such outrages as those of Admiral Wilkes, or such insolence as that of Mr. Adams. It is scarcely in human nature, especially in critical times, not to encroach on the rights of those who are too cowardly to maintain them; it certainly is not in American nature to abstain from insulting weakness and taking advantage of inability. But we can hardly think that it is in British nature to endure much longer the insults and encroachments which are invited by the vacillating and unpatriotic timidity of the present occupants of the Foreign office; and we may predict that one or two more such captures as that of the Peterhoff will raise a storm more dangerous to Lord Russell than the combined displeasure of Mr. Bright and Mr. Seward, Mr. Charles Adams and Mr. Peter Taylor.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

Our friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed; that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any date, will be useful and acceptable presents.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives, or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognized at this office.

Our subscribers in the South will have their paper supplied through HENRY HOTZE, Esq., the Confederate States' Commercial Agent at London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

Subscription, 26s. per annum—post paid, 30s., payable in advance.

All communications on business to be addressed, and Post-Office Orders made payable to, J. B. HOPKINS, 13, Bouverie-street, Fleet-street, London, E.C.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, APRIL 23, 1863.

Belligerent and Neutral Rights.

The subject at present uppermost in people's minds is the unaccountable and un-English tameness with which the Government apparently endures, or rather invites, the Yankee warfare upon neutral commerce. Merchants complain to the Foreign-office that their lawful trade with a British colony is interrupted by the arrogant and illegal assumption of belligerent powers on the part of the Federal cruisers. The reply is an advice to cease trade altogether with such colony. Complaint is made that the mails between this and another neutral country cannot be carried in safety, owing to the same arrogance and assumption: the reply again is not to carry the mails. A weak and insignificant country, overawed by the threats of formidable neighbours, might find in its weakness an excuse or at least a prudential reason for such a conduct; but forbearance, to call it by no harsher name, has seldom been carried to such lengths, and certainly never by Great Britain at any period of her history. Fully appreciating that prestige is as much a part of the substantial strength of a powerful nation as armaments, she has consistently aimed at making herself respected and even feared, as well by the strong as the weak. It has been left to her statesmen of the present generation to interpret literally, and introduce into international law, the Christian injunction of turning also the other cheek when one is smitten.

There are, however, symptoms that the public is not so meek and long-suffering as the Government. The crowning outrages upon neutral rights in the successive seizures of the Peterhoff and the Dolphin, without the shadow or scarcely the pretence of reasonable suspicion, have at last broken the camel's back, and excited a feeling of indignation little less intense than that caused by the kindred affair of the Trent. The Press is nearly unanimous in giving utterance to this feeling; and even the Daily News, notoriously Americanized as is that paper, and bigoted in its admiration of Dictator Lincoln, is forced by an overwhelming public opinion to hint at "the necessity of resisting by energetic action the interference of the Americans with our trade and shipping." Mr. Roebuck has brought the matter under the notice of Parliament, and though Lord Palmerston turned it off playfully at the moment, there can be little doubt that the debate in the House of Commons to-night will be most serious and animated.

The illegality of the recent seizures is so flagrant that it is difficult to conceive how Earl Russell himself, with his admitted disposition to "construe international law liberally" in favour of the Federal Government, can invent an extenuating circumstance for the conduct of his favourites. In this particular case of construction the Foreign Secretary is committed in advance by his own words. In his reply to Mr. Seward's despatch on the surrender of the Confederate Commissioners, he says:—

It is of the very essence of the definition of contraband that the articles should have a hostile, and not a neutral destination. "Goods," says Lord Stowell, "going to a neutral port, cannot come under the description of contraband, all goods going there being equally lawful. The rule respecting contraband," he adds, "as I have always understood it, is that articles must be taken in delicto, in the actual prosecution of the voyage to an enemy's port."

Earl Russell being thus committed to Lord Stowell's, and not his own "liberal" construction of international law, what possible excuse can be framed for the seizure of the Peterhoff, unless it be argued that Matamoras, in Mexico, is "an enemy's port"—or that there was, which is not alleged, ground for suspicion as to the destination of that vessel? What reason can there be for refusing to remove all grounds for similar suspicion in the case of the companion steamers of the Peterhoff, by placing on board of them, at the owner's expense, a mail agent in charge of the endangered mails? Is the refusal of this reasonable request a deliberate invitation to the Federal officers to repeat the outrage?

But the most serious departure of the Foreign Secretary from the duty of protection which he owes to his fellow subjects, is in attempting to confound, or at least failing to distinguish, in his answer to the Peterhoff complainants, the real reasons of the illegality of that capture. It is not because the Peterhoff carried no contraband that her seizure was illegal, but because no presumption of doubt did or could exist as to her bonâ fide destination. This "essential" and elementary principle is stated unmistakeably in the words of Lord Stowell, quoted by Earl Russell himself. Yet the Peterhoff and the Dolphin are, unfortunately, not the only cases where captures have been allowed or submitted to by this Government, when the destination of the vessels was quite as unquestionably neutral. Upon the very pretence set up by Mr. Seward, which Earl Russell then combated, he has since permitted the trade to British colonies to be subjected to almost as much risk as trade with the blockaded ports. This pretence of Mr. Seward was, that "Great Britain herself regarded as true maritime law, that the circumstances of a vessel proceeding from a neutral port to a neutral port, does not modify the rights of the belligerent Power." We have quoted Earl Russell's reply to this. Hear, now, the ministerial champion, to whom the defence of the Cabinet policy has been so often confided in the columns of the Times. In his letter on Mr. Seward's despatch relative to the Trent affair, "Historicus" says:—

Now, if all that Mr. Seward here means is that the right of search may be exercised by a belligerent, whatever may be the destination or point of departure of the neutral ship, he is unquestionably right; but if he intends to assert that the neutral destination of the ship has no effect on the question of contraband, he is just as undoubtedly wrong. In a question of contraband, the destination of the ship is everything. Going to a belligerent port, some goods may be and some may not be contraband. But, going bonâ fide to a neutral port, no goods are, or can be treated, as contraband.

And again, in a further letter on the same subject, the same writer speaks yet more strongly, and especially refers to repeated detentions and seizures. The reader will be struck with the perfect applicability of his remarks to the cases of the Peterhoff and Dolphin.

The great and practical danger of the fallacious reasonings of Mr. Seward consists in this, that they would serve to justify, and may be taken to encourage, the captain of the Tuscarora to seize the Dover packet-boat, and carry her into New York for adjudication, in case Messrs. Mason and Slidell should take a through ticket from London to Paris. If the principles of the American despatch are sustainable at all the Dover packet would be unquestionably liable to seizure, and ultimately liable to confiscation. Now, I venture most confidently to affirm that a captain of a man-of-war who should, without any reasonable or probable cause for doubt as to the neutral destination of a merchant vessel, repeatedly detain and carry that vessel before a prize court for adjudication, as a vehicle of contraband, would commit a gross breach of international comity which would properly become the subject of diplomatic complaint. That such a vessel cannot be charged with the unlawful carriage of contraband, whatever may be her cargo, is a point of international law so clearly settled and so universally established that no nation can be permitted to treat it as a doubtful matter.

If—which it is impossible to conceive—an American prize court should have exhibited an ignorance or a contempt of law equal to that displayed in Mr. Seward's despatch, and condemned the vessel, so gross a violation of the settled principles of the law of nations by the tribunal appointed to guard its sanctions would have been in itself a justifiable cause of war.

It is only in doubtful or suspicious cases that a captain of a man-of-war can be justified in the detention and capture of a vessel, even though he should afterwards submit the question to the adjudication of a prize court. The compensation which such a court can award, may be very inadequate to the mischief which has been done by an act of vexatious and causeless molestation. The great maritime nations of England and France cannot afford to have the leading principles of international law confounded by the loose inaccuracies of Mr. Seward. They cannot suffer their trade to be embarrassed, and their interests compromised by the American navy acting upon instructions of which every line is a blunder. No time should be lost in putting forth an official protest, which shall re-assert the true doctrines of maritime law in opposition to this most foolish performance; for otherwise, with Seward for teachers, and Wilkeses for pupils, there is no saying how soon we may not have another "Trent affair" on our hands.

It is needless to point out the parallel which must be evident to the most careless reader. But while upon this subject of belligerent and neutral rights, it may not be amiss to make some further extracts from this writer, who assuredly cannot be suspected of any partisanship with the South, and who, especially in his later letters, has scarcely cared to disguise his earnest sympathies for the Federal cause. The extracts refer to the construction of the Foreign Enlistment Act, the sale of contraband to belligerents, and the fitting out of steamers, &c. The views of "Historicus," supposed to be, at least at the time of their expression, the views of the Cabinet, are peculiarly interesting on these points at this time, when it is announced in the newspapers that the Alexandra has been exchequered for a violation of the law, and when it is a matter of notoriety that a systematic espionage has been organised by no less a person than her Majesty's Home Secretary, to watch the movements of alleged Confederate agents in Liverpool. On page 124 of the "Letters of Historicus," now collected and published in book-form, he says:—

I unhesitatingly assert that the trade in contraband with either belligerent or private persons of the neutral State, within the neutral territory, is a lawful trade; that it is not the duty of a neutral Government to prohibit such a trade within its own territory; and that the belligerent State can have no ground of complaint against the neutral Government in respect of such trade. That it is the transportation to the belligerent territory, and not the sale in the neutral territory, of contraband which constitutes an offence against the belligerent; and that, even for this offence, the belligerent can have no recourse against the neutral Government, which is in no wise bound to interpose, but must rely for his remedy on the capture of the contraband in transitu. It is a discreditable thing to the state of international science that it should be necessary, at the present time, to cite authority in support of propositions so elementary, and which ought to be beyond the possibility of dispute.

On page 169:—

To equip and to arm a vessel of war within the United Kingdom, is not, per se, an offence against the statute; it is the equipping and arming, with intent to commit hostilities against a foreign Government, which constitutes the misdemeanor. The act is directed, not against the "cauponantes bellum," but against the "belligerentes." The mere sale or equipment for sale, of a vessel, is in itself no evidence of such an intent, which must be proved conclusively upon some better grounds.

Again, in the same place:—

A subject of the Crown may sell a ship of war, as he may sell a musket, to either belligerent, with impunity; nay, he may even despatch it for sale to the belligerent port. But he may not take part in the overt act of making war upon a people with which his sovereign is at peace. The purview of the Foreign Enlistment Act is to prohibit a breach of allegiance on the part of the subject against his own sovereign, not to prevent transactions in contraband with the belligerent. Its object is to prohibit private war, not to restrain private commerce.

And, having proved conclusively, by reference to decisions of the American Supreme Court, as well as Presidential Messages, that this is the theory as well as the unvarying practice of the United States also; having referred to the fact that during the Crimean War, Belgium supplied Russia with munitions of war without France or England feeling themselves justified to complain of it as a violation of neutrality, "Historicus" further enforces his position with a most valuable quotation of Mr. Canning's opinion, as stated in Parliament by Mr. Huskisson. The quotation is important, as showing the intentions of the framers of the "Foreign Enlistment Act," and is conclusive as to the English law and policy on this subject. Its reiteration and approval by the Ministerial advocate would seem to indicate that the present Cabinet still consider that law and that policy unchanged, and if so, it is difficult to imagine what offence a vessel in process of construction could have committed to warrant her summary condemnation, and what necessity there is for resorting to a system of secret police, so repugnant to English ideas, as Sir G. Grey's Liverpool espionage. Mr. Huskisson, in the debate on the Terceira affair in 1830, cites the opinion of Mr. Canning to the following effect:—

"Arms may leave this country as a matter of merchandise, and however strong the general inconvenience, the law cannot interfere to stop them. It is only when the elements of armaments are combined that they come within the provisions of the law, and if that combination does not take place till they have left this country, we have no right to interfere with them." These are the words of Mr. Canning, who extended the doctrine to steam vessels and yachts that might afterwards be converted into vessels of war, and they appeared quite consistent with the law of nations. At the very moment he was speaking, arms and clothing were about to be sent out of this country to belligerents. Were they to be stopped, or were they to be followed and brought back? He believed the answer would be, no; and if it were yes, of what use, he would ask, would be our skill in building ships, manufacturing arms, and preparing instruments of war, if equally to sell them to all belligerents were a breach of neutrality?—"Hansard," vol. xxiv., p. 209.

Mr. Adams's Commercial Licenses.

The Government of President Lincoln has done all things ill; but it has done nothing worse than its appointments. Official patronage was never so grossly, absurdly, wickedly misused by responsible statesmen. Most of its selections have been scandalous; nearly all of them have been foolish; all, with one or two rare exceptions, have been unfortunate. It was of extreme importance that the army should be well commanded. Every General who showed courage and capacity, or merely military experience, has been either removed, like McDowell, McClellan, and Burnside, or kept in a subordinate position, like Sigel and Rosencranz; while high commands have been bestowed on electioneering intriguers, adventurous attorneys, or broken-down gamblers. It was of extreme importance to foster as much as possible, if not a Unionist feeling, yet a sense of security under Federal rule in the South; and therefore the General appointed to the government of the first and most important Southern city captured by the invaders should have been an honest man, a strict disciplinarian towards his troops, and a conciliatory and cautious administrator of martial law in an enemy's country. Yet the government of New Orleans was bestowed on a man whose name will go down to posterity as more infamous than that of Haynau;—a thief, a blackguard, and a bully, devoid alike of military and civil virtues; who in a year of rule has realized a fortune for himself, and achieved for his country the intense hatred of Louisiana, and the execration and contempt of Europe. It was a matter of moment to avoid a quarrel with England; and the command of the squadron appointed to watch English ports and overhaul English merchantmen was given to an officer notorious only for an outrage to the English flag, which had left his Government no choice but between submission and war. It was necessary that the representatives of the United States in Europe should be quiet, cautious, conciliatory gentlemen; and the embassy to Russia, with a roving commission to declaim against England, was bestowed first on Cassius M. Clay, and then on Cameron, neither of whom is quiet, cautious, or a gentleman. It was desirable that the Northern cause should be well represented in the English press; and the person appointed to that duty was the unhappy monomaniac Train. Nearly every appointment, from the highest to the humblest, has been filled by a man morally unworthy and intellectually unequal to fill it.

We had thought, however, that the Embassy at the Court of St. James's was an exception. Mr. Adams had a very difficult duty to fulfil. He had to be the mouthpiece of Mr. Seward's falsehood and misrepresentation, without forfeiting the personal respect of the English Government. He had to utter the insolence of his chief without provoking a quarrel, or adding to the enmity excited against his country the further mischief of personal hostility towards her representative. He had to urge upon the Foreign-office views of international law notoriously unsound and often absolutely ridiculous, and yet not bring himself into personal contempt. He had to defend conduct which would admit of no defence; to palliate affronts which were calculated to excite England to fury; to gloss over intolerable insults; to explain away the most palpable and unmistakeable menaces; to press countless charges which he could not substantiate, and which were often upon their very face absurd and untenable. Worst of all, in a country exceedingly jealous of espionage, and specially of foreign espionage, he had to keep a constant watch on the actions of the Confederates and of their friends, from the fitting out of a gunboat to a private meeting at a friendly table. He did all this; he is doing it now; and we considered that he had done his work with an aptitude which proved him the right man in the right place. To be the tool of a Seward, and yet not provoke the manifest disgust and contempt of a Palmerston and a Russell; to be the spokesman of American violence, bombast, and menace, and yet not be personally disliked in England; to do the work of a spy, and yet maintain the character of a gentleman—this we thought an achievement which proved Mr. Adams's title to the highest rank in the diplomatic service of his country. He had done something to prevent the war which his Government had done so much to provoke; he had tried to soften the indiscretions of Mr. Seward, and he had committed no exasperating indiscretions on his own account. But we must say that his last act seems to us exceedingly indiscreet and very exasperating. It was not meant to provoke anybody; perhaps it was not intended to become publicly known. Possibly Mr. Adams thought that it would do good; that it would indicate a disposition on his own part to avert collisions and smooth over difficulties. But if he did think so, he was guilty of a strange miscalculation. In granting a certificate intended to operate as a passport to a British ship between two neutral ports, he was assuming for himself a responsibility for, and a power over the lawless captures made by his countrymen which will involve him in personal unpopularity; and he was assuming for his country a right to do what England certainly cannot permit—to seize all British ships concerned in a trade which, though obnoxious to the feelings of the Federal Government, is strictly legitimate, unless they are authorized by Charles Francis Adams, acting for and on behalf of the President of the United States, to carry on that trade. He was claiming a jurisdiction over the high seas, the very last pretension which this country will tolerate; and he was exercising that jurisdiction in the case of a British ship, and while he himself is actually enjoying the hospitality of Great Britain. It is a blunder; the blunder perhaps of a well-meaning man, generally cautious and conciliatory, but still a strange and serious mistake, which never could have been committed by the Minister of any Power but that quarrelsome and aggressive Republic which never remembers that she is but one, and not the chief, among a family of nations having equal rights and privileges, and that she must not expect others to bear from her what she would not allow them to inflict. Neither England, France, nor Russia would ever dream of granting a license to an American ship to sail from New York to a country with which the licenser is at peace; or a certificate that, in so doing, she has no unfriendly intentions towards his Government. Only a minister accustomed to see and hear insolence and menace lavished on foreign Governments, and a tone assumed towards them which would not be tolerated from them, could have imagined that he could be allowed to grant a permit to one British vessel to carry on a lawful trade, and thereby virtually declare that trade unlawful to others.

A story is current as to the intentions and freighting of the vessel licensed by Mr. Adams, which, if true, exhibits his blunder in a still more striking light. It is said that she is laden with arms and munitions of war, intended for the use of the Mexican army against the French. Now, it is plain that if this be the case, she stands in exactly the same position as if she were bound for an unblockaded Confederate port, except that it is the right of the French, and not of the Federal cruisers, to intercept her. Mr. Adams has frequently, and somewhat petulantly complained that the English Government allows the shipment of arms and munitions of war from England to Southern ports. He has been told—and it is very strange that he should need telling—that the Government cannot interfere with such shipments; that they involve no breach of neutrality, and no violation of our or of any other municipal law; that neutrals have a right, at their own risk, and on peril of capture and confiscation, to make such shipments; and that if we were to interfere with the sale of arms to the Confederate States, while allowing them to be shipped to New York, we should be guilty of a violation of our duties as a neutral Power. Still the Federal Ambassador has persevered in his complaints; taking the ground that such shipments are, in point of fact, acts of hostility towards the North. Now we find him pronouncing such shipments, made to aid the Mexicans against the French, perfectly lawful. Of course, they are so, in the one case as in the other. They are lawful, so far as we are concerned; they are unlawful, in so far that they subject the ship and cargo to confiscation, if seized by a cruiser. But we have our doubts as to the legality of the Ambassador's share in the transaction. It is no breach of neutrality for a private citizen to send arms and ammunition to a belligerent. If a Government do so, it is an act of war against the other belligerent. It may be questioned whether, by lending his name and authority to a shipment of arms to Mexico—if such shipment be intended, Mr. Adams may not have given the French Government a right to make formal complaint of his conduct at Washington.

We ought to notice that the Federal envoy has used language concerning other transactions of British shippers which is certainly impertinent, and in the sense in which it is probably intended is false. He speaks of "fraudulent" shipments to Matamoras. Now, if he meant to speak of ships which have sailed from England nominally for a Mexican, but really for a Confederate port, this term, though ill-chosen and wantonly offensive, might be allowed to pass in silence. But it is tolerably certain that he refers to cases in which cargoes of warlike stores destined for transfer to the Texan side of the frontier have been shipped for Matamoras, and in such cases the term "fraudulent" is not merely offensive and impertinent, but altogether untrue. As the Federal cruisers, acting under distinct instructions from Mr. Welles, have chosen to behave as Mr. Adams thinks fit to speak, and to treat such ventures as fraudulent,—and as our Government seems disposed to allow this view to prevail, it may be worth our while to remind our readers that the Federal Government has no more right to seize such cargoes between London and Matamoras than between Birmingham and London. They are not contraband of war. They cannot be so; for there can be no contraband of war except on board a vessel bound for an enemy's port. The future destination of ship or cargo are of no consequence. It may be intended that both should be sold to the enemy; nevertheless, while on their way to a neutral port, they are free. The past history of either is of no consequence; a ship that has run the blockade of Charleston nine times over is not liable to be captured on a tenth voyage between London and Liverpool, or between Liverpool and Bermuda. All trade between neutral ports, whatever its purpose, is equally lawful; the conveyance of arms and ammunition from Liverpool to Nassau is as legitimate a business as the conveyance of coffee from Jamaica to Liverpool; and the seizure of a vessel laden with arms which is really and bonâ fide bound for Nassau from Liverpool is as great an outrage as would be the seizure of the packet-boat between Dover and Calais. And the abuse of the right of search with a view to prevent—by the penalty of arrest, detention, and trial—the trade between this country and Matamoras or the Bahamas, is an offence of precisely the same character as would be the attempt similarly to suppress our trade with Hamburg or with Bombay. The seizure of a vessel really bound for Matamoras by Federal cruisers is a piratical outrage; and in granting safe-conducts to particular vessels bound for that port, Mr. Adams puts himself in the position of the Highland cateran, who, for blackmail or other consideration, undertook to protect particular estates from the depredations of his clansmen and neighbours.

Confederate States' Executive Documents.

We conclude, to-day, the publication of the Official Report of the Secretary of War, the first part of which appeared in our impression of the 9th of April. The English reader cannot fail to be favourably impressed with the genuine manliness of this document, the absence of all bluster or boastful promises, the frankness with which it exposes sores and suggests the appropriate remedies. A nation, like an individual, which does not shrink from truth, whether in telling or in hearing it, gives the highest proof of solid strength. The Majority Report of the Committee of the Confederate House of Representatives on a resolution to recall the Commissioners and dismiss the Foreign Consuls resident in the Confederacy, will also be read with much interest. It shows that, though the Executive is firm in resisting such a measure, and continues allowing such consuls of foreign countries as have Exequaturs of a date anterior to the war, to exercise their functions, the popular feeling is evidently strong in favour of allowing such privileges only to nations which reciprocate them to the Consular Agents of the Confederacy. As is usual in American State papers, this difference of opinion occasions a certain acerbity of tone, to which no undue significance should be attached. It is quite probable that if diplomatic recognition is much longer delayed, some such arrangement as that contemplated by the Committee may be agreed to by foreign nations. This species of consular recognition has, it appears, been already accorded by one of the smallest of European sovereignties, the Duchy of Saxe-Coburg.

Of the other Executive Documents published by order of the Confederate Congress, which are not of sufficient interest here to warrant reproduction in extenso, we content ourselves with a synopsis.

The report of the Hon. John H. Reagan, Postmaster-General, is very elaborate, and affords conclusive evidence that the war, whilst putting a stop to foreign commerce, has not restricted internal communication. On the 30th June last—the report is dated Richmond, 12th January, 1863, but refers to the year ending June 30th, 1862—there were in the Confederate States, not including Kentucky and Missouri, 8,613 post-offices; and the post routes in operation were 95,577 miles in length, of which 8,266 miles were by railroad, and 87,311 miles were by other routes. What an odd comment are such facts on Mr. Seward's intimation to M. Drouyn de Lhuys, that the people of the Confederate States are merely “an insurrectionary party, which is located and is chiefly adjacent to the shores of the Gulf of Mexico.”

The Confederate States' Post-office has not yet been a paying concern, and so far from yielding a revenue to the national coffers, it has been a considerable charge on the Treasury. The receipts for the year ending June 30, 1862, were $1,911,189, and the expenditure for the same period was $2,924,290, leaving, with $13,542 excess of expenditure for the month of June, a total excess of expenditure of $1,056,644. This difference had been provided for by grants amounting to $1,739,450, which had been voted to meet the estimated deficiency. These grants left an excess of revenue and grants of $682,806, and Mr. Reagan accounts for the discrepancy between the estimated and the actual deficiency by the increased rates of the Confederate postage, his calculations of income being based on those of the United States. The return of receipts and expenditure is, notwithstanding the deficiency of revenue, gratifying and encouraging. Mr. Reagan compares the actual receipts and expenditure for the last fiscal year, under the Government of the United States, with the first fiscal year under the Government of the Confederate States, and he finds that under the latter the receipts were $393,648 more, and the expenditure $1,371,956 less. That is, the Post-office in the Southern States exhibits a financial improvement of $1,765,604 under the Confederate Government. Mr. Reagan estimates that the deficiency for the year ending June 30th, 1863, will be $1,465,079, but that is more than covered by appropriations already made by Congress.

There is, in connection with the deficiency of the Post-office revenue, an important issue involved. According to a provision of the Constitution the expenses of the department are to be defrayed out of its own revenues after the 1st of March last. Mr. Reagan urges upon Congress to devise some means of aiding the department, or the service must be reduced, and this cannot be done without depriving portions of the country of necessary mail facilities. The only way of meeting the difficulty is to increase the revenue, and the Postmaster-General suggests some means for so doing. He recommends that there shall be a uniform rate of one cent on all newspapers weighing not more than three ounces; a very moderate charge, for notwithstanding the greater average distances newspapers are transmitted in the Confederate States than they are in England, in this country we charge 1d. for a newspaper not exceeding four ounces. Mr. Reagan also suggests—and we heartily approve of the suggestion, both for its equity and expediency—that the present system of allowing newspapers to exchange with each other through the agency of the post without payment, should be done away with, and that newspaper exchanges should be paid for at the same rate as newspapers posted to private persons. Whilst admitting the usefulness of the press, Mr. Reagan cannot perceive any reason why it is to be fostered at the expense of other industrial pursuits. And he further observes that the free postage is a species of subsidy by act of Congress, yet there is no provision of the Constitution which authorizes the bestowal of such a subsidy. Possibly, if his advice is taken, there will be some limitation of unimportant exchanges; and even if it be so, this slight inconvenience, which can be remedied at a trifling cost, will be amply repaid by the independence of the press, we do not say of Government patronage, for there is no patronage where all share alike, but of its constituents. Mr. Reagan estimates that these changes will bring in a revenue of $30,000 or $70,000 per annum. The amount is small, but the suggestions are politically significant. The Confederate Government must have the most implicit confidence in the noble independence and exalted patriotism of the press and people, or it would not, in the midst of a great war, propose such changes. No European nation has ever done so under analogous circumstances.

Before passing to another document we may observe that out of the total annual receipts for postage—$1,994,729, the sum of $692,075 was prepaid by stamps. Collectors of postage stamps may, therefore, be assured that as soon as the blockade is raised, they will have no difficulty in procuring Confederate postage stamps for their albums.

The report of the Hon. T. H. Watts, Confederate States Attorney-General, is, unlike most documents emanating from legal functionaries, distinguished for its brevity. He reminds the President that the legal organization of the Indian territories is not completed. He urgently pleads for the prompt organization of the Supreme Court. Mr. Watts calls attention to a difference between the provisions of the Constitution and the legislation of Congress. According to the Constitution of the Confederate States “every law, or resolution having the force of law, shall relate to but one subject, and that shall be expressed in the title.” The object of this provision is to prevent laws being passed by Congress unawares, to prevent what we know in this country as bill smuggling; but however good the object, the regulation presents some difficulties in practice. Two instances are cited in the report before us. One is that of an Act entitled “An Act regulating the fees of marshals, and for other purposes,” and this Act provides for the appointment of criers, and regulates the compensation of criers, jurors, and witnesses. The other case is analogous. Mr. Watts wishes to know what is to be the consequence of such a departure from a clause of the Constitution. “If the law passed embraces more subjects than one, or, if the subject of it be not expressed in the title, what is to be the consequence? Is the whole law thereby to become void? Is the enactment on the first subject named to be alone held valid?—or is the last, or any other named? If more than one subject be embraced, and but one is expressed in the title, which part of the law is then to be considered valid?” No doubt Congress must obey the injunctions of the Constitution, or its acts will be invalid; but though it is a written Constitution the spirit must not be sacrificed to the letter. It would be unlawful for the Confederate Congress to follow the example of the British Parliament in tacking bills together, but we hardly think that the Supreme Court of the Confederate States will rule that the law is violated that provides for the fees of marshals because it also provides for the appointment of criers, for the two provisions relate to one subject. We imagine Mr. Watts dwelt on this matter for the purpose of indirectly showing the great need of a Supreme Court.

Appended to that of the Attorney-General is the report of Mr. G. E. W. Nelson, the Superintendent of Public Printing. The charges in his department seem to us wonderfully moderate. The cost for the Printing of Congress and the several Executive Departments from February 22nd to December 31st, 1862, was $126,218; and yet the War Department had as many as 4,470,960 blanks, and the various Departments had 1,056 ruled blank books. The total cost of Printing for the Provisional Government was $103,814. As it may be surmised from these statements, the expenditure of the Government is anything but lavish; and we have, in Mr. Nelson's report, a curious instance of the rigid economy that is practised, and which we commend to the notice of our House of Commons' economists. Mr. Nelson says, “It is the almost invariable practice of printers, when a large order for blanks is received, to put in type two or more forms, but to charge composition upon one only. Presswork is then charged as if one blank only were worked off at a single impression, when the fact is that two or more are produced. To make the matter more plain, let us suppose that the composition upon a single form be 2,000 ems. At seventy cents per 1,000 ems (the price fixed by law) it would only amount to one dollar and forty cents, whilst the presswork on 10,000 copies (if that many were ordered) at seventy cents per token, would amount to twenty-eight dollars. Now, if composition on two forms were charged (and in the case to which I allude two forms would be set up), is it not palpable that two blanks are printed at one impression, and that, instead of the presswork footing up twenty-eight dollars, it would be but fourteen—a clear saving of twelve dollars and sixty cents.” These and similar trade regulations Mr. Nelson refused to comply with, because, after a careful consideration of the law, he was convinced that the intention was to pay for the work actually performed, and for that only. The Southerners are not only better soldiers, but shrewder men of business than the self-sufficient Yankees thought they were.

Mr. Nelson refers to the high price of paper, which hinders him from making contracts for future deliveries. Confederate made paper has advanced 100 per cent., whilst foreign paper has advanced from 250 to 500 per cent. If the blockade is continued long enough the Southerners will learn how to produce superior paper, and will be able to compete with the European makers.

Mr. Rufus R. Rhodes, the Commissioner of Patents, has had more work to do than might have been supposed. The number of applications in 1862 was 147, and 64 caveats and 75 patents were issued. The list of patents has naturally a very warlike aspect. There are, for example, seven patents for marine batteries and vessels of war, and twenty patents for improvements in firearms and projectiles. But war has not put an end to the pursuits of peace. There are six patents for agricultural implements, and five for cleaning and preparing cotton. Some of the inventions—such as those for tanning,—for a machine for making shoe pegs,—for wooden soled shoes, and for wooden bottom shoes—were no doubt suggested by the exigencies caused by the blockade. The Yankees have thus lost the monopoly of making wooden shoe pegs, and the only consolation we can offer them is that the Confederates will never interfere with the New England trade in wooden nutmegs.

The report of the Hon. S. S. Scott, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, has mainly reference to a visit that he made to the Indians, in consequence of a rumour that there were some indications of disloyalty to their treaty engagements with the Confederate States. Mr. Scott was, owing to the difficulty in some places of procuring suitable transportation, upwards of a month in travelling from Richmond to the Indian territory; and we mention this to show that the benign and considerate treatment of the Indian is not a war measure, but the settled policy of the Confederate States: for the Indians being so distant cannot exert any influence upon the present struggle. Mr. Scott found the Choctaws had remained perfectly loyal to the Confederate Government; that the Chickasaws had lost forty families who had deserted to the enemy; and that the Seminoles, Creeks, and Cherokees had lost about half their people in the same way. Mr. Scott had no trouble in confirming the loyalty of the Indians; for their sympathies are Southern from association, and from similarity of institutions, the Indians being slave-holders. The Confederate States allow the Indian nations to be represented in Congress by delegates, and they have established law courts in the Indian territories, so that the Indians can have justice administered to them at home. The Indian nations have regular governments, and certainly pay great attention to the formalities of government. The General Council of the Choctaw nation passed two resolutions, the one expressing confidence in the good faith of the Confederate States, and the other gratefully acknowledging the visit of Mr. Scott; and these resolutions are signed by "B. L. Leflore, Speaker of the House;" "B. Harrison, President of the Senate;" "Samuel Garland, Principal Chief of the Choctaw Nation," and countersigned by "James Riley, National Secretary." Such precision would charm the most inveterate red-tapist in Europe. It is popularly, but erroneously, supposed that the American Indian is a kind of wild negro; with the exception of a few tribes, they are a high-spirited and superior race.

From this notice of the Confederate States' Executive Documents, it will be seen that the Confederate Government, although its existence is diplomatically ignored, is actively and peacefully fulfilling all the vast and important functions that appertain to it, just as completely as the English, and more completely than the United States' Government is doing. For the Richmond Government, unlike the Washington Government, is able to carry on the war without concealing the truth and making false statements; without robbing the community to buy the support of fraudulent contractors; without gagging, and much less attempting to bribe the press; and without destroying the liberties and rights of the people.

The Budget of 1863.

Whether the theme be attractive or the reverse, a discourse by Mr. Gladstone is sure to delight both those who hear it, and those who read it. There was, therefore, no doubt about the Budget speech being a success. If the eager crowd that waited on Thursday last for eight hours to hear the Chancellor of the Exchequer make his financial statement had been told by him that their taxes were to be forthwith doubled, they would still have found it difficult to comply with that very proper rule of the House of Commons which forbids strangers, under divers pains and penalties, to indulge in any manifestation of approval. In the first place, one of Mr. Gladstone's budget speeches is an oratorical treat that no one thinks dear at any price while it lasts; and then Mr. Gladstone has the happy faculty of convincing tax-payers that he never dips his hand into their pockets except to save them from present trouble and to increase their riches in the future. But though the speech could not fail to find favour, there seemed a prospect of the Budget offending all sorts and conditions of people. Mr. Gladstone had a surplus to deal with, and we ventured to predict that in the disposal thereof he would inevitably make more enemies than friends. We must confess we were wrong. As far as we know, the budget is everywhere pronounced good. The merchants are conciliated by the repeal of some stamp duties which were more trouble than profit, and this graceful concession of taxes lately devised and imposed by the present Chancellor of the Exchequer is a proof that he is not so wedded to his own schemes as to ignore the lessons of experience. The reduction of the duty on tea is to the greatest tea-drinking community in the world a general boon, which is not the less agreeable because, by increasing the consumption of the commodity, it will probably not entail any permanent loss to the revenue. The 2d. in the pound off the income tax is, of course, approved of as a just and expedient measure, and the new scale of assessment for small incomes is an equitable arrangement, and one that will do away with the temptation to evade the payment of the impost. With the income tax, as with the excise on spirits, an excessive demand inevitably leads to fraud, especially as cheating the Government is not regarded as dishonest, for those who send conscience money to the Chancellor of the Exchequer are, instead of being applauded for so doing, derided for their folly.

The least important of the proposed changes is compelling clubs to take out a license to sell wines and spirits. This will delight the ultra-radicals, and it is but fair that these lean and hungry creatures should participate in the Budget feast, though the portion assigned to them is a bare bone. Altogether Mr. Gladstone has managed to satisfy everybody. He has divided his apple so as to give many claimants a slice. The only criticism of the Conservatives is, that he has taken some hints from their programme, but we need hardly remark it is not condemnation, but strong approbation to say, "You have done what we recommended you to do." Indeed, the Opposition has acknowledged the soundness of the Budget with very commendable frankness.

The Budget of 1863 is, considering the surrounding circumstances, extraordinary. Other nations are adding to their indebtedness or to their taxation. Our market is full of foreign Serip. The late United States, heretofore so prosperous and solvent, are getting into debt at a rate that no European State has ever done. At this juncture the Chancellor of the Exchequer is able to remit and decrease our taxation. And this is still more surprising when we look to the actual condition of the country. Europe is unsettled, the Federal American Government is threatening us with hostilities, and we are therefore obliged to be fully prepared for war at any moment. Our staple industry is paralyzed, and a considerable source of income is cut off by the pauperism of Lancashire. Ireland, that a few years ago was supposed to be on the road to riches, is now so steeped in poverty and misery that the Chancellor of the Exchequer admitted that the reports of Irish distress are not exaggerated. Now, if in the face of the loss of our cotton trade; of the starvation in Lancashire, of the distress in Ireland, and of the stern necessity for keeping our army and navy on a war footing, Mr. Gladstone had announced a deficiency of two or three millions, and a consequent increase of taxation, it would have been thought a natural consequence of the troubles that have come upon us, and of the provision we are obliged to make for contingent troubles. That we have a disposable surplus shows the greatness of our resources, but, at the same time, reflects the highest credit on Mr. Gladstone. The refusal to acknowledge the merit of the Minister by saying that the flourishing condition of our finances is due to the wealth of the country, and not to his management, would be equally absurd and ungenerous. Of course, if he had not straw he could not make bricks. It is not the business of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to create wealth, but to make the best use of the means afforded him by the natural riches of the country and the energy of the people. This Mr. Gladstone has done, and the Budget of 1863 is a certificate of his ability for finance, of which his friends may well be proud, and of which his political opponents do not, and cannot, dispute the validity.

London Criminal Returns for 1862.

The annual statement of the Metropolitan Police has lately been issued, and some of the returns deserve and will repay consideration. There is a proverb that a policeman is never to be found when he is wanted, and the inference is that the police are neither very vigilant nor very serviceable. We must hold that this opinion is unfounded, and that the Metropolitan police are vigilant and of great service, seeing that during the last year they took into custody 45,317 males, and 22,970 females, being together 68,287 persons, or upwards of 1,300 per week. It is evident then that "X 10" has other work besides wearing out his heavy regulation boots, and paying his addresses to the kindly disposed cooks on his beat.

When we inquire what became of the 68,287 persons taken into custody in 1862, we find some apparent cause for supposing that the police are over-vigilant, or that they give too much heed to those who are reckless in breaking the ninth commandment. The magistrates discharged 31,771 persons, or nearly one-half of those arrested by the police. Many of them were drunken cases, which were formerly dismissed by the inspectors; and many others were trivial offences, which the police, having a due regard for public order, could not leave unnoticed, but which were sufficiently punished by a few hours' incarceration in the police cell and by an appearance before the magistrate. But making a liberal allowance for drunken and frivolous cases, there was a large number of persons taken into custody upon mere suspicion or upon false accusation; yet it is notorious that the police are exceedingly careful in taking a charge, and very often refuse to do so. Either this discretionary power must be continued and extended, or some other means must be devised to check the propensity for giving into custody under the influence of passion, or from a vague suspicion that So-and-so stole the purse because it is gone and somebody must have stolen it.

Of the 36,516 persons who were not discharged from custody, no less than 32,894 were summarily convicted, or held to bail by the magistrates. That is, eight out of nine cases were adjudicated without the intervention of a jury. But we must not, therefore, conclude that the magistrates are irresponsible judges, for they are perpetually at the bar of public opinion. Their proceedings are watched by lynx-eyed reporters; and if they are guilty of the slightest indiscretion, it is denounced in the newspapers by indignant letters and caustic leaders. The complaints of metropolitan magisterial decisions are, however, very few—whilst the county magistrates, or, as they are called, the "great unpaid," are periodically abused.

We have in Table 5 of the Metropolitan Criminal Returns, conclusive evidence of the discretion of the Metropolitan Magistrates. They committed for trial 3,622 persons. Of these, 2,936 were convicted and sentenced, 573 were acquitted; 113 were not prosecuted, or true bills were not found by the grand jury. Five out of six of the committed were found guilty, and such a result gives some colour to the oft-repeated complaint of those whose applications and accusations are rejected, that the magistrates are so anxious about their reputation that they will not commit for trial, except upon such evidence as cannot always be procured at the earlier stages of an inquiry, and that, consequently, many guilty persons escape punishment. This, at all events, is a fault that leans to virtue's side, for it is better the guilty should go scot free than that the innocent should suffer imprisonment during the term that must intervene between the committal and the trial. For example, eleven persons were taken into custody on the charge of murder. Of these five were discharged by the magistrates, and of the six committed for trial two were acquitted. We are bound to assume the innocence of those who were acquitted of the capital charge, and what then can compensate them for the terrible ordeal they had to pass through? Would it not have been deplorable if it had also been the fate of the five discharged by the magistrates?

A table showing the degree of instruction of the persons taken into custody is very suggestive. Of the 68,287 persons,— 17,674 could neither read nor write.

47,624 could read only, or read and write imperfectly.
2,916 could read and write well.
73 were of superior education.

In connection with this part of the subject, a return of the occupations of the persons taken into custody will prove instructive. Of the 63,287, not less than 43,033 were of no trade or occupation, and 10,801 were labourers,—that is, unskilled labourers. Perhaps if every child, male and female, were taught an industrial art, more good would be done than by teaching to read and write imperfectly. Of the 22,970 females taken into custody, 20,599 were of no occupation. How can we wonder at the growth of immorality, and the continued development of crime?

Although the police are evidently vigilant there is reason for supposing that the force ought to be increased. It will always happen that many crimes are not brought under the notice of the police, but we submit that something more than a small percentage of crimes known to the police ought to be traced and punished. In 1862 the total number of felonies committed in the Metropolitan police district was 15,752, and the loss of property by them was £65,552. The number of persons tried and convicted for felony was 2,688. Now, assuming that only one person was concerned in each felony (which is far from being the case), we still find that even when the robbery is placed in the hands of the police, the chances of escaping detection are seven to one. The amount of property recovered by the police was £15,988, and the total loss was £49,564—a result which leaves the thieves an encouraging margin of profit. As we are just now getting rather tired of trying to cure criminals, perhaps it would be as well to see what can be done in the way of prevention, and the only plan we know of is to make crime unprofitable and dangerous, by making detection and punishment swift and certain.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE CONFEDERATE SECRETARY OF WAR.

The subjoined completes the official report of the Confederate Secretary of War, the first portion of which, reviewing the conduct and events of the war, appeared in our impression of the 9th of April:—

Pursuant to another Act of Congress, approved October 11, 1862, in each city, county, parish, or district in the several States, a place of rendezvous for persons enrolled is established, where they are examined by surgeons, and in each Congressional District a board of three surgeons is appointed to make the examinations aforesaid. It has not been found practicable to spare from the service of the armies and hospitals a sufficient number of Confederate surgeons to constitute these, but at least one in each district will be associated with local surgeons of repute for the duty, and the effort will be made to prevent, by exchanges with other districts, surgeons of any particular county from officiating on the conscripts therefrom. In at least each county or city an enrolling officer is expected to act, and he is instructed to enrol all not of the exempted classes, between the specified ages of eighteen and forty, so that those who have evaded or been neglected in former enrolments, and the number startlingly large of soldiers who, on one pretence or another, are avoiding service, as well as those embraced by your late call, may be subjected to duty.

In the enforcement of these laws of conscription, the department is constrained to be inflexible, and even appear harsh. The sacrifices exacted for service are painfully realized, but they are felt to be imperatively demanded for the public safety. The exemptions, though far more liberal in the last than the former act, still affect comparatively few, and those of certain limited classes, while the exempting power vested in your discretion seems to contemplate only individual cases of persons who ought to be exonerated "on account of justice, equity or necessity." In considering the character of the classes exempted, it is evident that Congress contemplated the enumeration of all of the prescribed ages, whose offices or functions seemed more essential to the public weal at home than in the service. The principle of the bill is, therefore, that the whole necessary operations of society and business can and must be done by the exempts, and those above and below the prescribed ages, while all other white males, capable of bearing arms, shall be in the armies of the Confederacy, for the sacred duty of public defence.

This principle the department rigidly applies, with but few inconsiderable exceptions of the clearest equity or necessity. An impression has strangely prevailed, that the exemptions prescribed by the act availed, as well to discharge from the army, as to exonerate from the call of conscription. For this no foundation can be found in the law, while the earnest aim clearly expressed in the first act to retain the army as absolutely essential, as well as the general phraseology of the law, excludes such construction. The whole scope and operation of the second act apply exclusively to those to be subjected to the expected call of the President, and the act of exemption, passed to limit and define it, can, of course, have no wider stretch. The very term exemption implies freedom from a call to be made, not discharge from existing service. It is well, too, in every view, that such is the only reasonable construction of the act, for a more mischievous mode could hardly have been devised to weaken and dissatisfy the army, than to have made the grounds of exemption causes of discharge. Apart from the inevitable loss in numbers to the army, it could not be expected that the soldiers not embraced seeing comrades equally capable of service discharged on such grounds, as, for instance, that they had plantations with twenty slaves without other male adult on them, or because of their addition to special mechanical, mining, or manufacturing pursuits, would not feel the gravest discontent and indignation. Demoralization, if not more disastrous effects, must inevitably have ensued.

There are certain classes of officers and employes, not exactly engaged in State or Confederate service, yet so important in their public ministry, such as the officers and police of cities, firemen, superintendents of water or gas works, and the like, and others again essential to corporations private in interest, but highly important to the transaction of general business, or to works of public benevolence, such as the officers and clerks of express companies, of leading banks, evangelical societies, and similar institutions, to whom it might be advisable to extend the privilege of exemption.

The classes of tradesmen or mechanics exonerated in deference to the peculiar needs of society, might also be enlarged.

There are, too, in the Confederacy, districts of not very fertile country, where the citizens are generally in moderate circumstances, and have few or no slaves. The draft on them of all the males between eighteen and forty will probably remove their labouring classes to such an extent as to endanger scarcity and even destitution among the remainder. Some relaxation of the law, graduating the number to be conscribed in proportion to the deficiency of slave labour in any county or district, would be both equitable and judicious.

One of the exemptions of the act, that which "to secure the proper police of the country" exempts "one person on each plantation of twenty negroes, on which there is no white male adult not liable to military duty," has caused, in many portions of the Confederacy, dissatisfaction and complaint. This has been, in some instances, from invidiously regarding the slaves merely as property, and not as a servile class to be controlled from considerations of general safety, in others from regarding the slaves only as helpless dependents to be cared for and directed. The claim has been asserted that similar privilege of exemption should at least be accorded to those who had many helpless children or females dependent solely on their care or labour. The latter view would alone seem entitled to consideration.

It would probably relieve the law from much odium, and yet promote only equity and the public good, if where, as in cases not unfrequently presented, eight or ten helpless whites are dependent on one male friend within the prescribed ages, exemption should be accorded by law.

It will be observed you have not yet exhausted your power of call. The faithful execution of that mode it is confidently hoped will dispense with the need of further draft on those, who from their age are apt to be, by their larger ties and interests, most essential to society. Our armies may thus be adequately recruited and maintained at the maximum required by their organizations. More need scarce be desired.

The organization of the army has been advanced by the appointment, under the act of Congress, of seven Lieutenant Generals. They were all Major Generals, and selected for approved skill, conduct, and experience. They are all now in active service, some commanding separate departments, and others heading army corps under a general in the field. Major and Brigadier Generals in requisite numbers to meet the exigencies of the service, have been appointed and assigned. The policy of organizing the brigades with troops and generals from the several States, has been pursued, and as opportunities offer, without detriment to the service, will be carried out. The greater satisfaction of the men from each State, when collected together, the generous emulation for glory to their State, and the fair apportionment of officers assured to each State according to its contribution of defenders to the country, will, it is hoped, overbalance the inconvenience of separating regiments or companies previously associated, and the liability to State jealousies. The policy will be persisted in to a full trial of its merits.

The military courts authorized at the last session of Congress have been constituted. In making the appointments while qualifications were first considered, preference among the applicants was, as far as the range of choice allowed, given to those who had been wounded or disabled in service. These tribunals supply a need much felt by our commanders in the field. The necessity of frequent courts-martial causes much embarrassment and many delays. Without them now the prompt administration of the military law may be secured, desertion and straggling checked, licence of all kinds restrained, and temperance, discipline and subordination advanced.

The various branches of special service heretofore established have proved judicious and worked generally well.

The battalion of sharpshooters attached to each brigade has done much to restore our superiority as marksmen, which had begun to be endangered by the guns of long range and constant practice therewith, of our less skilful adversaries. On many occasions their efficiency, as well as the valour of these battalions, have been strikingly exhibited, and they are now regarded as almost a necessity to a proper organization.

The appointments of artillery officers for ordnance service, and of engineers, have as yet been made only in part. Boards, however, have been constituted for the examination of candidates, and are required to hold their sessions in different parts of the Confederacy, so as to afford similar facilities of access to those at a distance from the capital. Some sessions have been held and reports have been made, assigning the order of merit in which the successful candidates have passed. It is the purpose of the department, when these lists have been completed, to make the appointments from them, and as justice and implied faith seem to demand, to give priority in commission according to the reported grades of qualification.

The engineer officers already appointed and acting, have proved most efficient aides, as well in field operations as in local works and defences. They have had, however, no special corps of men, but only such as, when occasion required, were detailed for the special service. It may be well doubted whether a company or two in each brigade should not be specially devoted to engineering work, and be exclusively commanded by engineer officers. Greater skill and efficiency could not fail to be attained by the men so employed, while the inconveniences which often arise from the delay in special details and the occasional controversies arising between the officers in command of the detailed men and the engineer officers guiding their operations would be avoided. In connection with such a corps, a company of pioneers and pontooners armed only with revolvers and sabres, but carrying some effective tool, such as an axe, a pick, or a spade, might be advantageously constituted, under the command of an engineer officer. One detachment of them might precede each brigade in its march, smoothing the roads and bridging the small streams, while another should accompany the trains, prepared to remove impediments, or give prompt assistance in case of accidents. The celerity of army movements, on which often great results depend, would be sensibly increased by such an arrangement.

The officers for ordnance service, as far as appointments have been made, have rendered the distribution of munitions and the supply of arms and artillery more regular and complete, and have, at the same time, promoted economy in consumption, care in preservation, and greater efficiency in their use.

The signal corps has been filled and organized, and is now in effective operation. It justifies the expectations entertained of its utility, and contributes materially to the despatch of orders, the transmission of intelligence, and the general safety of the army.

The policy of organizing corps of Partisan Rangers has not been approved by experience. The permanency of their engagements and their consequent inability to disband and reassemble at call, precludes their usefulness as mere guerillas, while the comparative independence of their military relations, and the peculiar rewards allowed them for captures, induce much licence and many irregularities. They have not unfrequently excited more odium and done more damage with friends than enemies. The men composing them would be more useful in the regular organizations, and while the department has been reluctant to disband them, it avoids raising more, and endeavours to persuade and promote the conversion of existing corps into similar bodies in the line of the Provisional Army.

The principle now applicable to nearly all the regimental and company organizations, of promotion by seniority, and of election in the lowest grade only, is believed to have given more satisfaction than did that of general election. A feeling of greater security and more professional pride is engendered, and stronger inducements are presented to all subordinate officers to improve and prepare themselves for higher positions. Still in an army where a large proportion of the officers have had no previous military training or experience, due assurance cannot be felt of the competency of those on whom promotion may, by this rule, be cast. A provision against gross incompetency is, indeed, made by the authority conferred by Act of Congress for the convening of a board to determine qualifications; but resort to this remedy is naturally odious, and in practice it proves but little efficacious. It is not to be denied, too, that promotion by seniority alone represses ambitious aspirations, and the spirit of enterprise and daring which promotion by merit inspires. Some recognition of this, and desire to avoid its effects, have been manifested by the enactments of Congress allowing promotions to be made by the President in cases of distinguished skill and valour, but save in the rare case where recommendation of extraordinary merit is given by the commanding general, such appointments can only be made to a vacancy in the company, battalion, or regiment to which the party is attached. Besides, where promotion by seniority is the almost invariable rule, the exercise of this appointing power becomes odious, is construed into injustice to all the inferior officers of the special organization, and breeds discontent and dissension. In consequence, it is very rarely exercised, and the injurious effects of promotion by seniority alone are not by this provision effectively counteracted. It is suggested that some beneficial effects in inspiring to deeds of valour and the display of extraordinary merit, would result from confining election to the lowest grade (the starting point on the road to honours) to those, if any were in the company, who had been recommended by their commanders for distinguished skill and valour. This would not deprive the company of the privilege of election, but would confine the choice among the most worthy. Still the higher and more important grades would be supplied only by seniority, and, with deference, it is recommended, that some mode be devised by the wisdom of Congress to have vacancies of that class more frequently the rewards of high deeds and superior qualifications. This is the more necessary since the commissions of officers in the provisional army being dependent on the continuance of their organizations, some of the most valuable in the service have been thrown out by the dissolution or disbanding of their companies or regiments, when, often through their own gallantry, too much reduced for service. Under the present system, however meritorious or efficient, there is no place for them in the line, and they can only be replaced in the army by conscription as privates. This is scarce less unjust than impolitic. Some provision should be adopted by which such officers should retain their commissions, or the privilege of appointment to vacancies which they are eminently fitted to fill should be accorded to them. The hardships to the officers in such cases, together with reluctance to lose their services, has sometimes induced generals in command, particularly in the more distant departments, to assign such officers temporarily to vacancies, for which the officers entitled by seniority were known to be less competent, or to special duties. An embarrassment results. The officers, in some cases, after a long service, find that they have lost their commissions by the previous disbanding of their commands, and can neither be recognised nor receive their pay as officers. Some appropriation to meet such cases, and provide compensation at least for the period of their actual service, should be provided.

In this connection another interesting class of cases deserves passing notice. It has repeatedly happened that officers who have raised companies or regiments, or who have been passed over by a State with their commands to the Confederate service, after joining some of our armies, but before their muster rolls have been duly returned, or notice properly given to the Adjutant-General, have been captured, or had their commands broken up and dispersed by the enemy. Some, in such cases, have pined long in prison, others have served in assigned commands for months, and when either exchanged, or led to apply for recognition and pay as officers, have found no authority in the department to allow either. Several cases like these of peculiar hardship occurred among the officers of the Louisiana State troops transferred to the Confederate service, who were either captured or dispersed after the fall of New Orleans. It is recommended that whenever their imprisonment or service as officers can be satisfactorily established, payment to them be authorized by law.

Measures to afford adequate supplies of ordnance, arms and munitions for the army have claimed the earnest attention of the department. The increased stringency of the blockade by the enemy, while it has made the importation of sufficient supplies more difficult and costly, has at the same time induced more energetic efforts to find and develop all internal resources. The results so far are very encouraging. Our present supplies are at least as abundant as they have been at any time past, and our prospects for the future more promising. Two establishments, in addition to the leading one heretofore existing at this city, for making ordnance have been founded in interior towns under the auspices of the department, one of which is already in successful operation, and the other will be in a very short time. Besides these, some smaller establishments have been fostered and engaged in similar work. Thus the serious anxiety which resulted from dependance on a single establishment, liable to be interrupted by casualties or the chances of war, has been removed, and a larger provision secured for future supplies. Of small arms, the department can now furnish stores more adequate to the requirements of the army than at any preceding date, while of munitions it entertains now no dread of deficiency. In these particulars also, by the encouragement and establishment of manufactures within the Confederacy, the department is daily becoming less dependent on foreign supply, and it indulges the hope that it will, at no remote period, be able to dispense altogether with that reliance. In this connection, it would be injustice not to refer to the efficient aid which has been rendered by the Nitre Bureau, which is charged with much more general operations than its name would indicate. The most serious embarrassment to be apprehended, in reference to the ordnance supplies, is in the deficiency of iron. Before the war, nearly all iron works within the States of the Confederacy had languished or decayed, and from the sense of precariousness in the future, and the scarcity of suitable labour, it has been very difficult to establish them in sufficient numbers, and on an adequate scale to meet the necessities of the war. It has been necessary that the department should stimulate enterprise by large advances and liberal contracts, and likewise contribute by details to the supply of labour. Many new furnaces have been established, and those in operation have been enlarged and tempted to continue more uninterruptedly in blast. If the contracts made with the department are only fully carried out, it is believed the supply will prove adequate, but there are many difficulties in the prosecution of the work from the enhancement of all prices, and from the temptations constantly offered to contractors to prefer the superior profits which they can command by supplying the general market. In some instances the department has had no alternative but to resort to impressment to enforce the fulfilment of its contracts or to supply its pressing necessities.

Embarrassments of the like nature have affected the operations of the Quartermaster and Subsistence Departments. For some of the leading articles required by the former, reliance has necessarily been placed to a considerable extent on foreign supplies, since they are not adequately furnished within the Confederate States. This has been specially the case with woollens and leather, and under the losses and interruptions caused by the blockade, there have been at times rather scant supplies of blankets, shoes, and some other articles of clothing. Still, by using to the utmost internal resources, by the establishment of factories and the organization of workshops, and by greater economy in use, the army has never been allowed seriously to suffer. Of late greater success has attended importations, and besides, contracts for supplies have been made on liberal terms to so large an extent that security is now felt of timely and abundant provision. To attain a result so indispensable to the comfort and preservation of our gallant armies, the department will spare no exertion or sacrifice.

For due supplies of forage and subsistence, reliance has been placed on the productions and resources of the Confederacy alone, and so far they have proved abundant. They are, however, more affected by the peculiar circumstances of the country. The harvests of the past season have not generally proved propitious, and notwithstanding the much larger breadth of land devoted to the culture of cereals and forage, the product in many extensive districts of the Confederacy is below the average and in some even threatens scarcity. The cost and want of transportation make difficult the collection, distribution, and equalization of such products. In addition, the ravages of war, prosecuted by our malignant enemies in shameful violation of all civilized usage for the ends of rapine or destruction, have desolated considerable districts of fertile country. The districts thus devastated have been, too, mainly those which have heretofore afforded the largest supplies of meat. The rearing of animals for food has been since the war very generally increased throughout the Confederacy, and from other districts larger supplies than heretofore may be expected. Still the scarcity of grain and forage must check considerably this increased production, and render adequate supplies for the future more doubtful. A yet graver cause renders the procurement of the supplies that exist difficult. The redundant issue of Treasury notes, which the needs of the Treasury have made inevitable, by inflating the currency far beyond the wants of the country for a circulating medium, has caused a great enhancement of all prices, and inspired a general and inordinate spirit of speculation. As the cause of enhancement has been and must be continuous, being the necessary issue of Treasury notes, so the increase in prices has been, and without check from legislation must be, steadily progressive. This is so understood or has been so experienced by all classes, that there is the strongest repugnance on the part of all having necessary supplies to sell, to part with them even at the exaggerated current rates, from the conviction that a longer holding will assure still higher prices. This motive is so influential and general, that it is next to impossible to supply the necessities of the Government at fair prices, or by voluntary contracts.

Resort to the power of impressment has become an absolute necessity for the support of our armies. It is a power of great delicacy, liable to perversion and abuse, and should be surrounded by every safeguard of equity consistent with its exercise. The sanction and regulation of the power, by law, is earnestly recommended to the early consideration of Congress. By controlling the transportation on the railroads some judicial general system, and the due regulation and exercise of the power of impressment, the evils referred to may, in a measure, be remedied, and the supplies absolutely essential may be commanded. But it is not to be disguised that a more complete remedy is desirable, and that it can only be found in the regulation of the currency, the cessation of inflation, and the consequent reduction of prices to a more stable standing. This more appropriately pertains to the province of the Treasury Department, by the able head of which it will doubtless be fully presented. As, however, the War Department is the great consumer, and most prejudiced by this evil, it may be pardonable to say, that there is but one radical remedy. That is easy and simple. It is by legislation to limit the negotiability of the Treasury notes, so that there shall never be outstanding, at any one time, more than the maximum required for the circulation of the Confederacy.

The estimates of the several bureaux of this Department for the period ending June 30th, 1863, are herewith submitted. They will be found to be large, but not larger, it is believed, than the exigencies of the service require.

An interesting report, from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, is herewith submitted. During the past summer, there were among the tribes in the Indian country some agitations and disturbances, which threatened internal conflicts, and a possible outbreak upon the contiguous States. They have, however, been happily appeased, and there is every reason now to expect tranquillity among themselves, and their amity and alliance with the Confederate States.

From the preceding imperfect review may be found assurances of the increasing power, means and resources of the Confederacy for the successful prosecution of the war. We have room, too, for gratulation at the firmness, unity and self-devotion of our people, and the skill and valour of our generals and soldiers, and much cause of devout gratitude to the God of battles for the signal triumphs vouchsafed over the hosts of our malignant foes.

Nor can I conclude without commemorating another glorious victory that has just given added cause of thankfulness and rejoicing. General Lee and his noble command have, at Fredericksburg, hurled back in dismay, and with frightful slaughter, the grand army of invasion, engaged for the fourth time in the vain task of conquering our capital. They had sacked and desolated the town, one of the most respectable of the State, with rapacity and brutality that would have disgraced savages, and it was made the appropriate scene of their retribution, for its streets were piled with their dead and wounded. From the face of the avengers they slunk away amid storm and darkness, leaving to our gallant army the assurance of acknowledged superiority, and affording to all a bright augury of their future total expulsion from our soil.

Such happy result will likewise be advanced by the renewed gallant repulse of the enemy's combined attack by land and water on Vicksburg, and by the decided victory of General Bragg and his brave command, which, on the 31st ultimo, crowned the triumphs of the year. Scarcely less hopeful assurance is afforded by the indecisive and bloody struggle of the 2nd instant, which, while resulting in the temporary retirement of General Bragg's forces to a better line of defence, inflicted such grievous losses on the enemy as to leave his army too shattered and dismayed to follow.

Respectfully submitted,

JAMES A. SEDDON, Secretary of War.

ON THE RECALL OF THE CONFEDERATE COMMISSIONERS AND THE DISMISSAL OF FOREIGN CONSULS.

MAJORITY REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS OF THE CONFEDERATE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

TO WHOM WAS REFERRED THE FOLLOWING RESOLUTION:—

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be instructed to inquire into the propriety of requesting the President of the Confederate States to recall the Commissioners sent by this Government to certain European States, and to notify all Foreign Powers whose consuls reside in the Confederate States, and are accredited to the Government of the United States, that such persons will not be recognized by the Government of the Confederate States as exercising any of the powers or having any of the functions of Consuls within the limits of the Confederate States, unless appointed by their respective Governments as Consuls to the Confederate States of America; beg leave to report, that in the absence of any reference to Foreign Affairs in the message of the President, on the opening of Congress, and without access to the archives of the State Department, your Committee deemed it due to the importance of the subject submitted to them, and respectful to the House, by whom they were charged with its examination, to report that they were uninformed on the matter before them, and to request the Executive, by a resolution of the House, to communicate to Congress such facts regarding the number and character of our foreign agents as could be made known, without detriment to the public service.

The House accordingly adopted the following resolution of inquiry:—

Resolved, That the President be respectfully requested to communicate to the House, if not incompatible with the public interest, the number and names of all persons engaged in the service of the Confederate States in foreign countries, either as diplomatic, consular, or commercial agents, or in any other capacity, stating the places to which they have been sent, the date of their appointment, the salaries they receive, the duties they are expected to discharge, and how far such agents have been officially or otherwise recognised by any Foreign Government; also, what are the number and character of foreign agents, whether consular, commercial, or other, known to our Government, representing in any capacity Foreign Governments, within the limits of the Confederate States, and whether, in communicating with this Government they do so under an exequatur from our Government or that of the United States; also whether said agents are subordinate or subject to the control and direction in any way, and to what degree, of the ministers of their respective countries accredited to and residing in the United States; and the President be further requested to communicate such instructions as may have been given to our Foreign Agents and such correspondence as may have been had with other Governments, either through the Secretary of State or our Commissioners abroad, as will aid Congress in its legislation regarding Foreign nations, and their citizens residing in our midst."

To this resolution on the 16th inst., the following response was received from the State Department, and referred to the Committee:—

CONFEDERATE STATES OF AMERICA,
Department of State, Richmond, Sept. 15, 1862.

The Secretary of State, to whom was referred a certain resolution of the House of Representatives, adopted on the 1st inst., has the honour to report to the President:—

That it would be impossible to communicate to the House without very great detriment to the public interest "the number and names of all persons engaged in the service of the Confederate States in Foreign countries, either as diplomatic, consular, or commercial agents, or in any other capacity, stating the places to which they have been sent, the date of their appointment, the salaries they receive, the duties they are expected to discharge." It is presumed that the House is acquainted with the particulars called for in the foregoing extract from the resolution, so far as diplomatic agents are concerned, but a tabular statement marked A, hereto annexed, may prove convenient for reference. During the pendency of hostilities, the very objects for which other than diplomatic agents have been sent abroad, would be exposed to defeat by divulging the details called for in the resolution, and these objects are of great national importance.

The resolution further inquires how far the agents aforesaid "have been officially or otherwise recognised by any Foreign Government." The extracts of the correspondence of the department hereto annexed, marked B, furnish the only information on this subject contained in official communications.

The resolution further inquires as to "the number and character of Foreign agents, whether consular, commercial, or other, known to our Government, representing in any capacity Foreign Governments, within the limits of the Confederate States, and whether in communicating with the Government they do so under an exequatur from our own Government or that of the United States."

The annexed list, marked C, shows the names of the only agents of Foreign Governments known by the department within the limits of the Confederate States. All of these agents except one had been recognised by the Government of the United States by exequatur as the duly authorized agents of the Foreign Governments by which they were respectively appointed, at a period antecedent to that when the several Confederate States revoked the power previously delegated to the United States, and under which the Government of the United States controlled the relations, whether diplomatic or commercial, which grew up between those States and Foreign countries. According to well-recognised principles both of public and private law, these agents of foreign Governments having been recognised as such by the agent of the several Confederate States, prior to the revocation of the powers delegated to that agent, remained so recognised after the revocation.

It was, and is undoubtedly within the power of this Government, as it is within that of all Governments, to decline permitting the above-mentioned agents to remain within our limits, but for obvious reasons the exercise of such a power has been deemed unwise and impolitic.

The one agent who is excepted from these remarks, is Ernst Raven, Esq., who was appointed Consul for the State of Texas, by His Highness, the Duke of Saxe Coburg and Gotha, and who applied to this Government for an exequatur, on the 30th of July, 1861, which was issued to him on the 21st of August, 1861.

It is proper to add that a short time ago it came accidentally to the knowledge of the Department, that a certain Baron de Saint Andre had assumed the functions of Consul or Consular Agent, for the French Government, at the port of Charleston, since the establishment of the Confederate Government, and without applying for an exequatur to this Department. But just at a time when this information was received, intelligence was also received that Baron Saint Andre had left Charleston, with his family, for the United States, with the probable intention of returning in the autumn. In the event of such return, proper action will be promptly taken by the department to repress the offensive assumption of consular functions by a foreign agent without the sanction of this Government.

The resolution further inquires, whether said agents "are subordinate or subject to the control and direction in any way and to what degree of the ministers of their respective countries accredited and residing in the United States." The Department has no information on this subject, but it is thought not improbable that the instructions sent by foreign Governments to their Consular Agents within the Confederacy are transmitted through diplomatic agents residing in Washington. It is not thought probable that the foreign consuls within the Confederacy are under the control and direction of foreign ministers accredited to the United States in any other manner than is above indicated, but no positive information on the subject has reached the Department. It is known to the Department, that the foreign Consuls within the Confederacy communicate with their Governments in Europe by sending despatches to the care of the Ministers of their respective Governments residing in Washington, and the Department has thus been enabled on different occasions to cause correct information to reach foreign countries on matters which it was highly important to the public interest should be widely disseminated and properly understood.

The resolution of the House further requests the President "to communicate such instructions as may have been given to our foreign agents, and such correspondence as may have been had with other Governments, either through the Secretary of State or our Commissioners abroad, as will aid Congress in its legislation, regarding foreign nations and their citizens residing in our midst."

The accompanying document, marked B, contains all the communications called for, not hitherto submitted to Congress, except such as cannot, for the present, be divulged without injury to the public service.

Respectfully submitted,

J. P. BENJAMIN, Secretary of State.

To the PRESIDENT.

Your Committee have examined carefully this letter of the Secretary of State, with the documents accompanying it, and are not prepared, upon the data furnished, to recommend either the adoption or rejection of the original proposition submitted to them, and without entering at large into the reasons that have induced this conclusion, state briefly, that the facts communicated are so limited and of such a character as to have aided them but little in their investigation. They consist simply of a statement already known to the country of the names of our Commissioners and their Secretaries abroad, with some extracts from their correspondence and instructions from the State Department, accompanied by an incomplete list of the agents of foreign Governments residing in our midst. Your Committee are well assured that it was not the desire of the House to trench in any manner upon the province of the Senate as the Constitutional advisers of the Executive in matters relating to foreign affairs, by the adoption of its resolution of inquiry; nor is there any disposition to complain of the Executive exercising a just discretion in withholding the communication of such facts in relation to foreign affairs, and our secret agents abroad, as he may deem it detrimental to the public interest to make. Your Committee feel, however, that as the recognition of our independence by foreign powers has not yet been secured nor our foreign relations established with other Governments, and as it is by virtue of direct legislation on the subject, and not merely of a constitutional provision, the President has felt himself authorized to send Commissioners and commercial agents abroad, and as Congress has before it for legislation matters affecting our commercial relations with other Governments, and the security of the rights of our citizens abroad, and those of foreigners in our midst, this House in no way transcends its powers when it seeks of the Executive, through the proper channel, a knowledge not only of the number and names of our diplomatic agents; but also a statement of the fact, whether consular or commercial agents have been sent abroad, and if so, to what countries; and whether they have been permitted by the Governments to which they have been sent to exercise the customary powers of such agents, or have been forced to forego entirely the discharge of the very important duties pertaining to such appointments, and made to occupy the character of extraordinary or special or secret agents. The necessity of such information is apparent to the discussion of the resolution before the House, in its twofold character:—First, whether it would be politic to recall our Commissioners sent to European States; and second, whether it would be wise to refuse to recognise the consular agents of other Governments, openly exercising their privileges in our midst, under an exequatur from a Government with which we are at war.

Without further remark upon the reserve of the State Department on this subject, your Committee will merely add that they are not allowed to be ignorant of the fact made known by the published official correspondence of foreign Governments and the debates in the British Parliament, that some such agents of our Government in some capacity, either consular or commercial, do exist abroad; but of their number or the countries to which they have been sent, or the powers they are permitted to exercise, your Committee are ignorant, and the communication of the Secretary of State gives no information on the subject. We are, however, incidentally made aware of the fact that a regular correspondence is carried on between the Consuls of Foreign powers, residing in our midst, and the ministers of those powers, accredited and residing at Washington, through a regular established channel of communication, which the United States Government has succeeded in inducing those powers, notwithstanding the remonstrances of our Secretary of State, to close effectually against all correspondence of our Government with its agents abroad. It is also made known by the communication from the State Department that one of our Commissioners, Mr. Rost, has resigned his position, and that, before doing so, he submitted to the President whether it was consistent with our self-respect and the dignity of the country, "to keep longer abroad Commissioners who are under no circumstances to be received or listened to."

Another, Mr. Mason, dated June 23rd, writes:—"I have conferred frequently and freely with Mr. Slidell on the expediency of making a renewed request to the Governments of France and England or to either for recognition of our independence, and I am happy to say that a cordial understanding exists between us to act independently or simultaneously as our joint judgments may approve. My own strong conviction is that it will be unwise, if not unbecoming in the attitude of the ministry here to make such a request now, unless it were presented as a demand of right, and, if refused, as I little doubt it would be, to follow the refusal by a note stating that I did not consider it compatible with the dignity of my Government, and, perhaps, with my own self-respect, to remain any longer in England, but should retire to the Continent to await the further instructions of the Government there. I do not mean to say that I contemplate such an immediate step, but only if the demand be made and refused, to remain longer in England, as the representative of the Government, would seem to acknowledge the position of a suppliant; and, therefore, the step is not to be taken without the most grave and mature deliberation. I have earnestly consulted the judicious and enlightened friends here among the public men, who are earnestly with us, and they advise against a renewed demand at present, whilst they admit it might place me under such necessity."

Our other Commissioners express themselves less decidedly, but no one of them seems to anticipate our early recognition, although all unite in the expression of the confident belief, that had it not been for the fall of New Orleans, with the consequent loss of the Mississippi river, we would have been before this recognized by foreign powers.

Your Committee, in conclusion, repeat that without recommending either the adoption or rejection of the resolution submitted to them they are of the opinion that it would be, under present circumstances, unwise for the House to advise the immediate recall of our Commissioners, uninformed, as it is, what other agents of communication with foreign powers would remain to us abroad, or what may be the possible effect of recent events upon the disposition or policy of foreign Governments; nor would they recommend the dismissal from our midst of the Consuls of foreign nations, except in the event of their persisting to discharge their duties under exequaturs of the Government of the United States, without any reciprocal right of consular protection being extended to our citizens visiting or residing and owning property in the countries they represent.

THE CONFEDERATE CONGRESS.

THE SENATE, MARCH 9.

NATURALIZATION OF FOREIGNERS.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, introduced the following bill:—

To be entitled, "An Act to repeal the Naturalization Laws."

Sec. 1. The Congress of the Confederate States of America do enact, That all laws and parts of laws for the naturalization of foreigners, and for securing to them the rights of citizens of the Confederate States of America, be and the same are hereby repealed; excepting those laws passed by the Provisional Congress, which provided for the naturalization of persons enlisted in the armies or engaged in the naval service of the Confederate States of America during the existing war with the United States of America.

Sec. 2. No person of foreign birth, who was not a citizen of the Confederate States at the time of the inauguration of the permanent Government of the Confederate States, shall be allowed to vote for any officer, civil or political, State or Confederate, unless he has voluntarily and faithfully served in the armies or navies of the Confederate States during the existing war, and has been naturalized in accordance with the provisions of the act, approved August 22nd, 1861, entitled "An Act to establish a uniform rule of naturalization for persons enlisted in the armies of the Confederate States of America," or of an act approved December 24th, 1861, entitled "An Act to amend an act, entitled, an Act to establish a uniform rule of naturalization for persons enlisted in the armies of the Confederate States of America."

On the 11th of March, Mr. Hill, of Georgia, from the Judiciary Committee, reported back the bill to repeal the naturalization laws, with an amendment, and with the recommendation that it pass.

The amendment of the committee was to strike out the second section of the bill.

The bill was placed upon the calendar.

SEATS FOR CABINET MINISTERS IN THE SENATE.

The bill to grant to the principal officer in each of the executive departments a seat upon the floor of Congress, as amended, came up as unfinished business.

The following is the bill as amended by the Judiciary Committee:—"That the principal officer in each of the executive departments of the Confederate Government shall be entitled to a seat upon the floor of the Senate, subject to such rules as now exist, or may hereafter be adopted by the Senate, with the privilege of discussing any measures appertaining to his department.—Mr. Sparrow moved to amend, by inserting after the Senate when first occurring, the words "during the present Congress." The amendment was agreed to.—Mr. Haynes moved to amend by striking out the words "with the privilege of discussing any measures appertaining to his department."—Mr. Clark, of Missouri, spoke against the bill. It had been asserted that the admission of ministers to participate in legislative debate had worked well in England. That that was no argument why the custom should be adopted here, Mr. Clark undertook to show, from the difference in the institutions of the two countries. He would not have it understood that in opposing the bill he did so through any ill feeling towards either the President or either of the Secretaries. Such was not the case.—Mr. Oldham, of Texas, opposed the bill. The disadvantages of admitting the minister to participate in the debates had been seen in the Provisional Congress. Scarcely a single measure then advocated by either of the ministers had been defeated. The measure would endanger the independence of Congress.—Mr. Wigfall said the words proposed to be struck out by the amendment of Mr. Haynes were a transcript of the language of the Constitution. If the amendment were adopted it would amount to a destruction of the bill. He had introduced the bill because he believed that the ministers, being present in Congress, could make many valuable suggestions on questions pertaining to the respective departments which would facilitate wise legislation, and that the ministers themselves would also receive many edifying suggestions. From an interchange of opinions the Government would be made more efficient. If the bill should pass, and the ministers will take seats in Congress, we would have no more inefficient men in either of the offices. No man would be appointed by the President who could not comprehend and understand the policy and views of the Executive. Ministers would thereafter be men of a high grade of ability.—Mr. Orr said that in the times of Washington the President's Messages were delivered in person, and he frequently took his cabinet ministers into Congress with him. The practice was relinquished on account of its inconvenience, and he had no doubt, should the bill pass, that ministers would absent themselves upon the ground that the press of business in their department would not allow them time to be present during the sessions of Congress. He however hoped the bill would pass; that ministers would not excuse themselves from attending. Much legislation would not have been omitted if means of information had been at hand, such as would be afforded by the presence in Congress of the ministers.—Mr. Yancey said he agreed with the Senator from Texas, (Mr. Wigfall) that the measure would have the effect of bringing into the Cabinet men of great ability. Great dialecticians and men cunning at intellectual fence would be put into those offices to enable them to carry through Congress the plans of the Executive, and the more superior these men were the greater would be their advantage over Senators. It was a very dangerous bill and ought to be rejected.—Mr. Orr, of South Carolina, said the Senator from Alabama had said that experience of this measure in the Provisional Congress had proved a failure, and cited as an example that more vetoes were put upon bills passed by that Congress than under the permanent Government. It should be borne in mind that the Provisional Congress consisted but of one House. There was no Senate, as at present, and this, no doubt, would account for the number of bills passed by it which the President had found it proper to veto. He would like to have the Secretary there in the Senate chamber to demand of him why he had dared to disregard the will of the Senate in such or such a matter. It would have a most salutary influence to have him there and look right into his eye while putting these interrogatories.—Mr. Hill thought the measure had worked well in the Provisional Congress. He had there seen information obtained in fifteen minutes which could not be obtained in this Congress in a month.—Mr. Hayes said he had offered the amendment to test the question whether the bill would pass. He called the question. The ayes and noes were demanded on the question.—Mr. Johnson, of Arkansas, spoke at length in opposition to the bill.

The question being taken, Mr. Haynes's amendment was agreed to by yeas 14, nays 8.—Mr. Sparrow said that as the adoption of the amendment had virtually defeated the bill, he would move to postpone the subject indefinitely. The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MARCH 11.

Mr. Conrad, of Louisiana, introduced the following

RESOLUTIONS RELATIVE TO A RESTORATION OF PEACE.

Whereas, The present administration of the United States, by its reckless disregard of all constitutional restraints, by its persistent efforts to subvert the social institutions of these States, and the ferocious war which it is waging for that purpose has more than realized the worst apprehensions of our people, and fully justified their wisdom and foresight in averting, by a timely separation from the Union, the calamities which a longer continuance in it would have rendered inevitable; and whereas, a portion of the people of the United States have recently manifested their disapproval of the war, of the objects for which and the manner in which it is conducted, and their desire for its speedy termination, and several foreign Powers, notably the Government of France, have expressed a similar desire; now, therefore, the Congress of the Confederate States, deeply impressed with the conviction that it is their duty to leave no means untried to put an end to a contest injurious to the civilized world, and disastrous to the parties engaged; believing that its prolongation can only tend to embitter and perpetuate feelings of hostility between States which, however politically disunited, must ever be intimately connected by identity of race, of language, and of religion, and by the unalterable laws of geographical affinity, and of mutual demand and supply, deem the present time, when there is a momentary pause in the conflict, a suitable one to utter the words of peace. The Senate and House of Representatives of the Confederate States do therefore "Resolve, That they will cordially co-operate with the Executive in any measures it may adopt, consistent with the honour, the dignity and independence of these States, tending to a speedy restoration of peace with all or with any of the States of the Federal Union."

Referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

THE CONFEDERATE SENATE ON THE DURATION OF THE WAR.

The following interesting debate, eliciting the opinions of individual senators on the probable duration of the war, took place on Monday, March 9, in the Confederate Senate:—

Mr. Maxwell, of Florida, introduced the following preamble and resolutions:—

Whereas a strong impression prevails throughout the country that the war, now being waged against the people of the Confederate States, may terminate during the present year; and whereas this impression is leading many patriotic citizens to engage largely in the production of cotton and tobacco, which they would not otherwise do; and whereas, in the opinion of Congress, it is of the utmost importance, not only with a view to the proper subsistence of our armies, but for the interest and welfare of all the people, that the agricultural labour of the country should be employed chiefly in the production of a supply of food to meet every contingency; therefore,

Resolved by the Congress of the Confederate States of America, That it is the deliberate judgment of Congress, that the people of these States, while hoping for peace, should look to prolonged war, as the only condition proffered by the enemy, short of subjugation; that every preparation necessary to encounter such a war should be persisted in; and that the amplest supply of provisions for armies and people should be the first object of all agriculturists. Wherefore, it is earnestly recommended that the people, instead of planting cotton and tobacco, shall direct their agricultural labour mainly to the production of such crops as will ensure a sufficiency of food for all classes, and for every emergency, thereby with true patriotism subordinating the hope of gain to the certain good of the country.

Resolved, That the President is hereby requested to issue a proclamation to the people of these States, urging upon them the necessity of guarding against the great perils of a short crop of provisions, and setting forth such reasons therefore as his judgment may dictate.

Mr. Maxwell expressed the opinion that those persons who expected the olive branch of peace would be offered to us by our enemies, were very much mistaken. Foreign intervention may or may not come, but he did not look for it. The Emperor of the French may choose to stop where he has recently placed the question. In England Earl Derby, who had been regarded as friendly to the South, had recently presented some very lame reasons for a very decided opposition to the recognition of the Confederacy. Look where we will, we find nothing to justify our people in directing their labours to the production of any crops except those required for a condition of war—cruel, ruthless war. It was with a view of impressing this fact upon the people that he had submitted these resolutions.

Mr. Yancey, of Alabama, expressed his concurrence in the remarks of Mr. Maxwell. He hoped that the resolutions would be passed by an undivided vote, and that the roll would be called in order that each may record his vote. The enemy, this day, are more hopeful of success than they were six months ago; and one of the chief causes of this reviving hope is the condition of the country, as they deem it, with reference to provisions, and they are carrying on the war with that idea. As they advance, they are destroying agricultural implements, burning fences, barns, gin houses, crops, &c. This fact is significant as to one of the means they have for prosecuting the war.

In regard to our foreign relations, Mr. Yancey remarked that never at any time has there been as little prospect of Great Britain taking any action towards recognition. Both the Opposition and Ministerial party entertain similar views upon this question. We can do without recognition, and we can prosecute the war to a successful termination without it. Mr. Yancey closed by declaring that, in his opinion, every acre of land should be cultivated for provisions for man and beast. There should be no cotton.

Mr. Clark, of Mobile, approved of the resolutions. He had no doubt, as the Senator from Alabama had remarked, that the Federal Government entertain the belief that their prospects are better than they were six months ago. The action of the out-going Congress in clothing Lincoln with dictatorial powers indicated a purpose to prosecute the war to a ruthless extent. He believed that all the acts of that Congress would be submitted to—in the North-west as well as in other portions of the North. Our friends in the North-west, if we have any, are not numerous enough to resist the enforcement of those laws. It is a delusion to suppose that the feeling in that section against the Administration will ripen into a rebellion. He knew something of the people there, and believed that they would submit to the Conscription and other Acts of the out-going Congress.

In Missouri, no one is now allowed to plant unless he gives bond and security to be loyal to Lincoln, and those who do not comply are banished. This war is now in its full blaze, and we must rally all our energies, display the utmost confidence in our rulers, and not stop to inquire whether this is right or wrong in immaterial matters. He had full hope if the agriculturists will raise an ample supply of provisions, that before next autumn no foot-print of a Yankee Vandal will be found in the land.

The question was then put on the adoption of the preamble and resolutions, and was decided in the affirmative—every Senator voting aye, except Messrs. Johnson, of Georgia, and Peyton, of Mobile, who were absent.

COMMERCIAL UNION.

(From the Augusta [Georgia] Constitutionalist.)

The United States are becoming fruitful of schemes, both warlike and peaceful; and we are rather fearful that the latter may prove more dangerous to us than the former. The Administration and its adherents still regard war as the only mode. Its policy is to subjugate us—not to restore the Union, but to restore the authority of the United States over the territory it claims; and, failing in that, to acknowledge our independence, hoping to make some terms which shall benefit it commercially. A part of the Opposition still cling to the delusion of restoring the Union as it was—by arms. Another portion would have a cessation of hostilities, that peaceful means may be allowed to work, and that intercourse and business relations may gradually restore the original condition. Another meditates secession, to cast its fortunes with the Confederates in political and commercial union. And still another, despairing of any restoration of the old relations, would give us peace and political independence, with commercial union only. These things are strong indications that the great Northern mass is becoming convinced that it can never be victorious, but that it is still loth to give up the South and the advantages it has derived therefrom.

An opposition member of the House, Mr. Henry May, of Baltimore, and an Abolition Senator, Mr. Conway, of Kansas, it appears, have both introduced measures looking to a separate political independence, but to a commercial union of the Confederate and United States. Conway, to prevent the secession of the West, would at once acknowledge our independence, on the basis of a common tariff, free trade between the sections, and a united declaration against European interference in the affairs of this continent. Mr. May would have a cessation of hostilities, and the appointment of a commissioner to endeavour to restore the Union, but failing in that, to provide for the separation, not only of the Confederate States, but of any others which desire to secede, and to organize a system of commercial union among the whole, similar to the Zollverein among the German States, which he says is the plan suggested before his death by Judge Douglas. Both acknowledge that arms have failed, and must fail, either to conquer the South or restore the Union.

Half a loaf is better than no bread, thinks the North, and so, unable to retain the South in the same Government, she would fain endeavour to secure something from us. But will the Confederate States be so simple as to agree to the proposed commercial union? We have cheerfully given up the national glory and grandeur which pertained to us as a part of the old Union, and the national strength of that unity. To us really belonged the glory of arms and administration in the old Government—to the North mainly the honour of commerce, and of letters and arts, such as they were. Having renounced these, is there anything glittering or alluring to us in the idea of commercial union with the United States? Assuredly not. Nor does the North suppose there is. The offer is an offer of commercial bondage on our part, and it is the price for which the enemy proposes to give us peace and political independence. Now, if we were growing weaker and less able to defend ourselves; if it appeared almost impossible to gain our entire independence except by long-continued and great havoc—by a war protracted for years, with all its horrors and enormities, producing almost total exhaustion, and likely to result in loss of our agricultural supremacy, then we might be pardoned for inclining to accept half a loaf—political independence with commercial vassalage.

We ought to know instinctively that the North would make no proposition to us but for her own advantage; that she is not yet prepared for peace, except coupled with conditions injurious to us and our best interests. But we should learn also that any proposition looking to peace is evidence of the hopelessness of Northern arms. The United States are learning valuable lessons, learning them rapidly and well at the hands of Lee and Longstreet, Johnston and Bragg, and Beauregard. Surely none can doubt that commercial union between us and the North would result in lasting injury to us, perhaps would ultimately bring about that greatest of evils, political re-union. Then the question is, are we so much exhausted, so tired of the war, so doubtful of final victory, so fearful of a protracted struggle, so blind to the accumulating evidences of Northern division and weakness, that we will pay the price of commercial bondage, with its train of ills, for the sake merely of a separate nationality? Surely we cannot; but rather let the teaching of Lee and his generals be continued; let that powerful finishing school be kept in unabated vigour; let all the energies of the people, as speedily and powerfully as possible, be brought to bear on the Abolition hosts. And thus may we hope soon to bring the North to peace on our own terms. After peace and independence, the Confederate President and Senate can determine commercial and all other relations with the United States, or what remains of it.

CONFEDERATE FINANCIAL LEGISLATION.

The Charleston Courier, of the 24th of March, gives the following synopsis of the "Act to provide for the funding and further issue of Treasury Notes," which had passed both Houses of the Confederate Congress:—

1. All Treasury Notes not bearing interest, issued previous to 1st of December last, shall be fundable in 8 per cent. bonds or stock until 22nd April, 1863; thereafter, until 1st August next, in 7 per cents., and thereafter shall be no longer fundable at the pleasure of the holder, but be receivable in payment of public dues, except the export duty on cotton, and payable six months after the ratification of a treaty of peace. Notes issued after 1st December last, and within ten days after the passage of this Act, shall be fundable in 7 per cents. until 1st August next; thereafter shall be fundable only in 4 per cent. bonds. All such notes not funded shall be receivable, &c., as aforesaid. All call certificates outstanding on 1st July next, shall, after that date, be deemed to be bonds, bearing 6 per cent. interest.

2. Authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to issue, monthly, amount of notes, not exceeding fifty millions of dollars, fundable within six months from date of issue, in 6 per cent. bonds; thereafter in 4 per cent. bonds.

3. Notes fundable in 6 per cent. bonds may be converted into call certificates bearing 5 per cent. per annum; and, if not reconverted within six months, shall be exchanged for a 6 per cent. bond. Notes fundable in 4 per cent. bonds may be converted, at any time, into call certificates, bearing 4 per cent. interest, until reconverted or paid.

4. All bonds or stock issued under this Act to be payable not less than thirty years after date, but shall be redeemable five years after date, at pleasure of the Government.

5. Authorizes the purchase of Treasury notes bearing no interest issued after passage of this Act until whole amount in circulation shall not exceed $175,000,000.

6. The notes shall be of any denomination not less than $5, now authorized by law.

7. Authorizes an increased issue of $1 and $2 notes, and also an issue of fifty cent. notes, not fundable.

8. Authorizes the sale of 6 per cent. bonds at par for Treasury notes issued since December 1 to such of the Confederate States as may desire to purchase the same, or the sale of such bonds when guaranteed by any State to an amount not exceeding $200,000,000. Also authorizes the sale, at par, of $100,000,000 coupon bonds, 6 per cent.—the coupons to be paid at the pleasure of the owner in currency, or in Cotton certificates, which pledge the Government to pay the same in Cotton, at the rate of 8d. sterling per pound, to be delivered at any time within six months after the ratification of a treaty of peace, at New Orleans, Mobile, Savannah, Charleston, or Wilmington, as the Secretary of the Treasury may direct.

9. Provides for the publication of the Act.

SALES OF IMPORTED GOODS.

(From the Charleston Mercury, 24th March.)

Several cargoes of foreign goods having lately reached this city, parts of them will be offered to the public during this week, and the first sale took place yesterday at the store of Messrs. John G. SOUTHERN WAR NEWS.

The latest date of Southern papers received by us is 30th of March. The following is the telegraphic summary of news from the various seats of war, which appeared in the Richmond papers of that date:—

SUCCESSFUL CAVALRY RAID BY GENERAL FORREST.

The following official despatch was received on Saturday at the War Department:—

TELEGRAPH, March 27.—To General S. Cooper. A.G. and I.G.—General Van-Dorn reports that General Forrest made a successful visit to Brentwood with his division. He burnt the bridge and took all the property and arms, and captured 800 prisoners, including 35 officers. He lost three killed and five wounded. (Signed) BRAXTON BRAGG.

ANOTHER DESPATCH.

CHATTANOOGA, March 27.—The Rebel has received the following, dated Columbia, 26th:—

General Forrest captured yesterday at Brentwood, nine miles in the rear of Franklin, 800 prisoners, with their arms, ammunition, &c. He destroyed a large house of commissary stores, burnt the railroad bridge, tore up the track, and captured 17 covered wagons.

FROM KENTUCKY.

PANOLA, Mississippi, March 24.—The Memphis Bulletin is received. Louisville is being fortified, and citizens sympathizing with the Confederacy paroled. The Hetty Gilmore and crew had captured more Confederates on Green river. The Confederates had occupied Owenton, Kentucky. The sale of fire-arms had been prohibited at Indianapolis.

A Yankee despatch says Fort Pemberton cannot be attacked by infantry. The Confederate force there is estimated at 6,000. It is stated that the fort once passed, no danger is apprehended between there and Yazoo City. The next news, it was supposed, would be flattering. Five small boats had arrived in the Coldwater with reinforcements. The position of the enemy was unknown. The Mississippi was falling at Memphis.

MORGAN'S LATE FIGHT.

CHATTANOOGA, March 27.—Nothing additional from the front to-day.

The official report from General Morgan of his late fight states that it lasted six hours, and that he drove the enemy two miles, and they were heavily reinforced and held their position. Morgan says his loss in officers was heavy.

[ANOTHER ACCOUNT.]

AUGUSTA, March 28.—The Chronicle has a special despatch from McMinnville, Tennessee, March 27, which says that General Morgan had a severe fight with the Federals near Milton, on the 26th, which lasted five hours. The Federals were repulsed and driven eight miles. Our loss was, fifteen killed and 75 wounded. Federal loss about twice that number. They advanced in order to draw our forces from Liberty, but they were compelled to fall back to Murfreesboro'.

FROM TENNESSEE.

KNOXVILLE, March 28.—The report of the capture of the Federal General Carter's brigade by Humphry Marshall is not confirmed. The Register has received the following despatch:—

Wartrace, March 27.—There is daily skirmishing on the Shelbyville pike. The enemy's videttes are four and a half miles from Murfreesboro', and their pickets are at Stone's river. It is believed that the enemy is moving a heavy force on our left flank, in the direction of Columbia. The object is doubtless to form a connection with Grant, and thus cause the Confederates to fall back to Bridgeport. The enemy are devastating the country, burning fences, killing stock, forcing off negroes, and stealing generally. A train ran off the track between this point and Shelbyville. No lives lost.

FROM VICKSBURG.

MOBILE, March 27.—A special to the Appeal, from Vicksburg, says:—"At 5 o'clock this morning four boats were seen advancing towards the upper batteries. A vigorous fire was opened upon them, driving back two, when the other two passed under a raking fire, almost every shot taking effect. One received a shot in her steam chest, compelling her crew to desert her, and in fifteen minutes she filled and sank. Part of her crew escaped to the opposite shore. The boat that escaped is supposed to be the Benton, badly disabled. One shot penetrated her steam drum, disabling her so badly that the Albatross came up to tow her out of danger of our gunboats.

FROM FORT PEMBERTON.

MOBILE, March 27.—The Jackson Appeal says the intelligence that the enemy has appeared again in front of Fort Pemberton is confirmed. On Monday afternoon firing took place, but the result is not known.

COTTON WARRANTS.—In explanation of the statement published this morning relating to the cotton warrants representing nearly 2,000,000 lbs. of the staple which are in circulation, we have been requested to intimate that they are those which were issued to Mr. Z. L. Pearson, who had large transactions with the Confederate States, and that when that gentleman failed and became bankrupt, they passed into the hands of his assignees, who are now seeking to effect sales of them at as good a price as they can, to increase the assets of the estate. Unfortunately the price is placed at 6d. per lb., whereas in the Cotton Bond it is not above 5½d. or 5¼d., so that the latter is in a better position for those who may desire to make investments on this account. These cotton warrants form an exceptional parcel, and were not issued at the full price of 6d. per lb., but the assignees are justified, if they can, in getting the increased terms for the benefit of the creditors. All other cotton warrants have been withdrawn, and are under lock and key, and never will be reissued now that the Confederate Cotton Loan has been so successfully completed.—City Article, Morning Herald, April 22.

THE SPY SYSTEM IN LIVERPOOL.—Under this heading the following paragraph appeared in The Times of Friday:—"It is currently reported that the head constable of Liverpool, acting under instructions from the Government, is employing detectives Cousin, Skaffe, Smith, and Horne to go about incog. and obtain information respecting suspicious vessels, and also to watch the movements of leading Confederates. It is alleged that these detectives have already attempted to bribe the employees of certain firms. It is understood that the Mayor was first called upon to initiate this spy system, but declined, and that it is done against the wishes of the Watch Committee." The truth of the above, after being rashly denied in toto on 'Change on Friday morning, was substantially confirmed the same evening by Sir George Gray. That our head constable received instructions to make inquiries into alleged designs to infringe the Foreign Enlistment Act, and that he has employed a detective with that purpose is now admitted—it matters not whether one or more detectives are employed—but it is denied that bribery has been authorized. It is, however, well known that a number of private detectives have been employed for the same purpose; also, that attempts have been made to bribe employees. Who, then, is to distinguish between the official detective and the private spy? Neither wear uniform, and both conceal their object. It may be doubted whether any detective would hesitate to bribe if it served his purpose, and just now information—true or false—is at a premium in the Federal consulate. Probably if detectives had more money at their disposal—when there is no reward as an incentive—the detective system would be more successful as a rule. We are not in the confidence of the mayor, but that his worship is a willing party to these measures we take the liberty of doubting. As chief magistrate he is bound to transmit orders from Government to the head of the police, but that certainly does not make him a particeps criminis in an unpopular proceeding. As for the Watch Committee's part in this matter little need be said. Having no jurisdiction in a case where the prerogative of the Crown is put in force, they cannot exercise any control over their own servant, or even demand information from him. They can only refuse to supply the ways and means for prosecuting inquiries, which they would have done if called upon. When we see an official intimation from the Watch Committee that they have willingly acquiesced in the orders given to the head constable we may credit the assertions to that effect which have been made, but not until then. It is but right to say that the head constable is only acting up to his instructions, which he has strictly to carry out irrespective of personal feeling, and we know, from a lengthened experience, that he will not, as far as in him lies, take any measure calculated to lower the position of the police force and its head. His duties in this case are of an unpopular nature, but that is his misfortune, and not his fault.—Liverpool Albion.

MILLROY'S OPERATIONS.—The accounts recently received from the valley confirm those previously had of the tyranny exercised by Millroy in his rule in that section. We learn that on Monday, the 16th of the present month, a body of the enemy made a raid from Harper's Ferry, through Lovettsville and Waterford, to Leesburg. Their force consisted of three hundred cavalry and several pieces of artillery. At Leesburg they took a number of valuable horses, and seized several citizens as hostages and carried them off. Being harassed by a portion of Waite's cavalry as far as Hillsborough, the latter were in turn pursued by the enemy as far as Purcellville and Woodgrove. As the enemy returned back above Hillsborough they stopped at the house of Mr. John Thompson, and under the pretence that he had harboured "rebel soldiers" applied the torch to his premises, valued at $10,000, and reduced the whole to ruins. At the time of committing this outrage the vandals announced their intention of burning up the houses of ten other rebel sympathisers in the same neighbourhood. Millroy is carrying out fully Lincoln's emancipation proclamation in the valley. In Clark and Jefferson all the negroes are being carried off. The enemy went to Dr. Wm. McGuire's house, near the Shenandoah, and his negroes refusing to leave, the women and children were put in waggons and the men made to follow them to Winchester.—Richmond Despatch, March 30.
